Style of Translation.—According to Philo, whose account of the LXX is an exaggeration of the statements of "Aristeas," the Greek version is a mathematically accurate reproduction of the original, its miraculous exactitude being attested by the fact that the seventy translators working independently all hit upon precisely the same renderings. This fable has the underlying truth that the LXX is on the whole a word for word translation, retaining the original order so far as the difference of the two idioms admits. There is, however, considerable divergence between the styles in which the different books are rendered: some, especially Job, being rather elegant paraphrases than literal translations, while in others, especially Ezekiel, the Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes (thought by some to be Theodotion rather than the LXX) the literalness is extreme. Of differences between the Hebrew and the Greek which do not imply difference of text a large number explain themselves easily as due to differences of vocalisation of the same consonants—for the vowel-signs used in Hebrew were not invented till after the Moslem conquest; while others are explained by confusion of similar consonants, of which in Hebrew there are several pairs (indeed triads) liable, owing to their similarity, to substitution by readers or writers (in modern times by printers); and transposition of consonants is also of common occurrence where the writing is uncial (i.e. in separate letters). Thus the renderings "the raiders" for Sheba in Jb. 1.[15], and "the horsemen" for Chaldees in 1.[17], reveal their origin to any one slightly conversant with Hebrew. Considerable ingenuity has been devoted to the explanation of LXX renderings by these methods, and it is unlikely that much of the kind remains to be discovered. Further, even literal translators allowed themselves some licence in matters of small significance, e.g. the substitution of singular for plural and vice versâ, the omission or insertion of conjunctions, &c. In the identification of geographical and ethnic names the office of translator coincides with that of commentator, and some variations from the original are due to archæological theory (an example was given above); other examples are the rendering of the Naamathites of Job and the Meonim of Chronicles by Minæans (an Arabian community with whom recently discovered inscriptions have familiarised us), and that of Philistines by Hellenes in Isaiah 9.[12]. Other alterations are due to theological theory; thus there is a decided tendency to banish anthropomorphisms from the text—a tendency which has left its mark on the original also in places: e.g. God "reflects" that He had made man (Gn. 6.[6]), rather than "regrets"; Moses, Aaron, and the elders see "the place where the God of Isr. stood," rather than "the Deity Himself" (Ex. 24.[10]), and Moses sees the "glory," rather than the "form" of the Deity (Nu. 12.[8]). Expressions that might lead to serious misunderstanding are also altered at times (e.g. Ps. 84.[11], "the Lord is a sun"). It has been noticed that in some places the current interpretation of the text has been substituted for the text—so in Lv. 19.[19], "Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with mingled seed," for "thy field," the prohibition being confined to vineyards outside Palestine, and in Dt. 25.[5] (the law of leviratic marriages), "if he have no seed," for "if he have no son," where the ordinary gloss made the word "son" include both sexes. Attempts that have been made to show the influence of Greek philosophy in the rendering of the text have been less successful.

The Jewish tradition charges the LXX with wilfully altering the text in a number of places, variously given as 13, 14, or 18, of which five are actually found in existing copies of the LXX. Of these the most interesting is their avoidance of the ordinary Greek word for "hare" (lagos), for which they substitute "shaggy-foot"; for fear, we are told, of offending a king whose ancestor had that name, should he find it reckoned among unclean beasts.

Relation of Massoretic to LXX Text.—Besides the general alterations noticed in the last section, several books exhibit serious additions, omissions, or changes of order: in Jeremiah the order of the last half is seriously disturbed, while chaps. 33.[14-26] and 48.[45-47] are wanting; in the Proverbs there are some considerable transpositions, 15.[30]–16.[9] are mutilated and in disorder, and in chap. 9. there are additions after vv. 12 and 18; further in 18.[23]–19.[2] the text diverges widely from the Hebrew. In the Psalms 9. and 10. form one, whence all following are numbered one less than the Hebrew: 114. and 115. form one psalm, 113., but 116. is divided into two, and the same is the case with 147., whence the number 150 would be maintained, only an apocryphal psalm, 101., is appended. After 2 Ch. 35.[19], 2 K. 23.[24-27] is inserted, and after 36.[4], 2 K. 23.[34]–24.[4]. There are some serious differences even in the Pentateuch: of Ex. 28.[23-29] the first three verses are omitted, and the remainder summarised. Ex. 35.[12-18] are summarised in a single verse; 36.[8]–39.[43] show serious transposition. Further there is great divergence between the two texts in the books of Samuel and Kings. Some editorial matter is found at the end of the book of Job, some additions, apparently translated from Hebrew, at the end of Joshua, and considerable additions to the book of Esther.

Of systematic alterations we may notice those in the ages of the patriarchs in Genesis, showing that the editors whose texts have come down had worked out independent systems of chronology. On the comparative authority of the Massoretic and LXX texts opinion has varied at different times. So long as the Jews were credited with the most scrupulous care for their national literature, the former was naturally preferred. But this supposition rested largely on the authority of Josephus, who declares that "during all these centuries no one had ventured to make the smallest alteration" in the text of the canonical books, but whose own profession of having accurately represented the OT. in his Archæology without addition or omission, shows that his notion of accuracy differed so widely from that of modern times that the supposed immutability would be consistent with what we should regard as most serious alteration. Modern criticism is therefore disposed to favour the LXX in many places against the Hebrew, chiefly owing (1) to the greater antiquity both of the MSS. of the LXX and (of course) of the MSS. which the translators followed; (2) to the strong reasons which we have for believing that all our copies of the Hebrew go back to one of no great antiquity, casually preserved, and illegible in places. In the matter of wilful alteration in favour of particular dogmas there is no reason to suppose one text freer from manipulation than the other. The banishment from most of the Hebrew OT. of any form that could have been represented in Greek as Iesus, suggests that the Hebrew has been seriously tampered with in the anti-Christian interest. It would appear, moreover, that in comparatively late times Jewish scribes had a poor reputation for accuracy as compared with those who made copies of the Qor'ān.

History of LXX.—Translations are more liable to wilful alteration than original texts, and there are signs that even in early times the practice of correcting the LXX from copies of the original was common: for we frequently get the same word rendered twice according to different views of its meaning or rdg. Other alterations were made by persons ignorant of Hebrew, who seemed to themselves by a slight (sometimes palæographically legitimate) alteration to introduce a better sense: a good case is Ps. 16.(17.)[14], "they are gorged with swine's flesh" (huciôn), for "they are gorged with sons" (huiôn), where, however, the latter corresponds with the original. Justin Martyr (ob. about 163) attests the custom then in vogue of altering the Greek text to suit the needs of Christian controversy; and the Jewish conviction that the LXX did not represent the Hebrew truly led to a series of fresh translations into Greek according to a variety of principles. Finally a critical edition was undertaken by Origen, who died about A.D. 254, at the port of Cæsarea in Palestine. This work was to be a Corpus of materials for the restitution of the text, consisting of (1) the Hebrew in Hebrew characters; (2) the same in Greek characters; (3) the translation of Aquila; (4) that of Symmachus; (5) the LXX as revised by himself; (6) the version of Theodotion. This work bore the title Hexaplâ, "sixfold," for which in some books "eightfold" was substituted, two further translations having been added. Critical marks were placed against the LXX column (after the style of the Alexandrian critics of Homer) to indicate passages found in the Greek with no corresponding Hebrew, or passages introduced from Theodotion to supply gaps indicated by the Hebrew. The translation was moreover subjected to revision by himself to make it accord with the Hebrew. The vast size of the work prevented it being multiplied, except for the LXX column, and the omission or corruption by subsequent scribes of the critical marks placed new difficulties before succeeding critics in the way of recovering the earlier LXX text. The work was issued by Origen in a somewhat abridged form, called Tetraplâ ("fourfold"), the first two columns being omitted; and the column containing the LXX was afterwards issued separately by Eusebius of Cæsarea (ob. 340) and Pamphilus. The original work is said to have perished in the sixth cent. or later. Two later recensions of the LXX were executed by Lucian of Samosata (ob. 311) and Hesychius (also ob. 311, if rightly identified). The former of these recensions was made by comparison with Hebrew MSS. as well as the later Greek versions: of the latter the scope is obscure. It is stated that the recension of Lucian was in use "from Constantinople to Antioch," that of Hesychius in Egypt, while that of Origen dominated in Palestine. When the spread of Christianity necessitated the translation of the OT. into other languages, it was the LXX on which these new versions were based; there is in Syriac a large portion extant of a Hexaplar version, i.e. a translation made from Origen's edition preserving his critical marks. The efforts of modern scholars have been directed partly to restoring these three ancient recensions, which are greatly confused in the MSS., partly to reproducing faithfully the more ancient MSS. and collecting the variants to be found in those of later date. Of the former the most famous are the cod. Alexandrinus A. (in the British Museum), the Vaticanus B., and the Sinaiticus S. Of all these facsimiles have been published. The most accurate edition is that of Swete, Cambridge, 1887–1894; see also Introduction to OT. in Greek, ibid. 1906.

D. S. Margoliouth.

SEPULCHRE. See Tomb.

SERAH, the daughter of Asher (Gn. 46.[17]; 1 Ch. 7.[30]), called "Sarah" in Nu. 26.[46].

SERAIAH. (1) Scribe to king David (2 S. 8.[17]). In 2 S. 20.[25] the name appears as "Sheva," and in 1 Ch. 18.[16] as Shavsha. If, as some think, he was a foreigner acting in matters requiring a knowledge of other languages, this may account for the variations in the form of his name. (2) High Priest in Jerusalem, who was taken when the city fell, and put to death at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar's orders (2 K. 25.[18]). He was ancestor of Ezra (7.[1]). (3) Son of Tanhumeth of Netophah, one of the "captains of the forces" who joined Gedaliah at Mizpeh (2 K. 25.[23]; Jr. 40.[8]). (4) Son of Kenaz, brother of Othniel, and father of Joab (1 Ch. 4.[13f.]). (5) One of the chiefs of Simeon, and ancestor of Jehu (1 Ch. 4.[35]). (6) A leader who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ez. 2.[2], &c.), called "Azariah" (Ne. 7.[7]) and "Zacharias" (1 Es. 5.[8]). (7) A priestly family represented in the sealing of the covenant (Ne. 10.[2], &c.), called "Azariah" (1 Ch. 9.[11]). (8) Son of Azriel, sent by king Jehoiakim to take Baruch and Jeremiah (Jr. 36.[26]). (9) Son of Neriah and brother of Baruch (Jr. 51.[59ff.]). He accompanied king Zedekiah to Babylon in the fourth year of his reign. Jeremiah entrusted to him the roll on which was written the doom of Babylon, charging him to sink it in the Euphrates, as a sign that Babylon should sink and not rise again. He was sar menûḥāh, a title variously rendered "quiet prince" (AV.), "chief chamberlain" (RV.), "quartermaster" (RVm.).

SERAPHIM. See Cherubim.

SERED, son of Zebulun, father of the Seredetes (AV. Sardites [Gn. 46.[14]; Nu. 26.[26]]).

SERGIUS PAULUS. See Paulus, Sergius.

SERJEANTS. This is EV. tr. of ῥαβδοῦχοι, "bearers of rods" = Lat. lictores, the officials who waited upon the Roman magistrates, carrying out their orders, and acting as executioners (Ac. 16.[35,38]). The lictors carried over the left shoulder the fasces, the emblem of the magistrates' authority, consisting of "a bundle of rods of elm or birch, tied together by a red strap, and enclosing an axe, with its head outside."

Lictor

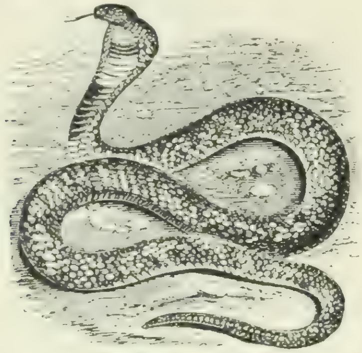
SERPENT (Heb. generic word nāḥāsh; the word in Dt. 32.[24] really means "creepers" (in the dust); sārāph is really the adj. "fiery"; tannîn is also trd. "whale," "dragon." In Gr. ophis is the generic word). There are a very considerable number of serpents in Pal.; some four or five species are poisonous (the Cerastes, the Cobra, and the viper of several kinds), but a large number are innocuous. All, however, share the evil reputation of the race. The venomous species hide in crevices of walls, or sometimes in the hollow made by the print of the hoof of a horse or mule: these poisonous snakes are considered under Adder, Asp, Cockatrice, and Viper. The serpent is introduced into the story of the Fall as the symbol of evil united with wisdom. The repugnance of the human race to the S. is probably a beneficial inheritance to protect us fm. the poisonous species. It was thus natural that it shd. become the symbol of evil. The idea arose to escape evil by propitiating the power that was behind it; hence S.-worship, a form of superstition widely spread. Good qualities were then attributed to the object of worship, especially the power of healing; this may have had something to do with the choice of the Brazen Serpent as the means of curing the snake-bitten Israelites. The superficial resemblance between the S. and a fish will explain the contrast of Mw. 7.[10]. Serpent-charming is a practice common in the further E. and known in the Levant. The S. is sensitive to musical sounds, as are many other animals, and is attracted to the source of them. The most venomous are the most sensitive, but although the snake influenced by the charm is little irritable, many operators extract the poison fangs before they carry the S. about. The S.-charmer has a shrill pipe, on wh. he plays a monotonous tune; soon the serpents he has brought with him in his basket begin to raise their heads and move them in rhythmic accordance with the cadence of the music. Sometimes with greater skill, and consequently able to dare more, the charmer goes to a ruinous wall in wh. he knows there is a S. and plays. The S. gradually glides out, then he seizes it in such a way that it is powerless, then when it has exhausted itself he puts it into one of his baskets.



EGYPTIAN ASP: COBRA

SERUG, son of Reu, great-grandfather of Abraham (Gn. 11.[20], &c.; Lk. 3.[35], AV. "Saruch"). Ancient traditions represent him as the originator of idolatry, and especially of the deification of the dead. Thus John of Antioch says: "Serug, of the race of Japhet, taught the duty of honouring eminent deceased men, either by images or statues, or worshipping them on certain anniversaries as if still living, of preserving a record of their actions in the sacred books of the priests, and of calling them gods, as being benefactors of mankind. Hence arose polytheism and idolatry" (Frag. Hist. Græc. iv. 345).

SERVANT. See SLAVE, SLAVERY.

SERVANT OF THE LORD. The worshippers of a deity were regarded as his "servants"; to emphasise their recognition of this frequently names were given wh. implied this, e.g. Ebed-Tob, Ebed-Asherah, and Ebed-Sullim, in the Tell Amarna tablets; also Abed-Nego (Nebo) (Dn. 1.[7]). The Israelites claimed to be in this sense the servants of the Lord, as in Ps. 90.[13], 102.[14], &c. Names were given in the same way by the Jews; Obadiah is a not infrequent name in Scripture, occurring thirteen times. It is found on seals that have come down to us (KB. 592 abb. 170; HA. p. 285, fig. 139). Over against the human self-designation as S. of the L. is the Divine designation of certain persons as His "servants." Thus the "prophets" are called by God His servants (Jr. 44.[4]); so with individual prophets as Isaiah (Is. 20.[3]); it is most frequently used as a designation of MOSES (Jo. 1.[1]); J". frequently calls David "My servant" (Ps. 89.[3]). This designation is not restricted to those of Israelite birth, for Nebuchadnezzar is also so called (Jr. 25.[9], 27.[6]). A usage common with some of the prophets, as Isaiah and Jeremiah, is to call the nation collectively, as Jacob or Israel, the S. of the L. As the title SON OF MAN, in its first meaning, was applicable to every human being but became the special and peculiar title of our Lord, so with this. In the second Isaiah there is a group of passages (42.[1-4], 49.[1-6], 50.[4-9], 52.[13]–53.[12]) wh. are intensely personal in their reference, and have been by all Christians in more recent times regarded as Messianic. It wd. be waste of time to attempt to consider all the suggestions that have been hazarded to avoid the Christian conclusion as old as Philip the Evangelist, but we may refer to one or two of them. An old Jewish interpretation was that it was the ideal Isr., the righteous kernel of the nation, that was here intended; but he is to "restore the preserved of Isr." (Is. 49.[6]), in other words he is to restore himself! The truth is the whole description is too intensely personal and individual to make any idea of personification at all plausible. Consequently critics have devoted their attention to find some individual who will fit the description; a favourite has been Zerubbabel (Kittel), who so far as the record goes seems a somewhat colourless personage, put into prominence by his Davidic descent; he neither was unjustly condemned nor was of mysterious origin (53.[8]); he was not "despised nor rejected" by the Jews, nor did they "hide their faces fm. him"(53.[3]). With greater plausibility it may be suggested (G. A. Smith) that Jeremiah is intended, as he certainly suffered imprisonment; but the S. of the L. is put to death by an unjust decision of a court (53.[8]), and nothing of that kind befell Jeremiah; in no sense cd. it be said of Jeremiah by the Jews, "by his stripes we are healed" (53.[5]). An extraordinary suggestion has been recently made that the S. of the L. was Cyrus (T. H. Weir); the typical Eastern conqueror had little in common with the sufferer who "is brought as a lamb to the slaughter." The idea that the Servant is Eleazar of 2 Maccabees (Bertholet), and Cheyne's Jerahmeelite theory, are defended by unjustifiable triflings with the text. The final word of criticism is that of Duhm, that it is an insoluble problem. An incorrect theory of the nature of PROPHECY hinders these critics fm. recognising how completely and perfectly the Messianic interpretation and its application to our Lord fits every feature of the picture.

SETH, the son of ADAM and EVE, born after the murder of ABEL (Gn. 5.[3-8]), and father of ENOS. The bk. of Jubilees (4.[11], Schodde) assigns him as his wife his sister Azūrā. A sect of Gnostics assumed the name Sethites, the precise tenets of wh. cannot be ascertained with any definiteness; by the Fathers they were associated with the Ophites.

SETHUR, son of Michael, who represented Asher among the spies (Nu. 13.[13]).

SETTLE is EV. tr. of 'ăzārāh in Ek. 43.[14, 17, 20], 45.[19], where it is applied to the ledges (v. 14, RVm.) above the base, on wh. the cubes of the altar rested. Elsewhere (2 Ch. 4.[9], 6.[13]) the word is trd. "court."

SEVENEH. See SYENE.

SHAALBIM, a town from wh., with Mount Heres and Aijalon, the Amorites had driven the children of Dan (Jg. 1.[35]). It is named with Makaz and Beth-shemesh in one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. 4.[9]). Possibly the same place is intended by Shaalabbin (Jo. 19.[42]) and Shaalbon (2 S. 23.[32], &c.). Selbīṭ, c. eight miles N. of Beth-shemesh, may represent the ancient town.

SHAALIM, LAND OF, AV. SHALIM. Poss. we shd. here (1 S. 9.[4]) read SHAALBIM. Guthe thinks it may be ident. with SHUAL, and would then place it between Deir Dīwān and eṭ Ṭaiyibeh.

SHAAPH. (1) Son of Jahdai (1 Ch. 2.[47]). (2) Son of Caleb, brother of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2.[49]).

SHAARAIM, SHARAIM. (1) A town in the Shephelah of Judah (Jo. 15.[36]), named along with Adithaim and Gederah. It is mentioned on the route taken by the Phil. in their flight from the vale of Elah (1 S. 17.[52]). It may be ident. with mod. Sa'īreh, c. two miles W. of Beit 'Atāb. (2) An unidentd. town in Simeon (1 Ch. 4.[31]) = Sharuhen (Jo. 19.[6]), and Shilhim (15.[32]).

SHAASHGAZ, chamberlain of Ahasuerus the Persian king, who had charge of the concubines (Est. 2.[14]).

SHABBETHAI, a Levite who was active in the matter of the men who had married foreign wives (Ez. 10.[15]), called "Sabbatheus" (1 Es. 9.[14]). He was one of those who "gave the sense" of the law when it was read to the people (Ne. 8.[7]). He shared the oversight of "the outward business of the house of God" (Ne. 11.[16]).

SHACHIA, a Benjamite, son of Shaharaim (1 Ch. 8.[10]).

SHADDAI, a title of GOD, EV. tr. "Almighty," described as the primitive name (Ex. 6.[3]). In the LXX Shaddai is generally left untranslated, save in Jb., in wh. are to be found nearly a third of the cases of its occurrence; it is almost half the times trd. pantokratōr. The precise force of the title may be regarded as somewhat doubtful.

SHADRACH, the Babylonian name of Hananiah, one of Daniel's three companions (Dn. 1.[7]). Delitzsch explains S. as equivalent to Shudur-Aku, "the command of Aku" (the Sun-god). See DANIEL.

SHAGE, father of Jonathan the Hararite (1 Ch. 11.[34]). In 2 S. 23.[33] he is called SHAMMAH.

SHAHARAIM, a Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.[8]).

SHAHAZIMAH, properly SHAZUMAH, a town in the territory of Issachar, probably to the SE. of Tabor (Jo. 19.[22]): not identified.

SHALEM ("peace"). Jacob, returning from Haran, "came to Shalem" (RV. "came in peace"), a city of Shechem. AV. is probably right, and S. may be represented by the mod. vill. Sālim, c. four miles E. of Nāblus, wh. lay in the way of Jacob's approach from the Jordan valley (Gn. 33.[18]).

SHALISHA, a district in Mt. Ephraim through wh. Saul passed in search of his father's asses (1 S. 9.[4]). There is no clue to its position. "Beth-Shalisha" (2 K. 4.[42]) may have given its name to the region.

SHALLECHETH, THE GATE OF (1 Ch. 26.[16]), a gate of the Temple otherwise unknown.

SHALLUM. This name occurs frequently in Scrip. Here we need mention only (1) The son of Jabesh, who assassinated Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II. His "reign" cd. be little more than nominal. A month later he was himself slain by Menahem, son of Gadi, who marched against him from Tirzah, having probably made insurrection at the same time (2 K. 15.). (2) The fourth son of Josiah, king of Judah, who succeeded his fr. and prob. at his coronation took the name JEHOAHAZ (Jr. 22.[11]; 1 Ch. 3.[15]; cp. 2 K. 23.[30-33]; 2 Ch. 36.[1-3]). (3) Husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 K. 22.[14], &c.). (4) Son of Kore, head of the Korahite gatekeepers (1 Ch. 9.[17, 19, 31]). He is prob. ident. with Meshelemia (26.[1], &c.), and Shelemia (26.[14]). (5) Son of Zadok, and fr. of Hilkiah, in the list of High Priests (1 Ch. 6.[12f.]; Ez. 7.[2]).

SHALLUN, son of Col-hozeh, who assisted Nehemiah in repairing the walls, &c. (Ne. 3.[15]).

SHALMAI, RV. SHAMLAI (Ez. 2.[46]; Ne. 7.[48] [RV. Samlai]), ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel; called "Subai" (1 Es. 5.[30]).

SHALMAN, the conqueror of BETH-ARBEL (Ho. 10.[14]), most probably SHALMANESER II. (see next article); as we have no clue to the city S. sacked we can have no certainty as to the person. We may not assume that it was in Pal., or that it was either the Arbela (Irbid) of Galilee or that of Gilead. There was a more famous Arbela E. of the Euphrates, made illustrious by Alexander's victory; the special horror mt. spread the news to Israel. Schrader (COT. ii. 140) thinks a Moabite k., a tributary of TIGLATH-PILESER, is intended, but of his history nothing is known.

SHALMANESER, the name of several Asyr. kings, but only S. IV. is directly referred to in Scripture. He succeeded TIGLATH-PILESER, and on ascending the throne assumed the name Shalmannu-asarid (Shalmaneser). Shortly after his accession S. made an expedition into Western Syria, and Hoshea, k. in Samaria, became tributary. However, S. soon discovered that his vassal was intriguing with So, k. of Egp.; having wiled him into his power, S. deposed and put Hoshea in prison. The loss of their k. did not overwhelm the people; for three years they maintained the defence of Samaria. Before the inhabitants had been compelled to surrender, S. himself died; poss. he was assassinated. He was succeeded by SARGON, who, as he claims no relationship to S., was founder of another dynasty.

BLACK OBELISK OF SHALMANESER

SHAMA, one of David's mighty men, son of Hothan of Aroer (1 Ch. 11.[44]).

SHAMARIAH, RV. SHEMARIAH, son of Rehoboam, his mr. being Abihail, the daughter of Eliab (2 Ch. 11.[19]).

SHAMBLES (1 Cor. 10.[25]) did not mean, as it does with us, the place where cattle are slaughtered, but the market where meat and other provisions were exposed for sale.

SHAMED, RV. SHEMED, son of Elpaal, a Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.[12]).

SHAMER, RV. SHEMER. (1) A Merarite Levite, and ancestor of Ethan (1 Ch. 6.[46]). (2) An Asherite, son of Heber (1 Ch. 7.[34]), called "Shomer" (v. 32).

SHAMGAR, the son of Anath, is named after the time of Ehud for a heroic exploit in wh. he slew 600 Philistines with an ox goad, thus saving Israel; but it is not said that he "judged" Isr. (Jg. 3.[31]). It has been said that in chap. 5.[6] he "appears to be a foreign oppressor." For this there is no foundation. The name is prob. Assyrian. It is ident. with "Samgar" in "Samgar nebo" (Jr. 39.[3]), the name of the deity being dropped. "Anath" is = anatu, the wife of the Assyr. god Anu. "The tablets of Tel el-Amarna have explained how Assyrian names came to be imported into Canaan, and Anath, as we see fm. the existence of a Beth-anoth, 'temple of Anat,' had been worshipped within the territory of the tribe of Judah" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and the Mon., 308).

SHAMHUTH, the fifth captain for the fifth month in the army as organised by David (1 Ch. 27.[8]). See SHAMMAH (4).

SHAMIR. (1) A city in the hill country of Judah (Jo. 15.[48]), near Jattir. It may be ident. with Khirbet Sōmerah, c. 12 miles SW. of Hebron, an ancient site with remains of walls, tombs, cisterns, &c. (2) A city in Mount Ephraim, the home of Tola, son of Puah, who judged Israel after Abimelech (Jg. 10.[1]). Schwarz suggested identification with Sanūr, a vill. occupying a striking position on the road, eight miles S. of Jenīn. (3) The name of a Levite, son of Micah (1 Ch. 24.[24]).

SHAMMA, son of Zophar, an Asherite (1 Ch. 7.[37]).

SHAMMAH. (1) Son of Reuel, grandson of Esau (Gn. 36.[13], &c.). (2) Br. of David, third son of Jesse (1 S. 16.[9]). He went with his two elder brothers with Saul to battle with the Phil. (17.[13]). He appears in 2 S. 13.[3] as Shimeah, fr. of Jonadab, who is described as "a very subtil man," with whom Amnon, his friend and cousin, takes counsel; and in 2 S. 21.[21] (RV. Shimei) as father of Jonathan who slew a Gittite giant. In 1 Ch. 2.[13] he is called Shimma (RV. Shimea), and in 20.[7] Shimea. (3) Son of Agee the Hararite, one of David's mighty men. His renown rested upon exploits of singular gallantry. A foraging troop of Phil. drove the Israelites fm. a field of lentils, but S. refused to fly, and by his bravery turned defeat into victory (2 S. 23.[11f.]). He was prob. one of the three who brake through the ranks of the Phil., and brought David water fm. the well of Bethlehem (vv. 14ff.). In 1 Ch. 11.[12ff.] Shammah's feat is credited to Eleazar, son of Dodo (cp. 2 S. 23.[9ff.]). In 2 S. 23.[32] we shd. read "Jonathan son of Shammah." 1 Ch. 11.[34] makes Jonathan the son of Shage. This has arisen from confusion with Agee. (4) Shammah the Harodite, one of David's distinguished soldiers (2 S. 23.[25]). We shd. read "Harodite" for "Harorite" in 1 Ch. 11.[27], where the name is given as Shammoth. In 1 Ch. 27.[8] it appears as Shamhuth. Perhaps "Hararite" (2 S. 23.[11]) should be "Harodite," in wh. case (3) and (4) wd. be one and the same man.

SHAMMAI. (1) A descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2.[28, 32]). (2) Son of Rekem, and father of MAON, i.e. prob. founder of that city (1 Ch. 2.[44f.]). (3) A Judahite (1 Ch. 4.[17]).

SHAMMOTH. See SHAMMAH (4).

SHAMMUA. (1) Son of Zaccur, who represented Reuben among the spies (Nu. 13.[4]). (2) Son borne to David by Bathsheba (1 Ch. 14.[4]), called Shammuah (2 S. 5.[14] AV.) and Shimea (1 Ch. 3.[5]).

(3) A Levite, father of Abda (Ne. 11.[17]), called Shemaiah, father of Obadiah (1 Ch. 9.[16]). (4) Head of the priestly family of Bilgah (Ne. 12.[18]).

SHAMSHERAI, a Benjamite, son of Jeroham (1 Ch. 8.[26]).

SHAPHAM, the second in authority in the tribe of Gad (1 Ch. 5.[12]).

SHAPHAN (" coney "), son of Azaliah, father of AHIKAM, and grandfather of GEDALIAH, scribe to JOSIAH, probably somewhat like, mutatis mutandis, our Chancellor of the Exchequer: he was deputed to arrange concerning the expenditure in the repair of the Temple. It was to S. that HILKIAH delivered " the book of the law " wh. he had found in the Temple; and it was he that " read it before the king." It has been assumed without evidence that this consisted solely of Deuteronomy. S. was one of the deputies sent to consult HULDA the prophetess (2 K. 22.[3-14]; 2 Ch. 34.[8-20]).

On the name Shaphan, W. R. Smith built an ingenious theory that it pointed to the remains of totemism among the Jews; yet to the present day men have animal names given them in the E. without any thought of the totem of the clan; the name is given now in the hope that the animal's peculiarities may be possessed by the child. A girl is called Tabitha in the hope that she may be as graceful as a "gazelle"; or a boy is called Nimr, with the desire that he may be fierce and agile as the "leopard"; the belief is that in some way the name tends to produce the desired result. This is equally superstition, but totally different fm. totemism. Then there is the case of nicknames to be considered; even the name "David" is poss. of that nature, as also "Solomon."

SHAPHAT. (1) Son of Hori, who represented Simeon among the spies (Nu. 13.[5]). (2) Father of the prophet Elisha (1 K. 19.[16], &c.). (3) Son of Shemaiah, in the line of David (1 Ch. 3.[22]). (4) A Gadite chief (1 Ch. 5.[12]). (5) Son of Adlai, who had charge of David's oxen (1 Ch. 27.[29]).

SHAPHER, RV. SHEPHER, an unidentified station of the children of Isr. in the wanderings (Nu. 33.[23f.]).

SHAPHIR. See SAPHIR.

SHARAI is named only as having married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[40]).

SHARAIM. See SHAARAIM.

SHARAR. See SACAR.

SHAREZER, the s. of SENNACHERIB and, with ADRAMMELECH, his murderer (2 K. 19.[37]; Is. 37.[38]). Only his br. is mentioned in the Bab. Chron. as the murderer. The name as it stands is incomplete; there is a s. of SENNACHERIB called Sar-eṭi-utsur, a name that became S. in transcription. Moses of Chorene names two assassins whom he calls Adramelus and Sanasarus; however, he may be borrowing fm. the Heb. record. S. mt. be relatively inconspicuous, and therefore omitted fm. the Bab. Chron.

SHARON (Heb. hash-Shārōn). (1) The Gr. Sarōn (Ac. 9.[35]) is preserved in the name of the German colony at Jaffa, " Sarona." The southern boundary is indefinite. It runs from about Jaffa to the foot of the mountains, between wh. and the sea the plain stretches northward along the coast to Carmel. It is covered with deep, rich soil, and wherever cultivated it yields abundant returns. Wonderfully beautiful are the many-hued flowers that besprinkle it in the early year. Four perennial streams cross the plain to the sea: Nahr el-'Aujeh in the S., Nahr Iskanderūneh, Nahr Mufjir, and Nahr ez-Zerqā, or Crocodile River, just under Carmel. They are all sluggish, flowing through marshland to the sea. Plentiful supplies of water are found on digging at almost any point in the plain. Several of the old Crusaders' wells are still in excellent repair, and doing good service—like that at Qalansaweh. The soil is largely uncultivated to-day, serving, as it has done fm. of old, as pasture-land (1 Ch. 27.[29]; Is. 65.[10]). But the gardens and orange groves of Jaffa are luxuriant and fruitful, and afford ample proof of its fertility. Olives abound around Ramleh and Ludd. In the north there are still traces of the ancient oak forests. Of places belonging to Sharon, which took positions of importance at different times, may be mentioned Jaffa, Cæsaræa-Palestina, Dor, and Athlīt, on the shore; Aphek, Antipatris, and Lydda inland. See ROSE for Rose of Sharon. (2) S. occurs (1 Ch. 5.[16]) without the article, as the name of a district occupied by Gad E. of the Jordan, apparently to the N. of Bashan. Kittel, following LXX, suggests " Sirion," wh. (Dt. 3.[9]) is Hermon. S. wd. then refer to the pasture grounds of Hermon. (3) In Jo. 12.[18] we shd. probably read " king of Aphek in Sharon." This might point to a Sharon NE. of Tabor, of wh. OEJ. speaks. If so, the name may be preserved in the mod. Sārōna, on the plateau, SW. of Tiberias. See LASHARON.

SHARUHEN. See SHAARAIM (2).

SHASHAI, a son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[40]), called " Sesis " (1 Es. 9.[34]).

SHASHAK, a Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.[14]).

SHAUL. (1) S. " of Rehoboth by the river," an ancient king of Edom (Gn. 36.[37], AV. " Saul "; 1 Ch. 1.[48f.]). (2) Son of Simeon by a Canaanitish woman (Gn. 46.[10], &c.), whose descendants were known as the Shaulites (Nu. 26.[13]). (3) A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch. 6.[24]), called " Joel " (v. 36).

SHAVEH, THE VALLEY OF (Gn. 14.[17]), the place where Melchizedek and the king of Sodom met Abraham. It is " the king's dale," in wh. Absalom erected his memorial pillar (2 S. 18.[18]). It was most likely the wide depression at the head of the valley, now called the Tyropœon. See JERUSALEM.

SHAVEH KIRJATHAIM, the scene of the defeat of the Emim by Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him (Gn. 14.[5]). The place prob. took its name from KIRJATHAIM (1).

SHAVING. Several Heb. words are trd. "to shave" in EV. (1) Gāzaz, "to cut," or "shear" (Jb. 1.[20]). (2) The piel of gālaḥ, "to be bald" (Nu. 6.[9], &c.): the pual also meaning "to shave one-self" (Lv. 13.[33]). (3) The phrase "to cause a razor to pass over" (Heb. 'ābar ta'ar, Nu. 8.[7]). Shaving was practised in Egypt in early times. Herodotus tells us that the priests shaved the hair off their heads (ii. 36), and indeed off their whole bodies (37). Like Joseph (Gn. 41.[14]), the Israelites may have followed this practice there.

Among the Hebrews, as among the Arabs to-day, shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Jb. 1.[20], &c.). The Egyptians, on the contrary, in sorrow let the hair grow. Neither Moslem nor orthodox Jew will allow his beard to be shaven in normal circumstances. "The shaven one" is a term of reproach with the Arabs. But in fulfilment of a vow the hair may be shaven off the head (Ac. 21.[24]). See also HAIR.

SHAVSHA is not a Hebrew name. The bearer was prob. not an Israelite. He may have been the king's foreign "secretary" (1 Ch. 18.[16], RVm.): that is, he may have conducted the necessary correspondence with foreign courts. The name seems to have given the copyists some trouble. It appears as Seraiah in 2 S. 8.[17]; Sheva in 2 S. 20.[25]; and Shisha in 1 K. 4.[3].

SHEAL, one who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[29]), called "Jasael" (1 Es. 9.[30]).

SHEALTIEL. See ZERUBBABEL.

SHEARIAH, son of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch. 8.[38], 9.[44]).

SHEARING-HOUSE, the place where the brethren of Ahaziah were met and slain by Jehu (2 K. 10.[12, 14]). The Heb. beth-'ēqed, "place of binding," shd. prob. be taken as a place-name, "Beth-eked." OEJ. places the shearing-house in Esdraelon, 15 Rm. miles fm. Legio. It may possibly be represented by Beit Kād, a vill. three miles E. of Jenīn.

SHEAR JASHUB ("a remnant shall return"), a symbolic name given by Isaiah to his son, who accompanied him to his interview with Ahaz, before the invasion by the allies, the kings of Israel and Syria (Is. 7.[3]).

SHEBA. (1) Son of Bichri, a Benjamite. On David's return from Mahanaim, after the defeat and death of Absalom, the old jealousy between Judah and the northern tribes, destined to lead in the end to the disruption of the kingdom, almost brought about the catastrophe then. Sheba saw an opportunity to re-establish the ascendency of his tribe, to wh. the first king had belonged. The entire force representing the northern tribes responded to his call, and, raising the standard of revolt, he marched through the length of the northern kingdom. His hope of great accessions to his strength was not fulfilled. Pursued by Joab, in command of the tardily brought army of Judah, Sheba, joined only by the men of his own clan (for "Beerites," 2 S. 20.[14], we shd. read "Bichrites"), shut himself up in ABEL BETH MAACAH. Joab at once invested the town, and was clearly on the point of taking it, when, on the advice of a wise woman, the townsmen cut off Sheba's head and cast it over the wall to Joab. The rebellion was thus promptly and effectively quelled (2 S. 20.). (2) A Gadite chief (1 Ch. 5.[13]). (3) "Sheba" in Jo. 19.[2] is possibly a repetition of the last part of the preceding name. See also SABÆANS.

SHEBAH (Heb. shib'ah, lit. "oath"), the name of the well dug by Isaac's men at Beersheba (Gn. 26.[33]).

SHEBAM, RV. SEBAM, a city in the territory of Reuben, named between Elealeh and Nebo (Nu. 32.[3]). It also appears as Shibma, v. 38, and Sibma (Jo. 13.[19], &c.), in the midst of a famous vine-growing country (Is. 16.[8f.]; Jr. 48.[32]). It is possibly = Sūmia, two miles fm. Ḥesbān, on the S. side of the wādy. The ancient remains are considerable. These are described by Conder (Survey of Eastern Pal., PEF. pp. 221ff.). Rock-cut wine-presses are found in the neighbouring slopes.

SHEBANIAH. (1) One of the Levites who took part in the recital recorded in Ne. 9.[4ff.] (2) One of the priests who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[4], 12.[14]), called "Shechaniah" in Ne. 12.[3]. (3) A Levite who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[12]). (4) A priestly trumpeter (1 Ch. 15.[24]).

SHEBARIM, a place on the route taken by the men of Israel in their flight from Ai (Jo. 7.[5]). No name resembling this has been recovered in the vicinity. Perhaps we should translate "quarries," with Keil and Steuernagel. LXX does not take it as a proper name, and renders "till they were broken," i.e. utterly discomfited.

SHEBAT, the eleventh month. See YEAR.

SHEBER, a son of Caleb by Maacah (1 Ch. 2.[48]).

SHEBNA (Is. 22.[15-25], 36.[3, 11, 22]), a high official in the court of Hezekiah. Fm. the fact that his fr. is not named it is argued that he was a novus homo, perhaps a foreigner; he appears to have given way to the love of grandeur so common in upstarts. Isaiah denounces him for having hewed out for himself a tomb in the cliff, and threatens him with captivity. It has been conjectured that he was leader of the Egyptian party in the Jewish court. He seems to have been removed fm. the office of prefect of the palace to that of secretary to the king. We have no record of the fulfilment of Isaiah's fierce prophecy; but we have not the complete history of that time; and, further, as all prophecies of judgment were conditional, he may have repented, and so escaped the threatened punishment.

SHEBUEL. (1) Son of Gershom, who had charge of the Temple treasuries (1 Ch. 23.[16], 26.[24]), called Shubael in 24.[20]. (2) Son of Heman (1 Ch. 25.[4]), called Shubael in v. 20.

SHECANIA. (1) Head of the tenth course of priests taken by lot (1 Ch. 24.[11] RV.). (2) A priest, one of those appointed in the days of Hezekiah to distribute the daily portion to their brethren in the cities of the priests (2 Ch. 31.[15]).

SHECHANIAH, RV. SHECANIAH. (1) One descended from Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.[21f.]). He was head of a family that returned with Ezra (Ez. 8.[3]), called "Sechenias" in 1 Es. 8.[29]. (2) Head of a family which returned with Ezra (Ez. 8.[5]), called "Sechenias" in 1 Es. 8.[32]. (3) Son of Jehiel, who suggested the putting away of the foreign wives (Ez. 10.[2]), called "Jechonias" in 1 Es. 8.[92]. (4) The father of Shemaiah, a gatekeeper (Ne. 3.[29]), possibly identical with (1). (5) Son of Arah, and father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (Ne. 6.[18]). (6) Head of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ne. 12.[3]), called "Shebaniah" in Ne. 10.[4], 12.[14].

SHECHEM. Ancient Shechem lay in the throat of the valley which cuts Mount Ephraim in two. Of this pass, or gateway, Ebal and Gerizim may be called the pillars. Between them from of old must have flowed the main stream of the commerce of east and west. This formed the easiest approach to the sea from the region beyond Jordan. Of the founding of S. we have no record, but from the days of Jacob it appears frequently in history. It was visited by Abraham on his first entrance into Canaan (Gn. 12.[6], AV. Sichem). From its association with him the terebinth of Moreh may have derived something of its sacredness. Hither came Jacob, returning fm. Haran (Gn. 33.[18]), and purchased a bit of land fm. the natives. While he resided here the events befell wh. are related in chap. 34., making it desirable that he shd. remove. Before going he buried the "strange gods" found among his household, and the ornaments, poss. associated with idolatry, under "the terebinth wh. was by Shechem" (35.[4]). He retained grazing rights in the neighbourhood (37.[12], &c.). Probably its sacred associations led to its being given to the Levites, while its central position and comparative accessibility fitted it specially for a City of Refuge (Jo. 20.[7], 21.[21]). Here Joshua assembled the children of Israel, and exhorted them before they were dismissed each man to his own inheritance (Jo. 24.). And again the "sanctuary" is in evidence (v. 26f.). The bones of Joseph were buried in the portion wh. Jacob had bought (v. 32). Gideon's Shechemite concubine bore him Abimelech, whose abortive attempt to set up a monarchy involved himself and his friends in disaster (8., 9.). A second great national assembly was held at Shechem, when the northern tribes decided to throw off allegiance to Rehoboam (1 K. 12.[1ff.]). Jeroboam, on being chosen king, fortified Shechem and made it his residence (v. 25). It was still inhabited at the time of the Exile (Jr. 41.[5]). Later,* it became the headquarters of the Samaritans, whose temple was built on the neighbouring height of Gerizim; who took full advantage of the ancient and sacred traditions connected with the place. Under the Romans it was known as Flavia Neapolis, and Neapolis, in the form of Nāblus, is still the name of the city. It was held for a time by the Crusaders, and the ruins of several of their churches—one forming part of a mosque—are still to be seen. Besides the holy places pointed out by the Samaritans, the traditional burying-place of Joseph is shown to the east of the city; and on the south side of the vale, as it opens into the plain of Makhneh, the deep well wh. unanimous tradition identifies as Jacob's Well (Jn. 4.[6]).

The mod. city has a population of over 20,000, mainly Moslems. The Samaritan community, now confined solely to Nāblus, number from 150 to 200 souls. There are 700 to 800 Christians, nearly all belonging to the Greek Church, with a few Latins and Protestants. The Church Missionary Society have here an excellent hospital. Nāblus is an important market town, and is greatly resorted to from the east of the Jordan. It does a considerable trade in cotton and wool. It has also many soap factories, which use great quantities of olive oil.

The city is now probably further west than in ancient times. It lies on the S. of the vale, under the cliffs of Gerizim. From the base of that mountain issue abundant supplies of water, which, flowing westward, fill the valley with beauty and fruitfulness. See illustration, p. 540.

SHECHEM. (1) Son of Hamor, whose love for Dina, the dr. of Jacob, brought such dire consequences upon himself and his people (Gn. 34.); see Jacob. (2) Ancestor of a Manassite clan (Nu. 26.[31]; Jo. 17.[2]), called Shechemites.

SHEDEUR, father of Elizur, chief of the tribe of Reuben (Nu. 1.[5], 2.[10], &c.).

SHEEP GATE. See Jerusalem.

SHEEP (Heb. kebes and keseb, properly "lamb"; tzō'n, collective "flock," general term "sheep"; 'ayil, "a ram"; rāḥēl, a "ewe"), the common domestic animal, one of the earliest of animals to be domesticated and so become property; this naturally meant that they shd. be most frequently used for feasts, as still in the E., and hence for sacrifice; the majority of the Levitical sacrifices were sheep or lambs. The species most common in Pal. is the fat-tailed S. (Ovis laticaudata); in this species the tail is enclosed in a cushion of fat fm. wh. the last joints

* The name by wh. it was then known, Mabortha, is the Aram. form of the Heb. ma'bārā, "pass," or "saddle"; cp. Is. 10.[29] (B.J. IV. viii. 1).

of the tail protrude like a claw. This fat is regarded as peculiarly delicate, hence, it may be, the special prominence given to the "rump" (tail) of the S. in sacrifice. The word ('alyāh) for the tail of the S. is different in Heb. fm. that for the tail of any other animal; the Arabic word to-day differs fm. this only in the vowels. S. are still fed on the hills of Pal.; as a rule the flocks are not so large as with us. Very common is it to see S. and GOATS forming one flock, guarded by a shepherd without the help of a dog. In Pal. the shepherd does not drive his S.; he goes before them, and summons them to follow him by a peculiar cry. The relation between the shepherd and his S. is more kindly than with us; sometimes even the shepherd names individual S. Timid, and on the whole not well qualified to defend itself, besides being rather deficient in power of recognising localities, the S. is very liable to go astray; a fact referred to both in the OT. and the NT. For the symbolic references see LAMB.

PALESTINIAN SHEEP WITH BROAD TAIL

SHEERAH. See SHERAH.

SHEHARIAH, son of Jeroham, a Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.[26]).

SHEKEL (Heb. sheqel), a weight, and a money of account; as a weight it was probably fm. ¼ oz. to ½ oz.; as a money probably in value fm. 2s. 6d. to 5s. See MONEY, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

SHEKINAH (shĕkīnāh, from shākēn, "to dwell"). This expression occurs frequently in the Targums and Talmud, and signifies the Divine presence. It owed its origin to the course of Jewish Rabbinical thought after OT. times. In the OT. the monotheistic idea is seen growing in its range and depth. The conception of Jehovah is becoming broader and more august. Rabbinic thought continued to develop on this line, while the influx of Greek philosophical ideas contributed to make the conception of God more abstract. Thus the personal, self-revealing God of the OT. was resolved into a metaphysical abstraction in which infinitude eclipsed all attributes. God was conceived as the Infinite, of whom nothing could be predicated, since every quality implied a limitation (cp. Spinoza, determinatio negatio est). At the same time passionate devotion to the OT., and absolute respect for its authority, demanded some rendering of its constant, familiar, and anthropomorphic references to God. A system of mediators, more or less indefinitely conceived, was created, which, though essentially Divine, could be separated in thought from God, and were sufficiently limited to enter into relations with humanity. Of these were the Spirit, the Word, the Metatron, the Shekinah, and in a lower degree the Bath Qol and the Adam Qadmon. These really represented God, but by their means predication about God was formally avoided. The following are typical examples of the usage. Concerning the words, "But ye that did cleave unto the Lord your God are alive every one of you this day" (Dt. 4.[4]) it was asked, "Is it then possible to cleave to the Shekinah? Is it not said, 'For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire (Dt. 4.[24])'?" Again it was said, "A judge who does not adjudicate according to true equity causeth the Shekinah to depart from Israel; for it is said, 'On account of the oppression of the poor now will I arise (i.e. depart), saith the Lord (Ps. 12.[5]).'" They would not even attribute to God residence in heaven. Thus they render "He dwelleth on high" by "He hath placed his Shekinah in the lofty heaven."

The original conception out of which the Shekinah-idea grew was the presence of the Lord in the Holy of Holies in the Tabernacle, as indicated by the cloud resting upon it and enveloping the manifestation of God, which was thought of as the light behind the cloud. Even the light was not the Deity but His effulgence. But on account of its subtlety the thought remained vague and undefined. Whilst in the Targums the Shekinah "does not indicate the radiance or brilliancy, but the central cause of the radiance," being "the equivalent for the Divine Being, not for His glory" (Marshal in HDB.), it was often alluded to as itself visible and a radiance or glory. Thus again, although the essential significance lay in its identification with Divinity, Nachmanides had to reprove Rabbis who described it as a "glory created" by God.

The expression does not occur at all in the OT., the idea not having been developed at the time, and, while the thought is commonly regarded as contained in the word δόξα (glory) in Rm. 9.[4]; He. 1.[3] 9.[5]; 2 P. 1.[17], &c., it is open to question whether the actual Shekinah-idea is here present. The NT. view of God is not that of the later rabbis, which required and produced the Shekinah-doctrine. It is not impossible that in the use of σκηνὴ (tabernacle) in Rv. 21.[3] there is a play on the word Shekinah. G. P. WALLACE.

SHELAH. (1) Youngest son of Judah by the Canaanite Shuah (Gn. 38.[5], &c.). From him sprang the Shelanites (Nu. 26.[20]). (2) Son of Arphaxad (Gn. 10.[24], 11.[12ff.], AV. "Salah"; 1 Ch. 1.[18, 24]; Lk. 3.[35], "Sala"). (3) Siloam, RV. "Shelah" (Ne. 3.[15]).

SHELEMIAH. (1) A Levite, gatekeeper in the Tabernacle (1 Ch. 26.[14]), called "Meshelemiah" in 1 Ch. 9.[21], 26.[1]; "Shelemiah," 26.[14]; "Shallum," 9.[17, 19, 31]; "Meshullam," Ne. 12.[25]. (2) and (3) Sons of Bani, who had married foreign wives (Ez. 10.[39, 41]), called "Selemias" in 1 Es. 9.[34]. (4) Father of Hananiah (Ne. 3.[30]). (5) A priest having charge of the treasury (Ne. 13.[13]). (6) Son of Cushi, ancestor of Jehudi (Jr. 36.[14]). (7) Son of Abdeel (Jr. 36.[26]). (8) Father of Jehucal (Jr. 37.[3], 38.[1]). (9) Father of Irijah (Jr. 37.[13]).

SHELEPH, second son of Joktan (Gn. 10.[26]; 1 Ch. 1.[20]), ancestor of a South Arabian tribe, not identified.

SHELESH, son of Helem, an Asherite (1 Ch. 7.[35]).

SHELOMI, father of Abihud, prince of Asher (Nu. 34.[27]).

SHELOMITH. (1) A woman of the tribe of Dan whose son was stoned in the wilderness for blaspheming "the name" (Lv. 24.[10ff.]). (2) Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.[19]). (3) A Kohathite Levite, son of Izhar (1 Ch. 23.[18]), called "Shelomoth" in 24.[22]. (4) A descendant of Eliezer (1 Ch. 24.[28]). (5) A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch. 23.[9], RV. "Shelomoth"). (6) A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[20]). (7) Ancestor of a family which returned with Ezra (Ez. 8.[10]).

SHELOMOTH. See SHELOMITH (3) and (5).

SHELUMIEL, son of Zurishaddai, prince of Simeon (Nu. 1.[6], 2.[12], &c.), called "Samael" in Jth. 8.[1].

SHEM, the first mentioned, and therefore probably the eldest son of NOAH, the ancestor of ABRAHAM. S. with JAPHETH his br. covered their fr. when he was lying uncovered in his tent, and hence received a blessing fm. Noah (Gn. 9.[23, 26, 27]). The Talmudists wd. identify MELCHIZEDEK with S. in order to explain the honour given by their ancestor to the priest-king; accdg. to the received chronology S. and Abraham were contemporaries for 148 yrs. The territory occupied by the descendants of S. coincides on the whole with SW. Asia.

In Gn. 10.[21] AV. makes JAPHETH the eldest s. of Noah; although this has the support of the LXX and the Tgg., still the natural tr. of the Heb. is "S. the elder br. of Japheth"; only it is difficult to understand why Japheth shd. be placed in such prominence.

SHEMA. (1) A city in the south of Judah, named with Amam and Moladah (Jo. 15.[26]). Some would identify it with SHEBA, wh. see. (2) This is prob. identical with (1), "son of," i.e. founded by Hebron (1 Ch. 2.[43f.]). (3) A Reubenite (1 Ch. 5.[8]). (4) A Benjamite chief of Aijalon (1 Ch. 8.[13]). (5) One who stood by Ezra at the reading of the law (Ne. 8.[4]), called "Sammus" in 1 Es. 9.[43].

SHEMAAH, a Benjamite of Gibeah, whose two sons joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[3]).

SHEMAIAH. Of the many persons thus named in OT. we need mention only the following: (1) S., described as "the man of God," who dissuaded Rehoboam fm. his projected campaign agst. Isr. (1 K. 12.[22ff.]). He rendered invaluable service by his counsel at the time of Shishak's invasion, and appears to have written an account of Rehoboam's reign (2 Ch. 12.[5, 7, 15]). (2) A prophet, described as "the Nehelamite," who had been carried into captivity with Jehoiachin. He belonged to the party opposed to Jeremiah, who believed that the captivity would be of short duration. Jeremiah wrote to the exiles urging them to build houses, plant gardens, marry, and rear families, seeking the peace of the city in wh. they were settled; and warning them against the false prophets among them, who held out delusive hopes of a swift return. This roused the ire of S., who wrote complaining that the priests had failed to do their duty, inasmuch as they had not put the mad prophet from Anathoth "in the stocks and in shackles." Jeremiah in reply denounced agst. him, not only his own death in exile, but the extirpation of his seed (Jr. 29.[24, 31f.]). (3) A man "hired" by Tobiah and Sanballat, who, under the guise of anxiety for his safety, advised Nehemiah to take refuge in the Temple (Ne. 6.[10]). This advice, if followed, wd. have destroyed all confidence in the governor's courage, while his sacrilegious resort to the Temple wd. have brought him into collision with the priests. Of some note also were: (4) S., who assisted in bringing up the ark fm. the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 15.[8, 11]). (5) S., the son of Nathaneel the scribe, who acted as recorder of the priestly courses (1 Ch. 24.[6]). (6) S., son of Obed-edom, a Levite doorkeeper in the Tabernacle (1 Ch. 26.[4, 6, 7]). (7) S., the priest who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[8], &c.), and (8) S., fr. of Uriah (Jr. 26.[20]).

SHEMARIAH. (1) A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[5]). (2) Son of Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[19]). (3) One who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[32]). (4) One of the sons of Bani who had done the same (Ez. 10.[41]).

SHEMEBER, king of ZEBOIIM, ally of the king of Sodom (Gn. 14.[2]).

SHEMED. See SHAMED.

SHEMER, owner of the hill purchased by Omri as the site of his new capital (1 K. 16.[24]).

SHEMIDA, SHEMIDAH, son of Gilead, grandson of Manasseh (Nu. 26.[32]; Jo. 17.[2]; 1 Ch. 7.[19]). His descendants are called Shemidaites (Nu. 26.[32]).

SHEMIRAMOTH. (1) A Levite musician (1 Ch. 15.[18, 20], 16.[5]). (2) A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (2 Ch. 17.[8]).

SHEMUEL. (1) The chief of Simeon who represented the tribe at the allotment of the land (Nu. 34.[20]). (2) Samuel the prophet (1 Ch. 6.[33]). (3) One of the chiefs of Issachar (1 Ch. 7.[2]).

SHEN is named in 1 S. 7.[12] as defining the position of the stone EBENEZER, set up by Samuel to commemorate the defeat of the Phil. Perhaps we shd. read with LXX and Syr. "Yeshana," wh. may be identified with 'Ain Sinia, to the N. of Bethel.

SHENAZAR, RV. SHENAZZAR, a descendant of Jehoiakim (1 Ch. 3.[18]). See SHESHBAZZAR.

SHEOL, the place of the dead. See HELL.

SHEPHAM, a city on the E. boundary of the promised land, apparently in the neighbourhood of RIBLAH (Nu. 34.[10f.]). It is unidentd. Poss. it was the home of Zabdi the Shiphmite (1 Ch. 27.[27]).

SHEPHATIAH. (1) Son of David (2 S. 3.[4], &c.). (2) A Benjamite (1 Ch. 9.[8], AV. SHEPHATHIAH). (3) A Benjamite soldier who went to David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[5]). (4) Prince of Simeon in David's time (1 Ch. 27.[16]). (5) Son of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 21.[2]). (6) One whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ez. 2.[4], 8.[8]; Ne. 7.[9]), called "Saphat" in 1 Es. 5.[9] and "Saphatias" in 8.[34]. (7) A family of "the sons of Solomon's servants," who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[57]; Ne. 7.[59]), called "Saphuthi" in 1 Es. 5.[33] RV. (8) A descendant of Pharez (Ne. 11.[4]). (9) Son of Mattan, a prince of Judah (Jr. 38.[1]).

SHEPHELAH. This Heb. word, shĕphēlāh, is represented in AV. by "vale" (Dt. 1.[7]; Jo. 10.[40]; 1 K. 10.[27]; 2 Ch. 1.[15]; Jr. 33.[13]), "valley" (Jo. 9.[1], 11.[2, 16], 12.[8], 15.[33]; Jg. 1.[9]; Jr. 32.[44]), "low plains" (1 Ch. 27.[28]; 2 Ch. 9.[27]), "plain" (Jr. 17.[26]; O. [19]; Zc. 7.[7]), and "low country" (2 Ch. 28.[18]). RV. uniformly "low land." It might have been well to retain the Heb. word, wh. always occurs with the article. It clearly attached to a well-known division of the country. The cities mentioned in the lists as lying within the Shephelah, are all, so far as their sites have been identified, included within a region with boundaries sufficiently marked to justify a special name. With the assistance of the excellent "Survey of W. Pal.," carried out by the officers of the PEF., these boundaries are easily recognised. Between the maritime plain and the mountains of the central range there runs a strip of lower hilly country. It is separated fm. the central range by a series of valleys wh., beginning at the NW. of the lower Beth-horon (Beit 'Ur et-Taḥta), run southward to the neighbourhood of Beersheba.

"The mountains look on the Shephelah, and the Shephelah looks on the sea—across the Philistine plain. It curves round this plain fm. Gaza to Jaffa like an amphitheatre. But the amphitheatre is cut by three or four great gaps, wide valleys that come right through from the foot of the Judæan hills to the sea. Between these gaps the low hills gather in clumps and in short ranges from 500 to 800 feet high, with one or two summits up to 1500. The formation is of limestone or chalk, and very soft—therefore irregular and almost featureless, with a few prominent outposts upon the plain" (HGHL.[1] 207f.). There are great breadths of fine corn-land, and the olive groves are excellent.

Five valleys break through the Shephelah and penetrate the mountain inland, each furnishing an approach to the central uplands. (1) The valley of Aijalon, leading by way of the Beth-horon and Gibeon to Michmash. (2) Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār, going up by Beth-shemesh and Kirjath-Jearim to Jerusalem—the line followed by the railway. (3) Wādy es-Sunṭ, running fm. Tell eṣ-Ṣāfi (Gath ?), up the vale of Elah, to where Wādy eṣ-Ṣūr branches southward, and Wādy el-Jindy climbs towards Bethlehem. (4) Wādy el-Afranj, starting fm. Ashdod, passes Beit Jibrīn (Eleutheropolis), and ascends towards Hebron. (5) Wādy el-Ḥesy runs fm. the sea c. seven miles N. of Gaza, by way of Lachish, issuing in the mountain c. six miles SW. of Hebron. For the part played by these great valleys in the chequered history of the land see a full and admirable discussion in HGHL.[1] 209ff.

SHEPHI, SHEPHO, son of Shobal, a Horite chief (Gn. 36.[23], &c.).

SHEPHUPHAN (1 Ch. 8.[5]), SHEPHUPHAM (Nu. 26.[39] RV.), the ancestor of the Shuphamites (Nu. 26.[39]), a family of Benjamin.

SHERAH, RV. SHEERAH, daughter of Ephraim, who founded the Beth-horons, and a town, not identified, called "Uzzen-sherah," i.e. "portion" of Sherah (1 Ch. 7.[24]).

SHEREBIAH. A Levite who joined Ezra at the Ahava (Ez. 8.[18, 24]; Ne. 8.[7], 9.[4], 10.[12], 12.[8, 24]), called "Asebebia" in 1 Es. 8.[47]; "Esebrias," v. 54, and "Sarabias," 9.[48].

SHERESH. A Manassite, son of Machir (1 Ch. 7.[16]).

SHEREZER. See SHAREZER.

SHERIFF (Heb. tiphtāyē', Dn. 3.[2, 3]). "Sheriffs" were officials in the court of Babylon whose functions it is impossible to determine. The text is corrupt here, as none of the VV. agree precisely with MT.; in the Peshiṭtā the last four names appear as if they were tribal names, S. being Tabathæi, tribes of whose existence we have no sign elsewhere. A good deal may be said for Gesenius' derivation fm. afta, a verb found in Arabic, meaning "to issue a legal decision," whence is derived the official title "mufti."

SHESHACH (Jr. 25.[26], 51.[41]), a name given to BABYLON, as proved by the parallelism of the second passage. It is supposed to be derived fm. Babel by Atbash, i.e. the last letter of the Heb. alphabet was put for the first, and the second last for the second, and so on. Delitzsch has suggested that S. stands for Shish-ku-ki, a name that represents a quarter of Babylon in an ancient regal register (Parad. 214): Schrader objects that this name does not occur in later Bab. inscriptions. But poetic names are often revivals of ancient: e.g. Albion is a not uncommon designation for Britain on the continent of Europe, but is practically unused in Britain or America. One has a suspicion of cryptograms as early as the days of Jeremiah.

SHESHAI, a clan of the sons of Anak, driven out of Hebron by Caleb (Nu. 13.^{22}; Jo. 15.^{14}; Jg. 1.^{10}).

SHESHAN, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2.^{31}, &c.).

SHESHBAZZAR (Ez. 1.$^{8, 11}$, 5.$^{14, 16}$), "the prince of Judah" to whom MITHREDATH, at the order of CYRUS, delivered the treasures of the Lord's house. It has been maintained that S. is another name for ZERUBBABEL, but there is no statement to that effect to be found in the narrative, as we shd. expect. As a Bab. name it is prob. corrupt, hence the many forms it assumes in the VV. The most likely suggestion is that S. is ident. with Shenazar (1 Ch. 3.^{18}); S. wd. then be the uncle of Zerubbabel.

SHETH. (1) The patriarch Seth (1 Ch. 1.^{1}, AV. "Sheth"). (2) In Nu. 24.^{17} for "sons of Sheth," read with RV. "sons of tumult."

SHETHAR-BOZNAI, RV. S.-BOZENAI, "companion" of TATTENAI, Persian governor of Syria (Ez. 5.$^{3, 6}$), called "Sathrabuzanes" in 1 Es. 6.^{3}, &c.

SHEVA. (1) Son of Caleb (1 Ch. 2.^{49}). (2) David's secretary (2 S. 20.^{25}). See SHAVSHA.

SHEWBREAD (Heb. leḥem happānim, "bread of the face," Ex. 25.^{30}; leḥem hamma'ăreketh, "bread of the pile," or "arrangement," 1 Ch. 9.^{32}; leḥem qōdesh, "holy bread," 1 S. 21.^{6}, &c.). Close by the veil that separated the Holy Place from the Most Holy stood a gold-covered table, on wh. were placed two heaps of loaves, six in each pile. In Lv. 24.$^{5-9}$ an account is given of the method of preparing these "cakes." Each is to be made of a fifth of an ephah of fine flour: though it is not said that the cakes are to be unleavened, the presumption is that they were so. On the top of each pile frankincense was set, in sign of consecration. Jos. says the frankincense was in golden vials. Taken fresh fm. the oven on the eve of the Sabbath, they were placed on the table overlaid with gold, and there they remained until they were replaced by the new batch immediately before sunset on the following Friday. The priests were required to eat the newly removed cakes in the Holy Place. While these cakes were offered by the worshippers, as an acknowledgment of Divine supremacy, they were also the symbol of Divine beneficence: His table was spread ready for guests.

The Table of Shewbread.—It was made of shittim wood and overlaid with pure gold, its length two cubits, its breadth one, and its height one and a half; there was a rim of gold round it, and four gold rings for the insertion of staves overlaid with gold to carry it. At the same time there were vessels, covers, spoons, dishes, bowls; these appear to be symbolic of feasting (Ex. 25.$^{23-30}$, 37.$^{10-16}$). Jos. gives a careful account of the T. of S. in terms that imply that he had seen it (Ant. III. vi. 6).

Prof. Kennedy (HDB.) argues fm. the action of AHIMELECH with David that restriction of the S. to the priests was later, and that purity fm. sexual intercourse was all the qualification required. But the attitude of the High Priest is that of one who makes a concession to the necessities of David and those who were with him. A parallel instance may be given; in 1897 the Bishop of Salisbury visited the Hither East. When he reached Baalbek the lady at the head of the British Syrian School there thought it an excellent opportunity to have Holy Communion. The bishop was willing, but a difficulty emerged: some of those who taught in the school, natives, were converts of the American Mission, and Presbyterians; hence they had not been confirmed. At first the bishop was nonplussed: then he suggested a compromise. He wd. admit them provided they came fasting. This was simply a compromise for the one occasion, and not to be used as precedent; the one restriction kept up the idea of concession and compromise.

SHIBAH = SHEBAH, wh. see.

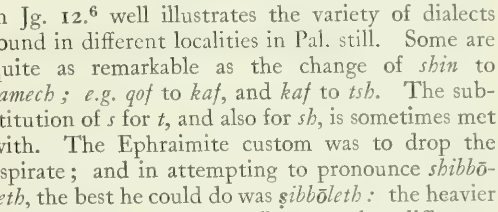
SHIBBOLETH. The Heb. word shibbōleth, "ear of corn," and also "stream," or "flood," would be in common use. The incident recorded in Jg. 12.^{6} well illustrates the variety of dialects found in different localities in Pal. still. Some are quite as remarkable as the change of shin to samech; e.g. qof to kaf, and kaf to tsh. The substitution of s for t, and also for sh, is sometimes met with. The Ephraimite custom was to drop the aspirate; and in attempting to pronounce shibbōleth, the best he could do was ṣibbōleth: the heavier sibilant prob. indicates an effort to make a difference between sh and s. The mistake betrayed the Ephraimite's tribe, and sealed his fate.

SHIBMA, SIBMA, a city in Reuben (Nu. 32.^{38}), prob. the same as SHEBMA.

SHICRON, RV. SHIKKERON, a place on the N. border of Judah, named with Ekron, Mount Baalah, and Jabneel (Jo. 15.^{11}). Khirbet Sukreir, c. four miles SW. of Yebnah (Jabneel), seems off the line indicated.



SHOWING HANDLE OF SHIELD

SHIELD. There are several words trd. S., but incorrectly, or at all events with doubtful accuracy; there are, however, two wh. refer to different sizes. (1) Māgēn (Jg. 5.^{8}, &c.), the small round shield (Gr. aspis): it was probably made of wicker or wood, and had leather stretched over it. The Egyptian small S. had often a round top and square below. (2) Tzinnāh: a large S. covering the whole body. Sometimes a warrior had one to bear his S. before him (1 S. 17.[7]). These large shields appear to have been used in sieges. See Arms and Armour.

Concave Shield

SHIHON (RV. correctly SHION, Heb. shī'ōn), a city in Issachar named with Shunem, Haphraim, and Anaharath. It is prob. represented by the mod. Khirbet Sha'īn, near 'Ain esh-Sha'īn, c. four miles NW. of Tabor (Jo. 19.[19]).

SHIHOR, SIHOR, means prob. "black river." In Jo. 13.[3]; 1 Ch. 13.[5], it marks the S. boundary of the land of Israel, and corresponds with the River of Egypt in 1 K. 8.[65]. This must be identified with Wādy el-'Arīsh, to the S. of Gaza. In Is. 23.[3]; Jr. 2.[18], the reference is evidently to Egypt. "The Black River" is a name that wd. fitly apply to the Nile, or to one of its branches. Brugsch has pointed out that Shi-Hor, "Horus Canal," was the Egyptian name of the canal wh. passed the border city of Zar. Cheyne (EB. s.v.) finds in the name a variant of Jerahmeel.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH is mentioned as on the S. border of the territory of Asher, apparently south of Carmel (Jo. 19.[26]). OEJ. finds here the names of two cities; of these, however, no trace has been discovered. Shihor-Libnath is usually identified with the stream Nahr ez-Zerqā, wh. enters the sea immediately S. of Carmel. It is ident. with the Crocodile River (Pliny, v. 19), and Wilson (HDB.) suggests that it may have been named "Shihor" by those who knew the Nile—one of the names of wh. was Shihor—as the great Crocodile River. These creatures are still found in this stream.

Grasping a Spear while Supporting the Shield

SHILHI. Father of Asa's wife Azubah (1 K. 22.[42]; 2 Ch. 20.[31]).

SHILHIM, a town to the south of Judah (Jo. 15.[32]), probably identical with Shaaraim (2).

SHILLEM, son of Naphtali (Gn. 46.[24]), ancestor of the Shillemites (Nu. 26.[49]).

SHILOAH. Accdg. to 2 K. 20.[20]; 2 Ch. 32.[30]; Sr. 48.[17], Hezekiah made a conduit to bring the water of Gihon within the walls of Jrs. This was no mere channel, wh. wd. not have been a notable work, but as even Sr. indicates, a tunnel, dug through the rock. Such a tunnel still leads the water fm. the "spring of the stairs" to the SE. foot of the south-east hill. In the form of an S, its total length is 1760 ft., the distance fm. the spring to the end of the tunnel being only 1685 ft. It is on an average 4 ft. in height, and 2 ft. in breadth. An inscr. in old Heb. characters found in 1880 near the issue, gives the length as 1200 cubits, and informs us that the work was begun at both ends, and finished when the workmen met in the midst. The level shows no fall, so that the water cd. run off through the tunnel only when it stood high enough at the spring. Evidently the intention was to keep a store of water at this place, and only to lead off the overflow by the tunnel.

The Pool of Siloam

A second conduit has been discovered, running round the hill, partly through the rock. This must be older than the first-named. The water in this conduit may be intended by "the waters of Shiloah that go softly" (Is. 8.[6]), if the phrase really belongs to the time of Ahaz. It might also apply to the water in the tunnel.

The name "Spring of Siloa," or simply "the Siloa," we find connected with the issue of the tunnel (BJ. V. iv. 1, 2; vi. 1; ix. 4, &c.), wh. is still called "the Spring of Silwān."

The water of the tunnel now runs through a small pond, Birket Silwān, and along a rock-cut channel to the dyke wh. closes the Cheesemakers' Valley, where it is led off in two directions, to irrigate the vegetable gardens in the Kidron Valley. The excavations of Guthe and Bliss showed that Birket Silwān is only part of a square pool, the "pool of Siloa" of Byzantine times, and prob. the "pool of Siloam" of Jn. 9.[7]. The level seems to have been only 1 ft. below that of the tunnel. It was therefore not used for storage, but only to provide water for purposes of washing and bathing. The smaller basin found by Guthe to the E. of the pool was 4 ft. deeper, and mt. serve as a reservoir whence to draw water, but could by no means contain sufficient to supply the city in time of siege. The pool named in 2 K. 20.[20], Sr. 48.[17], as made by Hezekiah, cannot, therefore, have been at the issue of the tunnel.

Accdg. to Is. 22.[11], "a reservoir" (AV. "ditch") was made "between the two walls for the water of the old pool"; and a gloss (Is. 22.[9]) speaks of the gathering of the water of the lower pool. A certain part of the city wall is "the wall of the pool of Shiloah" (Ne. 3.[15], RV. "Shelah," read "Shiloah"). The pool of Hezekiah, prob. called the pool of Solomon by Jos. (BJ. V. iv. 2), must have been adjacent to the strong wall, excavated by Bliss, wh. closes the S. end of the Cheesemakers' Valley. Its actual extent is not known. The long, narrow tank once existing between the wall mentioned above, and another wall parallel to it, may have been part of the larger reservoir constructed by Hezekiah. This, wh. cd. hardly be filled fm. the spring of Gihon, "gathered" the waters of a second pool—the "old pool" as compared with Hezekiah's new one, and the "lower pool" as distinguished from the "upper pool" of Is. 7.[3] (see JERUSALEM). The "old pool," wh. must have been higher up in the same valley, may have been the predecessor of the present Birket Silwān, or another pool not known to us. The new pool more completely served the purpose of gathering the rain water wh. flowed down the valley in winter, and certainly also retained the water coming from the tunnel when this was in existence.

The tower in Siloam (Lk. 13.[4]) prob. belonged to the fortification of the SE. hill, in the vicinity of the pool. G. H. DALMAN.

SHILOH, a city in the territory of Ephraim where, at the conclusion of the war of conquest, the congregation of the children of Israel assembled and set up the Tabernacle (Jo. 18.[1]). Land was assigned by lot to the seven tribes that had not yet received their portions, the unappropriated land having been marked out into seven parts by surveyors sent out for the purpose (v. 9). To the Levites were allotted cities with their suburbs in all the tribal portions, and the Cities of Refuge on both sides of the Jordan were appointed (chaps. 18.–21.). On their way to their territories east of Jordan, Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh aroused the suspicion of the other tribes by building a great altar in the Jordan valley. The congregation again assembled at S., and received satisfactory explanations (22.). S. continued to be the central sanctuary of Isr. during the period of the Judges (18.[31]), apparently the seat of a permanent camp (21.[12]), and the scene of festivals and pilgrimages (21.[19]; 1 S. 1.[3]). Hither the captive maidens from Jabesh-Gilead were brought for the Benjamites; and here, on the occasion of a festival, these tribesmen were allowed to make up their full complement of wives by capturing the maidens who danced among the vineyards (Jg. 21.[19ff.]). In the sanctuary at S. the boy Samuel grew to manhood under the supervision of the High Priest Eli. In his time it appears that a building (hēkāl, "a temple") had taken the place of the ancient tent. Hence the ark was carried to the strife with the Phil., and here Eli died, overwhelmed by the disastrous news from the field of battle. It seems probable that the Phil. took the city and overthrew the Temple. That it was destroyed is certain (Jr. 7.[12, 14], 26.[6, 9]), and God is said to have deserted the Tabernacle there (Ps. 78.[60]). The descendants of Eli in the time of Saul are found, not in Shiloh, but at Nob (1 S. 14.[3], 22.[11]). Shiloh was the home of the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite, and here he was visited by the wife of Jeroboam I. (1 K. 14.[2, 4]). Certain of the pilgrims deceived and murdered by Ishmael, son of Nethaniah, came fm. S. (Jr. 41.[5]).

SHILOH: RUINS

Shiloh is now represented by Seilūn, two miles NE. of Sinjil, three miles SE. of Khān el-Lubbān (Lebonah), and nine miles N. of Bethel (Beitīn). The position agrees fully with that indicated in Jg. 21.[19]. It is approached by a path wh. at Sinjil leaves the main road to Shechem, runs eastward to Turmus 'Aya, and then turns northward across a small plain, on the N. edge of wh. rises the hill on wh. lie the ruins of Seilūn. The hill is cut off from the mountain to the N. by a deep valley, in the sides of wh. many rock-cut sepulchres have been found. In the head of the valley three-quarters of a mile to the E. there is an excellent spring. In ancient times the vineyards prob. covered the adjoining slopes. The ruins are mainly of comparatively modern houses. An old mosque stands at the foot of the hill, and a little to the SE. a building wh. may have been a synagogue. To the north of the ruins on the hill is a terrace with a quadrangle some 800 ft. in length from E. to W. and 400 ft. in breadth, cut in the rock. This may have been the site of the ancient sanctuary.

Natives of S. were AHIJAH the Shilonite (the ancient name Shilōn, wh. appears in this, is preserved in the mod. Seilūn), and a family who, after the Exile, lived in Jrs. (1 Ch. 9.[5]; Ne. 11.[5]); unless, indeed, the true reading in these two passages shd. be "Shelanite," tracing descent from Shelah, son of Judah (Nu. 26.[20]).

SHILOH: SITE OF ANCIENT SANCTUARY (?)

A good description is given in Conder's Tent Work in Palestine, pp. 44ff.

SHILOH. The passage in Gn. 49.[10] is one of admitted difficulty. No certain interpretation can be given of the phrase "until Shiloh come." Some have thought that it is a name used for the Messiah. In that case it would have conveyed some definite meaning: this, if it were ever known, seems to have utterly perished. The ancient versions have not so read it. The Targums, however (Tgg. O., Jrs., and PJ.), find here a reference to the Messiah. According to one interpretation, S. is the name of the town (see preceding article). It is proposed to read "till he come to Shiloh." This does no violence to the grammar. It assumes that Judah held the leadership in the desert wanderings, and until, at the completion of the Conquest, Israel assembled at Shiloh. The people, united till then, went away to their separate districts, and the leadership was resigned. There is nothing, however, to show that Judah exercised any such leadership. The commanders of the people did not belong to that tribe. Shēbeṭ, "sceptre," would hardly be used of such shadowy tribal authority. Others take Shiloh as a compound word meaning (a) "that wh. is his," or (b) "whose it is." In accordance with (a) LXX reads "till the things reserved for him shall come." Agreeing with (b) the Psh. reads, "until he shall come whose it is," i.e. to whom the kingdom belongs.

That the passage is Messianic in character is obvious; and on any of these interpretations it points to a time when the power exercised by Judah shall be wielded by a nobler hand.

SHILONITE. See preceding art.

SHILSHAH, an Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Ch. 7.[37]).

SHIMEA. (1) Son of David by Bathsheba (1 Ch. 3.[5]), called "Shammua" in 2 S. 5.[14]; 1 Ch. 14.[4]. (2) A Merarite Levite (1 Ch. 6.[30]). (3) A Gershonite, ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch. 6.[39]). (4) Brother of David (1 Ch. 20.[7]), called "Shammah" in 1 S. 16.[9]; Shimeah in 2 S. 13.[3]; and Shimei in 2 S. 21.[21].

SHIMEAH. (1) Brother of David (see preceding art.). (2) A descendant of Jehiel (1 Ch. 8.[32]), called "Shimeam" in 9.[38].

SHIMEAM. See SHIMEAH (2).

SHIMEATH, the Ammonitess, whose son Zabad (2 Ch. 24.[26]), or Jozachar (2 K. 12.[21]), took part in the murder of king Joash. The text is in confusion. Speculative emendations are of little value.

SHIMEI. This is a name borne by many persons in the OT. The following are worthy of note: (1) Son of Gershon the son of Levi, ancestor of the family of Shimites (Ex. 6.[17], &c.; Nu. 3.[21]). (2) Son of Gera, a Benjamite, and clearly a partisan of the house of Saul. Doubtless regarding David as a usurper, he rejoiced in the apparent success of Absalom's rebellion, and, exulting in the king's misfortune, cursed and insulted him in his flight from Jerusalem. His unchivalrous soul in its bitter hatred forgot the possibility of the monarch's victorious return. When that happened he was found in abject fear at David's feet, begging pardon, which was not refused, for the time at least, despite the advice of Abishai (2 S. 16.[5-13], 19.[18-23]). It was reserved for Solomon to order the penalty he so richly deserved (1 K. 2.[44ff.]). Condemned by Solomon to confine himself within the walls of Jrs., he lived in semi-imprisonment for three years. At the end of that time two of his servants escaped to Gath. He ventured to follow them to bring them back. Then his doom fell (1 K. 2.[36-46]). (3) One of David's officers whom Adonijah failed to attract (1 K. 1.[8]). He was prob. ident. with S., son of Ela, Solomon's commissariat officer in Benjamin (1 K. 4.[18]). (4) Son of Heman, one of the Levites who took part in cleansing the house of the Lord under Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29.[14]). The same man is possibly referred to in 2 Ch. 31.[12f.] as having charge of "the oblations and tithes, and dedicated things" wh. were stored in the chambers prepared for them in the house of the Lord.

SHIMEON, one of the family of Harim, who married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[31]), called "Simon Chosameus" in 1 Es. 9.[32].

SHIMHI, RV. SHIMEI, a Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.[21]) called "Shema" in v. 13.

SHIMON, a Judahite (1 Ch. 4.[20]).

SHIMRATH, a Benjamite, son of Shimhi (1 Ch. 8.[21]).

SHIMRI. (1) A Simeonite, son of Shemaiah (1 Ch. 4.[37]). (2) Father of one of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 11.[45]). (3) A Kohathite Levite who assisted in purifying the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29.[13]).

SHIMRITH, the Moabitess, named in 2 Ch. 24.[26], as the mr. of Jehozabad, one of the murderers of Joash. The text is corrupt.

SHIMRON. (1) Fourth son of Issachar (Gn. 46.[13], &c.), ancestor of the family of Shimronites (Nu. 26.[24]). (2) A city whose king was called out by Jabin to his assistance agst. Joshua (Jo. 11.[1]). It was allotted to Zebulun (19.[15]), and may possibly be represented by the mod. es-Semeirīyeh, about three miles N. of Acre.

SHIMRON-MERON, a Canaanitish city whose king was slain by Joshua (12.[20]). In the list his name is followed by that of the king of Achshaph. This points to the district in wh. we sought for SHIMRON, with wh. it is prob. identical. The name of Samsimuruna appears in inscriptions of Sennacherib, and other Assyrian kings. This Schrader identifies with Shimron-Meron, wh. he places at es-Semeirīyeh.

SHIMSHAI, the secretary of REHUM (Ez. 4.[8f.], &c.), called "Semellius" in 1 Es. 2.[16].

SHINAB, king of Admah, one of the five kings attacked by Chedorlaomer (Gn. 14.[2]).

SHINAR, the OT. name of BABYLONIA. Sometimes it is thought to be derived fm. Sumir, wh. with Akkad represented the whole province. Hommel wd. derive fm. Ki-Imgir, another term for the same region (HDB. 224b). The derivation is uncertain; but the name seems to have denoted the whole of Babylonia (Gn. 10.[10], &c.).

SHION. See SHIHON.

SHIP, BOAT, GALLEY. The Israelites were never a people who did business in the great waters. The representation of the ark as a great wooden house, without sail or rudder, designed merely to float, was possible only among a people unacquainted with navigation. The coast line of the Promised Land was not adapted to promote naval enterprise. The absence of good harbours and shelter for shipping has always been a drawback. The northern part, where the best facilities are found, was in the hands of the Phœnicians, while that from Jaffa southward was held by the Phil. Zebulun dwells at the haven of the sea (Gn. 49.[13]). Dan is reproached by Deborah for remaining in ships, and Asher for sitting still at the haven of the sea (Jg. 5.[17]). To what extent these tribes engaged in traffic by sea we cannot tell (Dt. 33.[19]). That it was small may be safely presumed. And for the rest Israel was a pastoral and agricultural people. Many of them lived in constant sight of the Mediterranean, and striking figures are derived from the sea (Ps. 89.[9]; Is. 5.[30], &c.), and the vicissitudes of the sailors' life (Ps. 107.[23ff.]; Pr. 30.[19]; Is. 33.[23]; Js. 3.[4], &c.). The business relations of Solomon with Hiram, king of Tyre, led to co-partnery in shipping enterprise. The ships built by Solomon, aided doubtless by Phœnician builders, were manned by Phœnician sailors, and the venture met with no little success (1 K. 9.[26ff.], 10.[11f.]). Jehoshaphat sought to emulate his great predecessor, and also had "ships of Tarshish" constructed at Ezion-Geber. Lacking Solomon's wisdom, however, he entrusted his ships to Israelitish sailors, whose want of skill was demonstrated by the wreck of the fleet at Ezion-Geber. Apparently they never got away (1 K. 22.[48]; 2 Ch. 20.[36f.]). The revolt of Edom and loss of Elath shut out Israel from the only ports where she seems ever to have attempted to establish a sea trade (2 K. 8.[20], 16.[6]). She appears to have cherished a certain dread of the deep. To be sent to Egp. "by ships" clearly adds terror to the threat against disobedient Israel (Dt. 28.[68]). Altho' in later days Simon the Maccabee "took Joppa for an haven, and made an entrance to the isles of the sea" (1 M. 14.[5]), there is no evidence that Jewish maritime enterprise amounted to much.

PHŒNICIAN BIREME

The Egyptians made use of "vessels of papyrus" in navigating the Nile (Is. 18.[2] RV.; cp. Jb. 9.[26] RVm.). There is abundant evidence that in ancient times craft of various kinds were used on the river for fishing, hunting, travel, and transport. The like is true of the old-world dwellers by the Euphrates and the Tigris. The safety of their frail craft of wood or wattled willows was secured by means of inflated skins. The "ships of their rejoicing" (Is. 43.[14]) were doubtless larger vessels in which they ventured on the waters of the Persian Gulf. The Phœnicians were, however, the great sailors, the "British" of the ancient world. The narrow strip of land where they settled, between the mountain and the sea on the coast of Syria, however fertile, could not support a large population. Wheat and oil were imported fm. Palestine (1 K. 5.[11]; Ac. 12.[20]). The name of their oldest city, Sidon (Heb. Tzīdōn, "prey taken in fishing or hunting"), indicates that in primitive times their livelihood was eked out by the "harvest of the sea." The knowledge thus gained in the management of fishing-boats doubtless laid the foundations of their future maritime supremacy (Is. 23.[1, 8]). They established a trade with Cornwall in tin, and seem to have reached the Canary Islands. Their regular intercourse with Tartessus in Spain (Tarshish) led to their great sea-going vessels being called "ships of Tarshish" (cp. "East-Indiaman"). In such a vessel Jonah sought to make his escape (Jh. 1.[3ff.]).

Ancient Egyptian War Galley: Sail pulled up for Action

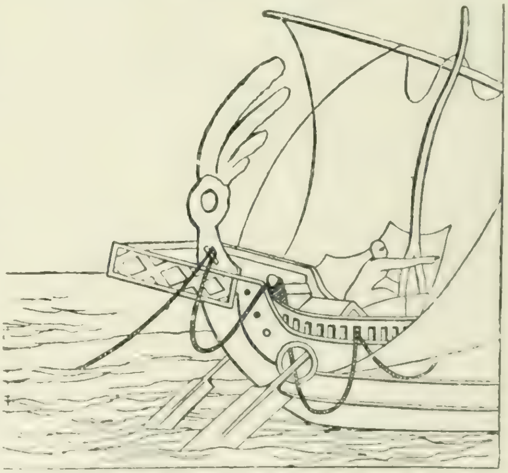
In the Gospels the "ships" or "boats" referred to are all on the Sea of Galilee. The bulk of them were no doubt fishing-boats, probably not unlike those in use on the lake to-day, which run about 26 feet in length by about 7 feet in breadth. They are easily adapted to carry passengers. The boatmen usually stand when rowing, facing to the bow. The large lateen sail is used with caution owing to the sudden squalls that break down from the uplands.

The voyages of St. Paul recorded in the Acts take us on board the Mediterranean trading ships of his time. There was a large traffic in corn between Rome and Egypt, the course followed hugging the coast as closely as possible. These vessels were of considerable burden, some of them reaching a tonnage of 1200. In steering they were guided by observation of the sun and stars (Ac. 27.[20]). Voyages were seldom undertaken in winter, when these were often obscured. By sounding the nearness to land was estimated: but withal, shipwreck seems to have been a frequent experience. Three times, St. Paul tells us, he suffered in this way (2 Cor. 11.[25]), and there is a vivid suggestiveness in the phrase, "A night and a day have I been in the deep." Was he clinging to some fragment of a wreck? What a mere thread of his marvellous story is left to us!

Each vessel carried mainsail and foresail, and, in default of wind, was impelled by banks of rowers. The anchor was let go from the stern, whence also projected two oars or paddles, which served the purposes of rudder. A figurehead usually adorned the bow. Undergirders were also carried. These were stout ropes or chains, which were passed round the vessel, under the keel and across the deck, and braced tightly, to prevent the timbers of the ship from springing in stress of weather (Ac. 27.[17]). The small boat towed behind (v. 16) wd. be used for landing when the ship was unable to go close to land. For safety in a storm it was hauled on board.

The evolution of the fighting ship from that used for trading was doubtless very gradual. It is probable, however, that ships were used in battle from very early times; and they came to play a decisive part in the wars between the East and the West. The Egyptian and Assyrian monuments preserve representations of many vessels of different kinds. The galley of Is. 33.[21] is prob. the vessel impelled by oars, as distinguished from the "gallant ship," wh. with sails outspread, seems to fly over the water.



Ship Anchored by Stern

SHIPHI, a prince of Simeon (1 Ch. 4.[37]).

SHIPHMITE. See Shipham.

SHIPHRAH, one of the midwives of the Hebrews in Egypt (Ex. 1.[15]).

SHIPHTAN, father of Kemuel, a prince of Ephraim (Nu. 34.[24]).

SHISHA. See Shavsha.

SHISHAK (Heb. Shīshaq, Egyptian Sheshenq), first k. of the XXII. Dyn. Having claims to the throne through his grandmother, he married the dr.

of Pasebkhanut the last k. of the XXI. Dyn., and was two years co-regent with him. To S. fled JEROBOAM to escape fm. SOLOMON (1 K.11.[40]). For a time after the Northern Kdm. had been set up the position of Jeroboam was precarious; REHOBOAM was pressing him hard, hence he appealed to S. That monarch was nothing loth to imitate his predecessors of the XVIII. and XIX. Dynasties, and invade Syria. On the wall of the temple at Karnak S. has commemorated in 159 cartouches the names of cities and districts that have become tributary; it is to be noted that many of these are in the territories of the Northern tribes. Most probably many cities remained loyal to the Davidic race, and only acknowledged Jeroboam when compelled by the arms of S. In this expedition he captured Jrs. and, with all the treasures, civil and sacred, carried away the golden shields wh. David had taken fm. the k. of ZOBAH. The Lucianic recension of LXX says that S. gave his dr. Anoth to Jeroboam to wife.

SHISHAK INSCRIPTION ON EXTERIOR OF SOUTH WALL OF GREAT TEMPLE AT KARNAK

SHITRAI, a Sharonite, who had charge of David's herds in the plain of Sharon (1 Ch. 27.[29]).

SHITTIM, the last camping-place of Israel, E. of the Jordan, where they sinned so deeply, and were punished by a plague (Nu. 25.[1ff.]). Hence Joshua sent the two spies to Jericho (Jo. 2.[1]). From S. the congregation moved to the Jordan (3.[1]). In Nu. 33.[49] the camping-place is called ABEL SHITTIM, "meadow of acacias." According to Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 1) it was "where Abila now stands, a place full of palm trees," and sixty furlongs from the Jordan (V. i. 1). OEJ. places Shittim near Mount Peor (Fogor). A possible identification is with Khirbet el-Kefrein, c. six miles E. of Jordan, on the edge of Ghōr es-Seisebān, where acacias are plentiful.

PEF. Photo THE SHITTIM PLAIN

The "valley of Shittim" (Jl. 3.[18]), i.e. "the valley of acacias," to be watered by a stream fm. Jrs. must lie on the W. of Jordan. It prob. applies to the lower reaches of Wādy en-Nār, where acacias are found. It carries the water from the valleys about Jrs. to the Dead Sea.

SHITTAH-TREE

SHITTIM-WOOD, SHITTAH-TREE. Shittim wood was employed to make the framework of the Tabernacle, the Ark, and the furniture of the sacred tent (Ex. 25.[5], &c.). It was therefore a tree growing in the desert of sufficient size to furnish the necessary timber. RV. translates "acacia." This tree appears to answer all the conditions. The species called by the Arabs seyyāl, grows abundantly in the wādies of Sinai, and also in the Ghōr. It reaches a height of 20 to 25 feet. The wood is hard and durable. It is much prized for making charcoal. From it is obtained the gum-arabic of commerce. The tree "has a rugged and thorny stem, and bears yellow blossoms amidst its feathery foliage; the fruit is not unlike a lupin." Shittah is a modified form of shinṭāh, the Heb. equivalent of the Arb. sunṭ. This is another species of acacia, the A. nilotica. The difficulty of so understanding the term in Is. 41.[19] is that the acacia is naturally a tree of the wilderness; so that there would be nothing extraordinary in making it to grow amid the drought of the desert. LXX here reads "box."

SHIZA, father of Adina, one of David's heroes (1 Ch. 11.[42]).

SHOA, a people named among the enemies of Israel—Babylonians, Chaldaeans, Pekod, Koa, and the Assyrians (Ek. 23.[23]). Shrader idents. them with the Sutū, whose land lay E. of the Tigris.

SHOBAB. (1) Son of David by Bathsheba (2 S. 5.[14]; 1 Ch. 3.[5], 14.[4]). (2) A son of Caleb (1 Ch. 2.[18]).

SHOBACH, captain of the host of Hadarezer, k. of Zobah, in the army of the allies summoned by the Ammonites to assist them agst. David, whom king Hanun had insulted. The Syrians were defeated by Abishai, and Shobach was slain (2 S. 10.). The name is given as Shopach in 1 Ch. 19.[16, 18].

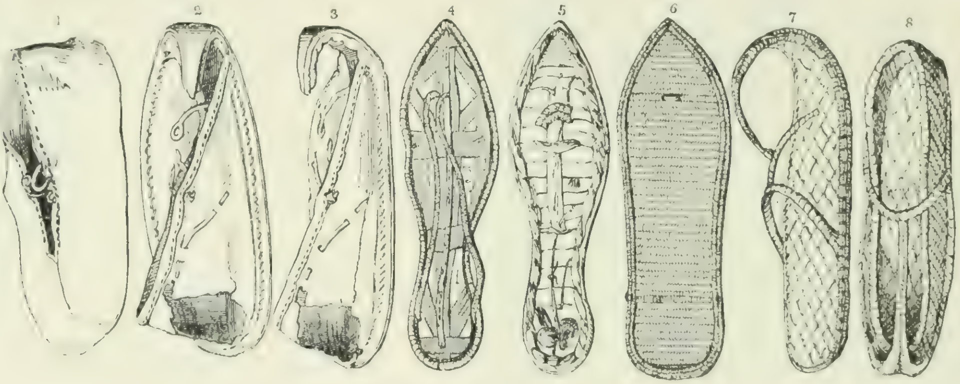
Later tradition represents S. as an Ammonite giant; and again, a son of a Persian king, who opposed Joshua, because the latter had slain his father.

SHOBAI, ancestor of a family of door-keepers of the Temple who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[42]; Ne. 7.[45]), called "Sabi" in 1 Es. 5.[28], RV.

SHOBAL. (1) Second son of Seir the Horite, a phylarch of the Horites (Gn. 36.[29]). (2) Son of Caleb, the founder of Kirjath-Jearim (1 Ch. 2.[50, 52]). He is called a "son" of Judah in 1 Ch. 4.[1f].

SHOBEK. One of the chiefs who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[24]).

SHOBI, son of Nahash, k. of Rabbath Ammon, who along with Machir and Barzillai succoured David and his men with supplies of food and other comforts, when he crossed the Jordan at Absalom's revolt (2 S. 17.[27]). In view of the conduct of Hanun, son of Nahash, and the subsequent defeat of the Ammonites (chap. 10.), it is argued that S. cd. not be the son of Nahash; and an attempt has been made, by emendation of the text, to blot him out of existence. But Nahash had probably more sons than one; and considering his own friendship for David, it is not surprising if, in spite of Hanun's madness, one of them cherished a kindness for his father's friend.



EGYPTIAN SHOES AND SANDALS

1, 2, 3, of green leather, probably Greek period; 4, 5, upper and lower side of sandals, palm leaf and papyrus; 6, sole of sandal; 7, sandal; 8, sandal with shoelike sides.

SHOCO, SHOCHO, SHOCHOH, RV. SOCOH. See SOCHO.

SHOE. Indoors the Hebrews wore nothing on the feet. For outdoor wear the foot-gear varied from a simple piece of leather attached to the sole of the foot by a leathern latchet (Gn. 14.[23]; Mk. 1.[7]) to the shaped shoe covering the whole foot. Ornamentation was also sometimes attempted. The illustration represents some common varieties. The Assyrian sandal was distinguished fm. the Heb. by a heel cap. In Eph. 6.[15] there seems to be a reference to the heavy hob-nailed sandals of the Roman soldier, wh. enabled the wearer to secure firm footing.

The universal custom in the East of leaving the shoes at the door may be connected with the sacredness of the threshold and of the family hearth. The shoes have always to be removed before entering a sanctuary; this evidently to prevent the carrying in of impurities. The like action was necessary on the part of one who stood on "holy ground" (Ex. 3.[5], &c.). The Moslem slips off his shoes before stepping on to his prayer carpet. No reverent Oriental will offer worship with shoes on his feet, or with uncovered head.

The shoe also figures in certain strange legal ceremonies. Under the provisions for Levirate marriage, if the dead husband's br. refused to take the part required, the widow might take him before the elders at the gate, loose the shoe from his foot, and spit in his face as marking contempt for one who would not rise to the honourable and pious duty of building his brother's house. The shoe wd. be her evidence that she was free to marry another (Dt. 25.[9], &c.). In ancient times the shoe of the vendor handed to the purchaser of property took the place of the signed and sealed documents of a later day (Ru. 4.[7f.]; Jr. 32.[9ff.]).

Various explanations have been suggested of the phrase, "Over Edom will I cast My shoe" (Ps. 60.[8], 108.[9]). It may be an act symbolising the taking possession of the land. It may suggest the servitude of Edom as having charge of its master's shoes. Or it may be an expression of contempt, regarding Edom as only a place into wh. an old shoe may be thrown.

Unloosing the latchet (Mk. 1.[7], &c.) and bearing the shoes (Mw. 3.[11], &c.) are among the most humble menial duties.

SHOHAM. A Merarite Levite (1 Ch. 24.[27]).

SHOMER. (1) An Asherite (1 Ch. 7.[32]), called "Shamer," v. 34. (2) Father or mother of Jehozabad, who slew Joash (2 K. 12.[21]). In 2 Ch. 24.[26] the name appears as "Shimrith" (fem. form).

SHOPHACH = SHOBACH, the general of Hadarezer (1 Ch. 19.[16, 18]).

SHOPHAN. See Atroth.

SHUA. (1) A Canaanite of Adullam, father of Judah's wife (Gn. 38.[2, 12]), who is called Bathshua, "daughter of Shua," in 1 Ch. 2.[3]. (2) Daughter of Heber (1 Ch. 7.[32]).

SHUAH. (1) Son of Abraham by Keturah (Gn. 25.[2]). We may prob. ident. him with the tribe Suchu of the cuneiform inscrips., who dwelt on the S. bank of the Euphrates. (2) A descendant of Caleb (1 Ch. 4.[11]), RV. "Shuhah."

SHUAL, an Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Ch. 7.[36]).

SHUAL, LAND OF, a district to the N. of Michmash on the way to Ophrah (1 S. 13.[17]). Ophrah is prob. ident. with eṭ-Ṭaiyebeh, c. five miles E. of Bethel. The land of Shual therefore prob. lay somewhere in the neighbourhood of eṭ-Ṭaiyebeh.

SHUBAEL. See Shebuel.

SHUHAH. See Shuah (2).

SHUHAM, son of Dan (Nu. 26.[42]), called "Hushim" in Gn. 46.[23]; ancestor of the Shuhamites (Nu. 26.[42]).

SHUHITE (Jb. 2.[11], &c.). Poss. a member of the tribe Suchu may be intended. See Shuah.

SHULAMITE (Heb. Shūlammith). The word naturally means a female inhabitant of Shunem (mod. Sōlam); but it may be a play upon the name Solomon, of wh. it is the feminine; the name of the heroine in the Song of Solomon, wh. see.

SHUMATHITES, a family from Kirjath-Jearim (1 Ch. 2.[52]).

SHUNAMMITE. See Shunem.

SHUNEM, a city on the border of Issachar, between Jezreel and Chesulloth (Jo. 19.[18]). It was the site of the Philistine camp before the battle of Gilboa (2 S. 28.[4]). It was the home of the wealthy Shunammite lady who hospitably entertained Elisha (2 K. 4.[8]). We need not suppose that the Shunem of 2 K. 4.[8] is different from that of the other passages. We have no kge. of the towns visited regularly by Elisha; and Shunem was quite within reach of Carmel, being only some 15 miles distant across a level plain.

There is no doubt that the ancient Shunem is represented by the mod. Sōlam, a village surrounded with fruit trees, on the lower SW. slope of Jebel ed-Duḥy (Little Hermon). It looks southward across the valley of Jezreel to the heights of Mt. Gilboa, westward across the undulating breadths of Esdraelon to the rough crest of el-Maḥraqah, "the place of burnt sacrifice," on Carmel, and N'westward to the hills of Nazareth where they drop upon the plain.

Natives of S. were: (1) The Shunammite, whose son Elisha restored to life (2 K. 4.), to whom also, later, he secured the return of her property, wh. apparently had fallen to the crown during her seven years' absence (2 K. 8.[1ff.]). (2) Abishag, who was brought to minister to David in his old age, love for whom was the undoing of Adonijah (1 K. 1.[3], &c.). (3) The Shulamite, whose faithful love is celebrated in the Song of Songs. In this name we observe the change of n to l wh. is found in the mod. Sōlam.

SHUNI, son of Gad, and father of the Shunites (Gn. 46.[16]; Nu. 26.[15]).

SHUPHAM. See Shuppim.

SHUPHAMITES. See Shephaphan.

SHUPPIM and HUPPIM were sons of Ir (1 Ch. 7.[12]), descendants of Benjamin. They are called "Muppim and Huppim," sons of Benjamin, in Gn. 46.[21]; in Nu. 26.[39] "Shupham and Hupham," and in 1 Ch. 8.[5] "Shephuphan and Huram."

SHUR may have been a fortress on the frontier of Egypt, to wh. a highway led through the desert of el-Tīh (Gn. 16.[7]). This quite fits the references in Gn. 20.[1], 25.[18]; 1 S. 15.[7], 27.[8]. The wilderness to the north and east would quite naturally be called the "Wilderness of Shur" (Ex. 15.[22]). Griffith (Hastings' Smaller DB. s.v.) suggests identification with Thor, "a fortress near the NE. frontier and capital of the 14th nome of Lower Egypt." It was situated on a canal called Shi-Hōr. Thither malefactors were sent "after having their noses cut off." The site, however, is not identified.

SHUSHAN (Heb. Shūshan, Gr. Sousa), the capital of ELAM. It was destroyed by Asshur-bani-pal. About a century later it was rebuilt by Cyrus and made the capital of Persia. Poss. as ambassador to Cyrus fm. Belshazzar, who was acting sovereign in place of Nabunahid his father, who was incapacitated, DANIEL came to S. While there he had the vision of the ram and the he-goat. The fullest account of S. is to be found in ESTHER; S. was the palace of AHASUERUS (Xerxes); the prominence of the marble pillars in the description is to be observed (Est. 1.^{2}, 2.^{5}, 9.^{15}). As S. was also the capital of ARTAXERXES, it was here that NEHEMIAH acted as cupbearer (Ne. 1.^{1}). It is to be noted that S. most generally has the determinative "the palace" added. M. Dieulafoy's excavations (1884–86) have shown the importance of the palace; also, as he is careful to assure us, the descriptive accuracy of the book of Esther. Later it shared its dignities with the better-known Persepolis. As in Persepolis, the Court of Columns was a marked feature. The modern name is Sus; it is situated between the rivers Shapur and Dizful (SDB. p. 1302, vol. iii.; Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art. in Persia, p. 420).

RESTORED ELEVATION OF CAPITAL AT SHUSHAN

SHUTHELAH, ancestor of an Ephraimite clan (Nu. 26.^{35}, &c.), whose descendants were called Shuthelahites (Nu. 26.^{35}, RV.).

SIA (Ne. 7.^{47}), SIAH (Ez. 2.^{44}), a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel; called "Sua" in 1 Es. 5.^{29} (AV. "sud").

SIBBECAI, SIBBECHAI, one of David's mighty men (2 S. 21.^{18}, &c.). In 2 S. 23.^{27} "Mebunnai" is a scribal error for S.

SIBBOLETH. See SHIBBOLETH.

SIBMAH, a city in the territory of Reuben, E. of Jordan (Nu. 32.^{38}; Jo. 13.^{19}, &c.), called "Sebam" (AV. SHEBAM) in Nu. 32.^{3}.

SIBRAIM, a place on the N. boundary of the land as indicated by Ezekiel (47.^{16}), wh. may be ident. with Khirbet Sanbariyeh on Nahr Ḥasbāny, to the E. of Abil (Buhl., GAP. 67, 238).

SICKLE. Sickles of flint, preserved fm. the stone age, have been found in Egypt and Pal.; bronze was employed later, and then iron (Dt. 16.^{9}, &c.). The illustration shows the shape of the sickle in ordinary use in Pal. to-day. It prob. resembles that of ancient times. The edge of the sickle is often notched like that of a saw. The "sickle" of Jr. 50.^{16} and Jl. 3.^{13} is the large knife, shaped like the sickle, with wh. the bunches of ripe grapes were cut from the vine (cp. Rv. 14.^{18}).

SICKLE

SIDDIM, THE VALE OF, is mentioned only in Gn. 14. in connection with the invasion by the four kings, and the capture of the five cities. It is described as being "full of slime pits" (v. 10), which apparently impeded the movements of the fugitives. The bitumen, here called "slime," is petroleum, formed by the decomposition of vegetable and animal matter under water, hardened by evaporation and oxidisation. These "pits" or "wells," whence the bitumen oozed, "are not now known in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea; but the strata about it are rich in bituminous matter; the ancients state that masses of bitumen were often found floating upon it (whence it was called by Josephus and others the 'Asphaltic Lake'), and after earthquakes similar masses still appear" (Driver, Genesis, 162f.). In v. 3 the vale of Siddim is said to be the SALT SEA, i.e. the Dead Sea. This might mean that the vale was coterminous with the sea, in wh. case the sea wd. have been formed by a great subsidence. But during all historic time there must have been a collection of water in the bottom of the valley, and there is notning to show that it ever could have been elsewhere than where it is (see PALESTINE, Jordan valley). But while the sea is deep N. of the Lisān, reaching a depth of 1300 ft., to the S. of that peninsula it is shallow, at certain seasons being almost fordable in parts. Here it is distinguished by the name of "the Lagoon." It is just possible that this part may have been formed by subsidence within historic time. Before that event the salt, marshy flats of es-Sebkha, S. of the Dead Sea, may have furnished excellent arable land. The luxuriance of Ghōr eṣ-Ṣāfiyeh, a small oasis to the SE. of the sea, shows what this land may have been under favourable conditions.

The view that the vale of Siddim lay to the N. of the Dead Sea may be safely dismissed. ZOAR is not named among the cities given to Reuben (Jo. 13.$^{15ff.}$), and it appears as a Moabite city in Is. 15.[5]; Jr. 48.[34]. Josephus (BJ. IV. viii. 4) clearly places it at the S. of the Dead Sea. The other cities of the plain, it may be presumed, were not far distant. This view is strengthened by the name attaching to the range of salt cliffs, wh. form the W. boundary of the N. part of es-Sebkha—Jebel Usdum, "the mountain of Sodom." The level of the water in the Dead Sea has in recent years shown a tendency to rise. This may be taken to show the possibility that the S. end of the sea was once dry land. What is now the marsh land may then have been th vale of Siddim.

SIDON, SIDONIANS, ZIDON, ZIDONIANS. To the N. of the "Ladder of Tyre," and practically all the way to Beyrout, along the Syrian coast, between Mt. Lebanon and the sea, runs a narrow strip of rich land. This, with part of the mountain behind it, formed the territory of the PHŒNICIANS. This people held their ground against the invading Israelites, and once at least the conquerors of Pal. were subject to Phœnician oppression (Jg. 1.[31], 10.[12]). The land was not sufficient in extent to support a large and growing population. The people therefore applied themselves to gather "the harvest of the sea." In plying the arts of fishermen they became expert in the management of sea-going craft. Two circumstances favoured their development as a seafaring people. On their coast-line there were natural facilities for the construction of excellent harbours, commodious and well protected; and the mountain above them furnished plentiful supplies of timber, well adapted for shipbuilding. That the voyages made in the interests of trade might be profitable, they required to carry with them commodities produced at home, for sale or exchange. This led to the founding of such industries as ornamental metal working, weaving, &c. Fabrics treated with the famous purple dye—discovered by the Sidonians, altho' afterwards known as "Tyrian purple"—were in great demand. At two specially convenient points on the coast large industrial and trading communities were formed. The first was Sidon and the second TYRE. Trading relations with other countries resulted in the foundation of colonies. Poss. to Sidon must be attributed the planting of Aradus, Carthage, Melitus, Citium, and Berytus.

COIN OF SIDON

In the earliest times S. was the chief city of the Phœnicians. So great was her ascendency that no incongruity was felt in calling the whole people by her name, "Sidonians" (Dt. 3.[9], &c.). S. is first mentioned in the Tel el-Amarna tablets. Her prince, Zimrida, appears along with the Amorite chief, Aziri, as opposing the attempt of Egp. to establish authority over the seaboard. Centuries later, at the time of the conquest of Pal., she was still the foremost city of Phœnicia. How long she held this position we cannot tell, but in the time of Solomon the leadership had evidently passed to Tyre. Josephus represents Hiram, king of Tyre, Solomon's contemporary, as acting the part of national leader (Ant. VIII. v. 3; Cont. Ap. i. 18). In subsequent history the relative position of the two cities was often changed. The Assyrians profited by their rivalry, playing one off against the other to the detriment of both. Sidon acknowledged the supremacy of Ashur-nazir-pal; and felt the heavy hand of successive Assyrian monarchs. Sennacherib overthrew king Eluleus (B.C. 701), and placed Tuba'al, a creature of his own, on the throne. His successor, Abd-melkutti, made insurrection, provoking the onslaught of Esarhaddon, who, after terrific carnage, deported the survivors of the citizens to Assyria, utterly destroyed the city, and on another site erected a new city, wh. he called by his own name "Esarhaddonsburgh." But the old name cd. not thus be blotted out. 'Ir-esarhaddon had no vitality. Sidon persists to this day. The waning of Assyrian power did not necessarily involve independence for Phœnicia, but her people, freed from the distractions of war, were able for a time to pursue their avocations with success. Attempts were made in the western provinces to counteract the growing ascendency of Babylon; and in connection with one of these we read of a Sidonian king visiting Jrs. (Jr. 27.[3]). A rising on a considerable scale, wh. was organised prob. c. B.C. 598, suffered extinction at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar. The heroic resistance and tragic fate of Tyre are depicted in Ek. 26. Sidon, unmanned by a terrible pestilence (Ek. 28.[22f.]), submitted at once, securing the conqueror's favour.

During the earlier portion of the Persian dominion happy relations existed between the Phœnicians and their masters, to whom, in their momentous struggle with the Greeks, the Phœnician seamen rendered conspicuous service. Under the leadership of Sidon an attempt was made c. B.C. 351 to throw off the Persian yoke. It ended in ghastly failure. Tennes, king of Sidon, in despair betrayed the city to Artaxerxes Ochus. Such were the cruelties practised by the latter in quelling the revolt, that, rather than fall into his hands, the people of Sidon set fire to the city, and over 40,000 perished in the flames. The traitor gained nothing by his infamy; he was soon butchered by order of Ochus. A site with such advantages, however, cd. not long remain desolate. It was rebuilt and maintained a prosperous life, with a son of Tennes as king, until, with the coming of Alexander, night fell upon the long day of Phœnician maritime ascendency. Sidon, however, continued to be an important trading centre, now under Syrian, and again under Egyptian authority. The Romans made her a free city. Jesus was once in the neighbourhood of the city; but we cannot say He ever entered it (Mw. 15.[21f.], &c.); and it figures in His denunciation of woe upon the highly favoured but heedless cities of Galilee (Mw. 11.[21f.], &c.). It was represented in the embassy to king Agrippa (Ac. 12.[20]). It was touched at by St. Paul on his voyage fm. Cæsarea to Italy (27.[3]). Hardly less chequered has been the later history of the city. During crusading times it was a heavy sufferer. It saw prosperous days under the Druze prince Fakhr ed-Dīn (1595–1634), and again under Muhammad ʻAly (1832–1840), by whom the walls were built.

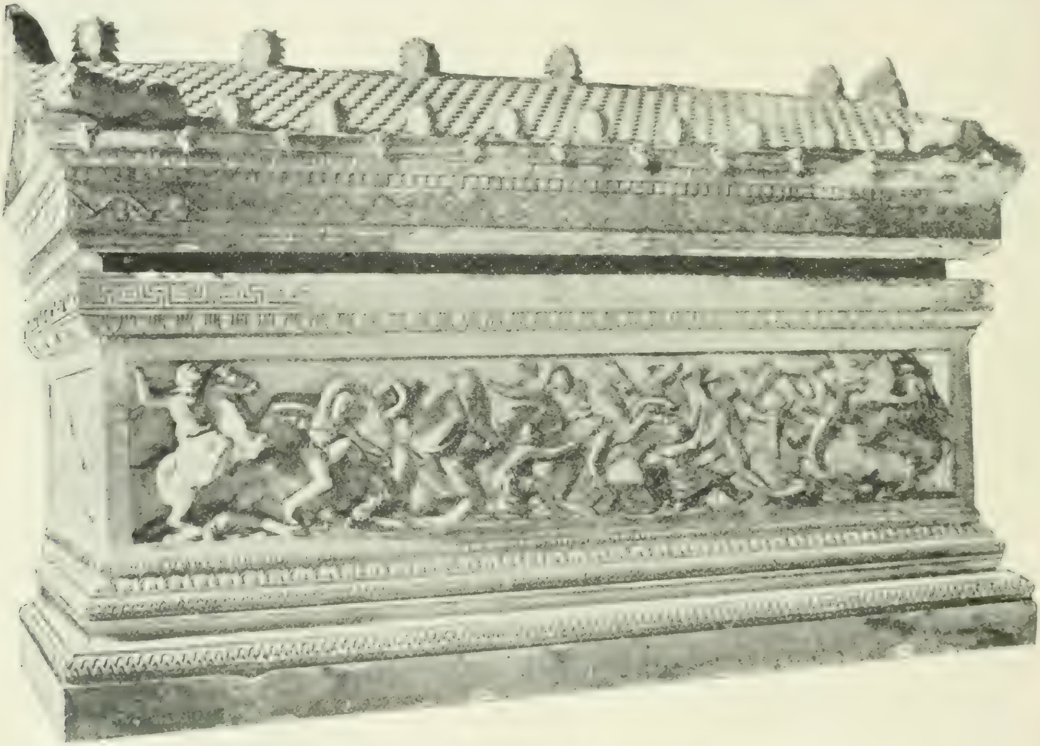
The mod. Ṣaidā, "prey taken in fishing," stands on a point projecting into the sea. Not far from the shore a number of small rocky islands afforded shelter to ships lying near the town. These were joined together by embankments, and the water between them and the shore to the N. of the city formed a safe and convenient harbour. To the S. lay the "Egyptian harbour," larger but not so secure. On the largest of the islands, connected with the mainland by a bridge, on a site which was prob. occupied by a fortress in early days, stands Qalʻat el-Baḥr, "the castle of the sea," built in the thirteenth cent. The mouth of the harbour was filled up by order of Fakhr ed-Dīn. This kept the Turkish fleet at a distance for the time: but it wrought permanent injury to the city, as it largely spoilt the harbour. No buildings of any antiquity remain, but there are abundant evidences of Sidon's ancient greatness—the squared blocks used in building the harbour, the rock-cut reservoirs, the traces of walls, columns, &c. Certain ancient tombs have been uncovered, yielding highly interesting results. In 1885 was found the sarcophagus of king Eshmunazar (first half of the fourth cent. B.C.). In 1887 many highly ornamented Phœnician and Greek sarcophagi were found; among them that of Tabnit, fr. of Eshmunazar, and the so-called coffin of Alexander the Great. From examination of the site it appears that ancient Sidon stretched further to the E. than the mod. city. "Great Zidon" (Jo. 11.[8], &c.) and "Little Zidon," are mentioned in an inscrip. of Sennacherib (KAT.[2], 288f.). What the distinction implied we cannot now say.



P.E.F. Photo

THE SO-CALLED SARCOPHAGUS OF ALEXANDER

Mod. Ṣaidā is a town of some 11,000 inhabitants. Many are engaged in fishing. The gardens and orange groves are extensive, and furnish occupation for many more. Only small coasting steamers and sailing vessels call at Ṣaidā. Oranges form the main export.

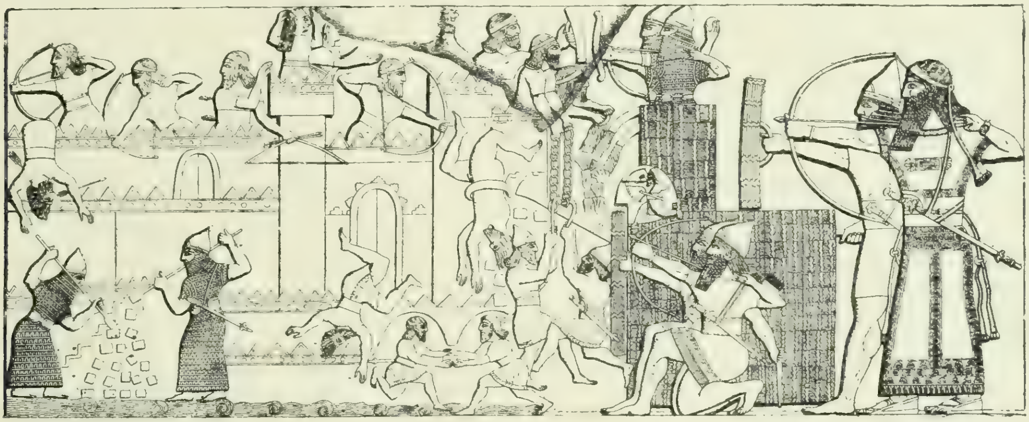
SIEGE. Of all the operations of ancient warfare, only of a S. have we anything like a description of the actual succession of steps. In Ezekiel (4.$^{1-3}$) we have an account of how the prophet acted out in symbol the siege of Jrs., to impress upon his fellow-captives its horrors. The first thing done was to erect a watch-tower to overlook the city walls and see what was being done within ; then a mound was raised, filling up the fosse and forming a platform on wh. the battering engines mt. be moved to the wall.



The Siege of a City

These engines were battering-rams in movable towers, fm. the top of wh. archers shot arrows to clear the walls while the rams shook the wall beneath. In order to cover these operations the army first encamped, and then, if numerous enough, surrounded the city with a circumvallation. If this was completed and cd. be held, famine accompanied by disease compelled surrender. This is confirmed by the monuments of Egp. and Asyr. There are additional features ; in the assault we find escalade and mining ; for the defence there were chains let down to catch the head of the ram, and blazing torches were flung to burn up the towers. Josephus's account of the siege and defence of Jotapata (BJ. III. vii.) may be regarded as classical.

SIGNET. See Seal.

SIHON, the Amorite king encountered by Israel N. of the Arnon, who refused to let them pass, and was defeated in a battle fought at Jahaz (Nu. 21.). For the extent of Sihon's territory E. of Jordan see Ammon, Amorites. He fixed his capital at Heshbon, wh. is indicated by his own name in Jr. 48.^{45} (cp. Nu. 21.^{28}). The overthrow of Sihon, with that of Og, king of Bashan, made a great impression on the mind of the people, and is frequently referred to in the Lit. It is also celebrated in song (Nu. 21.$^{27\text{ff.}}$; Ps. 135.^{11}, 136.^{19}). The land taken from S. was assigned to Reuben and Gad.

SIHOR, properly SHIHOR, wh. see.

SILAS (Acts), SILVANUS (Epp.). He is introduced to us as one of the leaders of the Church in Jrs. (Ac. 15.^{22}), holding the office of Prophētēs. After the apostolic council at Jrs. S., along with Judas Barsabas, was appointed to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, to announce the decree of the council in the matter of uncircumcised believers. When the deputies had delivered their message they returned to Jrs. After a short time S. seems to have gone again to Antioch.

V. 34 appears to be an interpolation to explain v. 40; it is only found in D. of the five great uncials, and v. 33 implies that both deputies departed.

When Paul had separated fm. Barnabas he chose S. to be his companion. His name, Silvanus, indicates that he, like Paul, had the citizenship of Rome (Ac. 16.^{37}). S. accompanied Paul through Asia Minor to Troas, and thence across to Europe. He was beaten with him in Philippi and was thrust into prison, but shared also in his triumph (Ac. 16.$^{12\text{f}}$). He went with Paul to Thessalonica, and thence to Berœa, where S. remained while Paul went on to Athens (Ac. 17.^{14}). In Corinth he, with Timothy, rejoined the apostle (Ac. 18.$^{5\text{f.}}$), who, encouraged by their presence, threw himself with yet greater vehemence into his controversy with the unbelieving Jews. S. appears to have left Corinth about the same time as Paul, since his name did not form the watchward of a party, as did that of Apollos (1 Cor. 1.^{12}). S. is named in the salutation in both the Epp. to the Thessalonians, wh. were both written fm. Corinth. In the 2nd Epistle to the Corinthians Paul unites S. and Timothy with himself as preaching Christ in one way (2 Cor. 1.^{19}). If we may assume as certain, what is at least probable, that S. of 1 P. 5.[12] had been Paul's companion, we may find a reason for the exceedingly Pauline character of that epistle. We have assumed the identity of SILAS and SILVANUS; the contraction is the same in kind as that wh. produced Epaphras fm. Epaphroditus, and Apollos fm. Apollonius; further the Silvanus of the Epp. has been with Paul in the experiences in wh. Silas, according to Acts, has been with him. St. Paul's constant use of the Roman name mt. be due to the importance he had been led to attach to Roman citizenship, of wh. the name was the sign. Luke, again, uses the form the name assumed among the Greeks. Of the subsequent fate of Silas nothing is certainly known.

SILK. Two Heb. words are so trd.: (1) shēsh (Pr. 31.[22]), elsewhere more correctly rendered "fine linen"; (2) meshī (Ek. 16.[10, 13]), wh. poss. may be S. In Rv. 18.[12] S. (Gr. sērikon) is mentioned as one of the luxurious possessions of the mystic Babylon. Accdg. to Chinese annals they practised weaving of S. two millennia before Christ. Fm. Aristotle's references it seems certain that S. was unknown in Greece till after the conquests of Alexander the Great. The cultivation of the silkworm did not begin in the Levant till the reign of Justinian.

With some plausibility the word tr. "Damascus" in Am. 3.[12] AV. is rendered by RV. "silken cushions."

SILLA. Joash was killed by his servants at Millo on the way leading down to Silla (2 K. 12.[20]). What Silla was and where it was there is nothing to show.

SILOAM. See SHILOAH.

SILVANUS. See SILAS.

SILVER (Heb. keseph). One of the earliest of the metals to be regarded as precious. Keseph is frequently trd. MONEY (Gn. 42.[27]; Ex. 21.[21]; Lv. 25.[37], &c.), a fact that shows how early it was used as a measure of value. Although S. never seems to have been mined in Pal. the Jews knew well the process of mining (Jb. 28.[1]), and of refining silver (Ek. 22.[22]; Ml. 3.[3]); they knew also the metals found in combination with it in the ore, fm. wh. it had to be purified (Is. 1.[25]; Jr. 6.[29]). Isr. seems to have got its supply of S. mainly fm. TARSHISH (1 K. 10.[22]; Ek. 27.[12]), poss. Tartessus in Spain; but there must have been some source of supply nearer to explain the knowledge the Jews had of the treatment of the crude ore. S. appears to have been wrought in the Egyptian mines in the Sinaitic peninsula, but it is never mentioned as a source of supply. It is recorded as an evidence of the riches Solomon introduced into Jrs. that "it was not anything accounted of in the days of Solomon" (2 Ch. 9.[20]). In the NT. (Gr. arguros), generally the metal (Ac. 17.[29]; 1 Cor. 3.[12]; Ja. 5.[3]), though occasionally of MONEY (Mw. 10.[9], argurion), sometimes trd. "money," as in the parable of "the talents" (Mw. 25.[18]), but usually "pieces of money" (Mw. 26.[15]); the Gr. didrachm, "silverling," is used to tr. keseph in Is. 7.[23]; LXX tr. siklōn = "shekels."

SILVERSMITH. See HANDICRAFTS.

SIMEON. (1) Second s. of Jacob and Leah. He was born in Padan-Aram (Gn. 29.[33]). In this passage (J.) the name is connected with shāma', "to hear," Leah exclaiming at his birth, "The Lord hath heard that I am hated, He hath therefore given me this son also: and she called his name Simeon" (shim'ōn, "hearing"). In revenge for the seduction of Dina by Shechem, son of Hamor, Simeon took part in the treacherous slaughter and despoiling of the Shechemites, an atrocity that is represented as having made a deep impression on the mind of Jacob (49.[5]). When Joseph's brethren visited him in Egypt, Simeon was left bound on their return home, as a pledge that Benjamin would be brought down (42.[24]), and in a mood of pessimism Jacob mourned over him as lost (v. 36). Six sons are ascribed to S. at the time of the settlement in Egp. (46.[10]). We must suppose that, with the other patriarchs, he died and was buried there. The critical speculations wh. find in the notices of S. reflections of tribal history, rest upon extremely meagre and uncertain data.

For the strength of the tribe at the two enumerations in the wilderness see NUMBERS. The representative of S. at the first numbering was Shelumiel, s. of Zurishaddai (Nu. 1.[6]). The place of S. in the desert march was south of the tent of meeting, with the standard of the camp of Reuben (2.[12]). Simeon's oblation, offered by the hand of Shelumiel, at the completion of the Tabernacle, is reported in chap. 7.[36ff.]. Among the spies S. was represented by Shaphat, s. of Hori (13.[5]). Shemuel, s. of Ammihud, was appointed to act for Simeon in the division of the land (34.[20]). Simeon was to "stand on Mt. Gerizim to bless the people" when they had passed over Jordan (Dt. 27.[12]). The inheritance of S. is said to have been "in the midst of the inheritance of Judah" (Jo. 19.[1ff.]). The district assigned to S. was the southern part of the territory of Judah, the reason for this being that "the portion of the children of Judah was too much for them" (v. 9). The two tribes are represented as acting together in the conquest of the whole region (Jg. 1.[3, 17]), out of wh., along with the portion of Benjamin, thirteen cities were assigned to the Levites (Jo. 21.[4]). The descendants of the patriarch are called Simeonites (Nu. 25.[14], &c.). The tribe of Simeon played no important part in subsequent history. The pastoral character of their territory wd. assimilate their life to that of the peoples on their borders; and the probability is that such of their number as were not absorbed by the Arabs and Edomites were finally merged in the tribe of Judah. Simeon is not mentioned by Deborah; but neither is Judah. In that rising the southern tribes were evidently not concerned. 1 Ch. 4.$^{41ff.}$ preserves the record of a raid in the time of Hezekiah, by a company of Simeonites, against the Amalekites in Mt. Seir, where apparently they established themselves. Seven thousand one hundred warriors of the tribe are said to have joined David at Hebron (1 Ch. 12.^{25}). Certain sojourners of Simeon were associated with Asa in his reformation of religion (2 Ch. 15.^{9}). Josiah carried his attack upon idolatry into the territory of Simeon (2 Ch. 34.^{6}). Simeon is assigned a place in the ideal construction of Israel (Ek. 48.^{25}).

(2) One of the "waiters for the consolation of Israel," a "righteous and devout" man (Lk. 2.$^{25ff.}$), who recognised the infant Jesus when He was brought into the Temple. S. is usually described as an aged man. This, however, is only an inference from his prayer, "Now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace," it being assumed that unless he were advanced in years he would not wish to depart at the very threshold of the Messianic age. (3) Simeon, or "Symeon" (RV.), appears in the genealogy of our Lord (Lk. 3.^{30}). (4) See Niger, Simon Peter.

SIMON PETER, the chief of the twelve apostles of Jesus Christ, was called from his work as fisherman on the Sea of Galilee to become a fisher of men. Our only reliable information about him is given in the Gospels, the Acts, and one or two of the epistles; and we have no account of his life before his meeting with Jesus. We see him first as a full-grown man, married, and with a house in Capernaum. He had associated with him in his trade his brother Andrew; and connected with them in some kind of partnership was another pair of brothers, James and John. St. P. belonged to Bethsaida of Galilee, a town on the northern shore of the Sea of Tiberias, and not far from Capernaum, his home. He is called son of Jonah or John, but his father is not otherwise mentioned. It is only a casual reference which tells us that he was married, and apparently his wife's mother, as well as his brother Andrew, lived with him (Mw. 8.^{14}).

The first meeting between Jesus and St. P. is recorded in St. John's Gospel only; and it took place near the scene of the Baptism, at some distance from their homes. They would appear to have all come hither, drawn by the influence of John the Baptist, and St. P., with his brother Andrew, had already become a disciple of John when Jesus appeared. John's message was a call to repentance and to a changed life in preparation for the coming of the Messiah; and those who enrolled themselves as his disciples would be men of lofty aims, who appreciated the ethical teaching of their master, and valued the coming of the Messiah as the beginning of a reign of righteousness. St. P. came to Jesus from the school of John the Baptist (Jn. 1.$^{40-42}$), and gave himself heart and soul to his new Master. From the first Jesus saw great possibilities in the character of this man, and at their first interview told him that he would be called Cephas, or Peter, meaning "a rock." The name of honour gradually came to take the place of his proper name; but Jesus, apart from the passage, Mw. 16.^{18}, continued to call him Simon. St. James calls him Simeon (Ac. 15.^{14}); in the Gospels and Acts he is named "Simon who is also called Peter," or Simon Peter (cp. 2 P. 1.^{1}), or simply Peter, and St. Paul calls him Cephas (cp. 1 P. 1.^{1}), or, more rarely, Peter (Gal. 2.$^{7, 8}$). After his meeting with Jesus, St. P. went back to Galilee and returned to his accustomed trade; and it was only on the second interview that he left all and followed Jesus (Mw. 4.$^{18-22}$; Mk. 1.$^{16-20}$; Lk. 5.$^{1-11}$). This time Jesus was teaching in Galilee on the shore of the lake, and a great multitude pressed upon Him so that He had not room to speak. Taking advantage of His acquaintance with Peter, Jesus entered his boat and asked him to put out a little from the land. The result of that meeting was that St. P. immediately cast in his lot with Jesus, leaving all he had to become His constant companion. Some months later Jesus chose the twelve apostles, that He might have a band of men united to Himself by a closer bond than that of discipleship. They were to be continually in His company, that they might learn the inwardness of His teaching, and that they might faithfully present His Gospel to the world, when He Himself should have departed from them. St. P. is always given the first place in the list of the apostles, and he became at once the leader of them all, because of those qualities which Jesus recognised at the beginning, and which, under His training, were developed into something truly great.

Though the details of the life of St. P. are scanty, we must remind ourselves that he was in the company of Jesus all the time, hearing His words and seeing His wonderful deeds, and thus the impression of the Master's character would be gradually made upon him. Peter, like the others, came to Jesus full of prejudices. He had his own conception of how the Messiah should appear, and indeed none of the disciples seems to have realised till after the death of Jesus that His kingdom was not, and never could be, of this world. But Jesus came to fulfil not to destroy, and His method was, not to root out the old prejudices by denouncing them, but quietly to instil the new ideas which would gradually leave no place for the old. St. P. was peculiarly fitted to be influenced by this kind of teaching, for he had a passionate devotion to Jesus, and a humility in His presence which led him to submit at once to His influence. The old views and the new might remain side by side for a time, but whenever the disciple saw clearly what were the implications of the new teaching, he yielded at once and embraced it as his own. He often received correction, and sometimes Jesus had to speak with considerable severity, but he was always saved from bitterness by his confidence in the perfect love of the Master, and his conviction of His greatness and wisdom. Sometimes this very confidence in Jesus led him into error, and his impulsive nature brought him into perilous situations. His rashness in offering to walk on the sea is an instance of this (Mw. 14.[28-31]); for, in the gladness of his heart, he had undertaken a task the difficulty of which he did not stop to realise, and his rashness, instead of gratifying Jesus, only brought himself into a position for which he was not fit. This impulsiveness was a characteristic of St. P. throughout. It made him rush into situations of danger before he had given himself time to consider; and it sometimes led him to give utterance to thoughtless statements which brought upon him the rebuke of the Master. But all his rash actions and his hasty words were only the expression of his great love for Jesus. Had he loved less he might have contained himself more. And there were many occasions when his impulsive answers gave gladness to the heart of his Lord. Once at Capernaum, when many, dissatisfied with His teaching, because He claimed to be the bread of life, murmured at the hard saying and walked no more with Him, Jesus turned to the twelve and asked, "Would ye also go away?" The quick answer came from St. P.: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and know that Thou are the Holy One of God" (Jn. 6.[68, 69]). He perhaps did not understand any better than the multitude, but the Master had become indispensable to him. His answer shows that it was the sinlessness of Jesus which had impressed St. P., who had been learning to understand that this constituted His highest claim to their reverence and obedience (cp. 1 P. 2.[22]). It was this which gave the confession its value to Jesus.

Near the end of the Galilæan ministry, when Jesus was with His disciples in the neighbourhood of Cæsarea Philippi, St. P. again comes to the front (Mw. 16.[13-20]; Mk.8.[27-29]; Lk. 9.[18-20]). It was a crisis in the life of our Lord, for He was about to prepare the disciples' minds for His approaching death, and before making this communication He determined to obtain an expression of their opinion as to His person. The confession at Capernaum had been the impulsive response of a warm, loving heart, but now Jesus wanted a deliberate statement of the judgment they had been led to form of Him, as the result of their intercourse. "He wished them to be fairly committed to the doctrine of the Messiahship before proceeding to speak in plain terms on the unwelcome theme of His death" (A. B. Bruce). He first asked the disciples what were the current opinions about Him, and the answers which they gave showed how the mind of the people was being exercised to explain Him. Then He asked pointedly, "But who say ye that I am?" and St. P. alone answered, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." Other men had gone no further than to compare Him with the very greatest of the prophets, but St. P. ascribed to Him the attributes of divinity. The great value of St. P.'s confession was that he reverenced in Jesus the qualities which the Lord Himself considered essential, and that his view of holiness had become independent of the external trappings which were universally associated with the appearing of the Messiah. The high praise which the Lord bestowed on him shows the satisfaction with which He received St. P.'s answer, for He turned to the apostle and praised him unstintedly. He designated him as the rock on which He would build His Church, against which the gates of Hades would not prevail. It is St. P. himself who is called the rock, the foundation of the Church, and the history of his career in the Acts is the best commentary on the Lord's promise. But St. P. was given the primacy, not as an official, but for personal reasons. He had the qualities for leadership, and his confession showed that he had the right understanding of his Master. In the further promise as to "the power of the keys," St. P. is described as the steward of the kingdom, determining who were to be admitted to the Church and who were to be rejected. The power to "bind" and to "loose," which was given to St. P. here, was also given to his brethren in Mw. 18.[18]. The expressions, "to bind," "to loose," are taken from the technical use of the words in the decisions of the scribes, and mean, "to forbid," "to permit." The disciples, because of their special knowledge of our Lord's teaching, were empowered to give an authoritative decision on matters concerned with the Church. That which they decide shall be in accordance with the decision of heaven. The distinction given to St. P. here is afterwards bestowed upon his brethren, but because he alone made this confession at this time he was given, as their representative and leader, a prerogative which justifies his description as the foundation rock on which the Church is built. On the same occasion St. P. laid himself open to severe rebuke from his Master, and revealed very plainly the double elements of strength and weakness in his character. Rejoicing in the commendation he had received, he took it upon himself to check his Master for what he considered His needlessly gloomy forebodings of the future, and brought down upon himself the strong condemnation of Jesus. The heart of the Lord was grieved to find that the disciple who had best grasped the meaning of His Person, could still be so earthly-minded with regard to His mission. On the Mount of Transfiguration (Mw. 17.[1-13]; Mk. 9.[2-13]; Lk. 9.[28-36]) St. P., by his behaviour, exhibited the same traits of character. At first he was awed by the change which had come upon Jesus when He was transfigured before them, but instead of keeping a discreet silence in the presence of mysteries which were beyond his comprehension, he began to make arrangements affecting them all, and to tell out his plan. Apparently he thought that they had reached the climax of his Lord's life, and was incapable of understanding the mind of Jesus, who looked upon His death on the cross as the goal of all His life. St. P. wished to see the world dazzled by the glory of the transfigured Lord. Jesus knew that victory would come only by His death: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Myself" (Jn. 12.[32]).

From this point onwards to the final entry into Jerusalem there are only occasional references to St. P., as distinguished from the others. Perhaps he had been impressed by the dangers of hasty speech, and was practising obedience to the Divine command to hear the words of God's well-beloved Son. Thus we find that when Jesus began to speak again about being killed, and thereafter raised up, they were all exceeding sorry, but there is no word from St. P. as before. On four occasions, however, his name is mentioned during this interval. (1) The tribute money. The tax collectors came to St. P., his leadership among the disciples being apparently well known, and asked what was the custom of his Master with regard to the payment of the tax levied for the maintenance of worship in the Temple (Mw. 17.[24-27]). The tax was levied upon all, but the priests and rabbis seem to have been exempted from it, and the question was whether Jesus would claim this privilege. Jesus, while declaring to His disciples that He had a higher right than even a rabbi to refuse to pay this tax, yet agreed to pay, "lest we cause them to stumble." P. was sent to take the first fish he could catch, and in its mouth he would find a coin to pay all that was required. (2) Forgiving. Jesus had been speaking of the forgiving spirit, and St. P. asked, "Lord, how often shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? until seven times?" (Mw. 18.[21-22]), expecting, doubtless, to be praised for his large charity. Jesus replied that forgiveness is without limit, and St. P. would be made to feel again that he had failed to comprehend his Master's teaching. (3) Watchfulness (Lk. 12.[41]). Jesus had been warning His hearers to be watchful, and prepared for the sudden coming of the Son of Man, and St. P. asked for a fuller explanation. He wished to have the distinction between the apostles and others clearly stated, thinking that when the Son of Man should come, the Twelve would be specially distinguished. The same thought suggests his question (4) when the Rich Young Ruler had sorrowfully turned away (Mw. 19.[27-30]; Mk. 10.[28-31]; Lk. 18.[28-30]). He was thinking with complaisance that he had stood the test which had been applied to this young man. He reminded Jesus how he and his brethren had left all to follow Him, and asked about their reward. The revelation of himself which St. P. gives in these questions is of a man trying his best to rise to that which he admires in another, and though we find him often at fault in this effort, we realise that he "falls to rise, is baffled to fight better." He is a man with a practical turn of mind, who is not content till he understands the reasons of things. His impulsiveness leads him into error as well as, perhaps oftener than, to the truth, but it is always easy for the Master to bring him to see his faults. Though we feel often that he shows a lack of true reverence for Him whom he called his Lord, and whom he acknowledged to be Divine, his love for Jesus always kept him from going far astray, and none among the disciples gave to Jesus a more devoted service, or loved Him with a deeper affection, than St. P. There is truth in the saying of Chrysostom: "He loved St. John exceedingly, but it was by St. P. that He was exceedingly beloved."

The name of P. is not mentioned in the account of the journey of Jesus to Jerusalem and the triumphal entry, but he was continually in His company during these eventful days. He heard Jesus curse the fig-tree on the Monday of that week, for on the following day he called his Lord's attention to the fact that His prophecy was fulfilled and the tree withered (Mk. 11.[21]). On the same day St. P. is named along with three others as asking Jesus when His prophecy about the destruction of Jerusalem would be fulfilled (Mk. 13.[3, 4]). St. Luke has preserved the detail that the two disciples sent to arrange about the place for the celebration of the Passover were St. P. and St. John (Lk. 22.[8]); St. P. stands out prominently at this point. Jesus reclined at the Last Supper between St. P. and St. John, His face towards John on His right hand, while Peter could see His face only when He turned to him. Jesus had already sat down at the table when He rose unexpectedly and proceeded to wash the disciples' feet. He began with Simon Peter, who was therefore the first to face the situation of seeing the Master at his feet, prepared to perform the service of a slave. The mildness of St. P.'s protest is at first surprising: "Lord, dost Thou wash my feet?" But if Jesus began with him, as everything in the story seems to imply, the unexpectedness of His action and the condescension of it so took Peter by surprise that he was almost speechless. When he did realise it he protested vehemently against his Lord's action, and then, when rebuked, he went to the opposite extreme, and was as extravagant in the terms of his submission as he had formerly been in his refusal to obey (Jn. 13.[1-20]). During the Supper, when Jesus was speaking of the betrayer, St. P., thinking that Jesus had whispered the name to St. John, asked him to declare the secret (Jn. 13.[24]). When Judas left the table Jesus spoke of the love of His disciples for one another as being the sign of their discipleship after His departure. St. P. at once made evident how little he had even yet understood the words about His death by asking what He meant by going away. and maintaining that he would never forsake Him. He was solemnly told that he would thrice deny his Lord (Jn. 13.[38]). The account in St. Luke's Gospel gives a valuable addition (Lk. 22.[31-34]). Jesus turned to St. P. and addressed him by his old name, Simon. He told him that there had been a spiritual conflict for the souls of all the disciples, but owing to the Master's prayer on his particular behalf he would come through the trial successfully, and was to use his experience in establishing the brethren. His impulsiveness would expose him to special danger, but he would pass through it, not scatheless certainly, but not to his utter ruin. This warning only made P. protest more vehemently, " Lord, with Thee I am ready to go both to prison and to death." Then Jesus spoke distinctly of the threefold denial, and the disciple, thunderstruck by the definite and confident prophecy, became silent. It is worthy of note that during the speech of Jesus recorded immediately afterwards in Jn. 14., while three other disciples broke in with questions, quite in the manner of St. P., he himself kept silence, as if utterly cast down by the words which Jesus had spoken. After supper they went to Gethsemane, and it is at this point that St. Matthew and St. Mark relate the prophecy of the denial (Mw. 26.[33-35]; Mk. 14.[29-31]). The explanation of this difference from the accounts in St. Luke and St. John may be that Jesus spoke more than once that night of the trial to which the disciples would be immediately subjected. In the Garden Jesus took apart Peter, James, and John, to watch near Him while He prayed, but when He rose from His knees He found them asleep. The three disciples had been taken by Jesus apart from the others twice already—at the raising of Jairus' daughter and on the Mount of Transfiguration. On this occasion they failed to respond to the great trust He put in them, and looking upon Peter as he slept He said, " Simon, sleepest thou? couldest thou not watch one hour? " (Mk. 14.[37]). When the band, led by Judas, came to arrest Jesus, P. made a clumsy attempt at rescue, which only added to the difficulties of his Master, whose last miracle was wrought to undo the work of this impetuous follower. When Jesus was taken P. at first fled, but afterwards turned and followed afar off until they came to the judgment hall of Caiaphas. St. John gained him admission, and here took place the threefold denial, recorded by all the evangelists (Mw. 26.[57-75]; Mk. 14.[53-72]; Lk. 22.[54-62]; Jn. 18.[15-27]). He denied his acquaintance with Jesus with increasing vehemence, and seems to have forgotten all his protestations until Jesus turned and looked upon him, and he went out and wept bitterly. He now knew his weakness as he had never known it before, and he felt all the burning disgrace of his sin. After the denial P. is not mentioned till the morning of the Resurrection, when we find he is still the leader of the disciples, for Mary Magdalene, on finding the sepulchre empty, ran to him and John. John outstripped Peter in the race to the tomb, but Peter was the first to enter the sepulchre to assure himself that the Lord's body was not there (Jn. 20.[1-10]; Lk. 24.[12]). Later on the same day Jesus appeared to Peter privately (Lk. 24.[34]; 1 Cor. 15.[5]). Some time afterwards Jesus appeared to St. P. and other disciples in Galilee, when they were fishing (Jn. 21.[1-19]). St. John was the first to recognise the Lord, but no sooner had he named Him than St. P. sprang into the sea to go to his Master. On this occasion St. P. was publicly restored by Jesus, after he had been tested with special reference to his threefold denial. He was given his former place, and. as if to confirm it, Jesus said, " Follow Me," using the words He had employed when He first called him.

When the Lord had departed St. P. at once took the place to which he had been appointed as leader of the brethren, and proposed that one should be elected to the office from which Judas had fallen. Ten days after the Ascension, on the Day of Pentecost, St. P. stood out before the people on behalf of the apostles, proving that the gift of tongues was from God. On that day 3000 souls were added to the Lord, and the prophecy was notably fulfilled: " Upon this rock I will build My Church." Henceforth, with only two exceptions (Ac. 10.[5], 15.[14]), he is always called Peter in the Acts. From the Day of Pentecost St. P. manifested a courage which never flinched in the face of any opposition, and he who had been ashamed of Jesus before a servingmaid now defied the highest in the land in His service. We next find St. P. going with St. John to the Temple at the hour of prayer, and there healing a lame beggar, who asked for alms. This action, done in the name of the crucified Jesus, brought them into conflict with the rulers, and they were cast into prison (Ac. 4.[1-22]). On his examination by the Sanhedrin St. P. avowed Jesus, whom they had crucified, as the only Saviour (Ac. 4.[12]), and refused to obey them before God. The rulers, uncertain how to act, only threatened the apostles and let them go. St. P. is the chief actor in the scene in which Ananias and Sapphira are dealt with (Ac. 5.[1-11]), and his fame grew so great that the people brought their sick friends into the street so that his shadow might fall upon them with healing power. Again the Sadducees imprisoned the apostles, but the same night they were miraculously delivered, and next day, being found in the Temple, they were beaten and dismissed with a warning. After the martyrdom of St. Stephen, when the persecuted Christians were scattered, St. P. and St. John were sent by the apostles to Samaria, to superintend the work begun by Philip the evangelist (Ac. 8.[4-25]). The converts received the Holy Ghost in answer to the prayers of the apostles and upon the laying on of their hands. Here St. P. met and rebuked Simon Magus for his sordid view of spiritual things, urging him to repentance and prayer. Thereafter he, along with St. John, preached in the villages of Samaria and returned to Jerusalem. St. P. next undertook a journey of visitation of the churches, which is vaguely described by St. Luke as a journey "throughout all parts." Special mention is made of his visit to three places—Lydda, Joppa, Cæsarea. At Lydda he healed the paralytic Æneas, and at Joppa he raised from the dead Tabitha or Dorcas, a notable member of the Christian community (Ac. 9.[32-43]). Here he remained for some time in the house of one Simon, a tanner. Up to this point St. P. had preached the Gospel to Jews alone, and to those Gentiles who had conformed to the Jewish rites, but, while at Joppa, he was led to admit a Gentile to the rights and privileges of the Church. Cornelius, a Roman centurion, stationed at Cæsarea, was directed by vision to send for St. P., who at the same time was taught by vision to call nothing common or unclean. St. P. at once went to Cornelius, and while he was preaching at Cæsarea the Holy Ghost fell upon his hearers as on the Day of Pentecost, and he commanded that they should be baptized (Ac. 10.). He had to defend his conduct when he returned to Jerusalem, for the Jewish Christians felt that their peculiar position was being invaded. St. P. related all that had occurred and gained their assent, and they glorified God that to the Gentiles also He had granted repentance unto life (Ac. 11.[1-18]). Meanwhile the conversion of St. Paul had taken place, and the question of the relation of the Gentiles to the Church soon became acute. St. Paul states that three years after his conversion (i.e. about A.D. 38) he went up to Jerusalem "to visit Cephas, and tarried with him fifteen days" (Gal. 1.[18]). After this the narrative in Acts is concerned chiefly with St. Paul, and nothing is heard of St. P. till some years later, when persecution broke out afresh. Herod Agrippa thought to gain popularity among the Jews by persecuting the Christians, and he put St. James to death and cast St. P. into prison (Ac. 12.[1-19]). He was to be carefully guarded till the Passover was past, when he was to be brought forth to gratify the hatred of the people. But St. P. was miraculously delivered from prison by an angel, and made his way safely to the house of Mary, the mother of St. Mark, where a number of believers were gathered to pray for him. This would appear to be the house at which he lived when in Jerusalem, and his relation to St. Mark was a very close one (1 P. 5.[13]). From this "he departed and went to another place," of which there is no record. We find him next at the council in Jerusalem, A.D. 52 (Ac. 15.[1-29]; Gal. 2.[1-10]), where by his wise and conciliatory words he gained a unanimous decision in a great crisis in the history of the Church. St. Paul had first a private interview with James and Cephas and John, and it was agreed among them that each was to be allowed to follow the lines upon which he had been hitherto going. St. Paul's main work would be among the Gentiles, while St. P.'s work would be chiefly that of apostle of the circumcision. At the public meeting which followed St. P. reminded his audience of his own conduct in the past in this connection, and told them that God had given the Holy Spirit to the Gentiles as well as to themselves. This is the last mention of St. P. in the Acts. He had earned the right to the name which Jesus had given him, and had proved himself to be the rock on which the Church was built, and now he had prepared the way for other men. His character and training did not fit him for the work of the great apostle of the Gentiles, but he showed that he was in full sympathy with the work of St. Paul, and had helped to make the way open for him.

The only other references to St. P. in Scripture are in St. Paul's epistles, and in the two epistles of St. P. Some time after the Council in Jerusalem St. P. visited Antioch (Gal. 2.[11]), the centre of the Gentile Church, and showed his large-hearted charity by treating the Gentiles on an equality with his Jewish brethren; but under the influence of certain brethren who came down from Jerusalem he drew back and separated himself. St. Paul resisted St. P. to the face, for he saw the consequences of the action better than the others. St. P. had acted impulsively, as so often, and perhaps before he knew what he had done he stood condemned. But the older Christian listened to the hot rebuke of a younger and made no hasty reply, and in writing of St. Paul later he still felt able to describe him as his "beloved brother Paul" (2 P. 3.[15]). Tradition relates that St. P. laboured for a time in Syria, and for this much may be said, though we cannot feel confident about any of the details given of his ministry there. It seems probable that near the end of his life he went to Rome, and that he suffered martyrdom there in the Neronian persecution (A.D. 64). "It would be quite in keeping with his character if, after the storm which had swept over the Roman Church under Nero, he went to the city with the same faith-inspired resoluteness with which in earlier days he returned to Jerusalem from Galilee in order to recreate the Church. We cannot raise the veil which shrouds these events. But conjectures of this sort, and the assumption of such a last phase in P.'s life, are supported as much by his character as by the splendour of the enduring fame which he won for his name" (Weizsäcker). The Roman Church, in the interests of the Primacy, has sought to add to this fame. It speaks of him as the first bishop of Rome, ruling there for twenty-five years. This theory is based on quite insufficient evidence. St. P. was certainly held in high honour by the Church in Rome, but there is no proof that in his life he either received or claimed the greatness that has been thrust upon him. His high name and character need no help from fiction. He stands before the world as the chief of the apostles of Jesus Christ, whom he loved with a passionate devotion, and whom he served with a sincerity of purpose such as has never been surpassed. In reading the Gospels we feel that more care was given to his training than to that of any of the others, and the result justified the Master's wisdom, who saw what was in him at the first, and so dealt with him that St. P. himself and all men came to see it too.

Three books in the NT. are associated with the name of St. P. St. Mark is called by Papias "the interpreter of Peter," who wrote down what he remembered of the things which St. P. had told him about the sayings and deeds of Jesus.

The first epistle is addressed to the Christians who were scattered abroad, and is written from Babylon and sent by the hands of Silvanus. It is possible that St. P. had visited Babylon during that period of which we have no record, but it is commonly believed that by "Babylon" he means Rome, as in the Book of Revelation. The epistle was written to encourage those who were being called upon to endure persecution, and its tone throughout is hopeful. The trials will pass and the faithful will obtain the inheritance which is reserved in heaven for them. With this end in view they are urged to a life of holiness and mutual love, that the enemies of Christ may not be able to charge them with sin (1 P. 2.[12], 3.[16]). The example of Christ is held before them for encouragement, and if they suffer as Christians it is a matter for glorying rather than for regret.

The second epistle purports to be written to the same churches as the first. It claims to be by St. P., and to be written near the end of his life, but there is no book in the NT. whose authorship is more disputed than this. There is no evidence of its existence till the end of the second century, and the question of the Petrine authorship has to be decided on internal evidence alone. The majority of critics are adverse to its Petrine authorship, though it is still ably defended as genuine. The object of the epistle is to stir up the minds of its readers to remembrance of the words of the prophets and the commandment of Christ. The author, speaking in the name of St. P., knows that his time will not be long, for the martyrdom, which was prophesied by Jesus, will soon be accomplished. He wants them to have something to remember after his death, for false teachers and scoffers abound and shall increase. These are men of base mind, who are described with glowing words of passion in this epistle, for they are worse than those who believe not, who after they have known the way of righteousness turn back from the holy commandment. The author rebuts the sneer of those who mock their hope, and say that things will continue as they have continued from the beginning. So they thought immediately before the days of the Flood. The Lord delays out of mercy, "not wishing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." Let them think of these things and they need not be carried away with the error of the wicked, and, accounting the long-suffering of the Lord to be salvation, they shall be found in peace. See PETER, THE EPISTLES OF. JOHN DAVIDSON.

TRADITIONAL HOUSE OF SIMON THE TANNER

SIMON. (1) Simon Peter (see preceding article). (2) One of the twelve apostles surnamed "the Canaanite" (Mw. 10.[4]; Mk. 3.[18]). This, however, is only the Greek form of the Aram. word wh. is translated "Zelotes" in Lk. 6.[15]; Ac. 1.[13]. "The Zelot" was prob. a member of the extreme patriotic party known by this name. (3) One of the BRETHREN OF THE LORD (Mw. 13.[55]; Mk. 6.[3]). (4) Simon the leper (Mw. 26.[6]; Mk. 14.[3]). This man doubtless owed his healing to Jesus. While at supper in Simon's house in Bethany a woman brought an alabaster vessel of precious ointment; and, breaking the vessel, she poured the ointment on Jesus' head. The objection taken to this apparent waste He rebuked, commending the woman for the "good work" wrought on him. (5) A native of Cyrene, in N. Africa, who was compelled to assist in carrying the Cross with Jesus (Mw. 27.[32], &c.). (6) A Pharisee in whose house transpired the scene recorded in Lk. 7.[36ff.]. Certain resemblances in the nar. suggest that this may be a different account of the event related in Mw. 26.[6]; Mk. 14.[3]. But the differences are probably too great to permit of identification. (7) The father of Judas Iscariot (Jn. 6.[71], &c.). (8) Simon Magus (see MAGUS). (9) The tanner in Joppa, with whom Simon Peter lodged, on the roof of whose house the vision was seen, and whence he was called to CORNELIUS (Ac. 9.[43]–10.).

SIN. (1) The Nature of Sin.—In the Bible sin is always represented as a want of conformity to the will of God. To define sin with strictness is no easy task, but it cannot even be described except by reference to the will or the law of God wh. it contravenes. There is a standard outside of the mind from wh. sin departs. Thus St. John lays down the principle that "sin is lawlessness" (1 Jn. 3.[4]); and St. Paul confesses, "I had not known sin . . . except the law had said, Thou shall not covet" (Rm. 7.[7]). The law, however, is no abstract or impersonal entity; it is the expressed will of the living God. It is God speaking to man; and therefore sin is defection from Himself, not merely from His commandments. There are, of course, various names for sin in the Old and New Testaments, but all the chief ones indicate a divergence or aberration from the right path, and that path is uniformly regarded as being determined by the Divine will. The Bible nowhere attempts to prove that it is God's will by opposition to wh. sin is constituted; that, for religion, is self-evident. Hence the modern fashion of accentuating the offence done by sin to a man's own nature, or the wrong inflicted by it on society, is scarcely in harmony with Scripture. It does not deny these aspects, certainly; but, being a book of religion from end to end, it is pre-occupied with the direct bearing of moral evil on God Himself. How significant is the Psalmist's cry of penitence: "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned" (Ps. 51.[4]). One consequence is that the Bible represents a man's knowledge of sin as proportionate to his knowledge of God; for a deepened realisation of God's purity and spirituality drew after it inevitably a deeper sense of what man must be to have fellowship with Him. Once the nature of God has been revealed as absolutely holy, man is condemned as sinful throughout, not merely in a part of his life, in disposition or character, not merely in particular acts (cp. Is. 6.). The limiting case of this principle is given in the Christian gospel. The Person of Jesus, in whom God is finally made known, is also the final exposure of human sin.

From the narrative of the Fall, contemplated in the point of view of religion rather than of history, we may learn much as to the mental character of sin. Transgression is not due simply to the strength of sensuous desire, for this desire is an integral element in human life, in itself neither good nor bad. There is no transgression until man chooses to gratify impulse in defiance of a higher intimation, thus asserting his own will as the rule of action against the known will of God. The sinner, in short, elects to be a law to himself, and he does so because of his deceptive expectation that to break away from the Divine ordinance will bring a heightening of life. So he puts himself in the place of God, having first conceived a mistrust of the mind of God towards him. From this angle we perceive the sordid character of sin no less than its moral guilt. It is putting self where God or Christ ought to be.

Nevertheless the Bible does not give, nor does it profess to give, a complete psychological account of why man sins. That is, from the nature of things, impossible. For we are confronted with that primary self-determination of the human will behind wh. no analysis can go, and without wh. moral life can neither be nor be conceived; and in its actual working there is insoluble mystery. Sin cannot be explained; it is the one sheerly unintelligible thing in all the universe, and we can only register the fact. The Bible acknowledges this, indeed, by its so frequent allusions to diabolic agency. For, whatever more, the idea of a devil is tantamount to the assertion that sin cannot be transparently interpreted in terms of human motive. There operates in the sinner's mind a dread factor of utterly inscrutable perversity.

(2) The Prevalence of Sin.—On this point, the harmonious and distinct teaching of the Bible is that sin is universal. Explicit declarations are not wanting, but still more striking are certain tacit assumptions. Thus in the New Testament the universality of sin is taken for granted by Jesus, who, like the Baptist, opens His public ministry with a call to repentance. And even He spoke no more awfully significant word than this: "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children" (Mw. 7.[11]). The most elaborate discussion is that of St. Paul, who in the first two chapters of Romans arraigns mankind—the Gentiles first, then the Jews —ending with the verdict: "All have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God" (3.[23]).

This, however, is not the same thing as saying that all men are equally sinful; and in point of fact the Bible never says so. Degrees of sin are constantly insisted on. It shall be more tolerable, said Jesus, for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for Capernaum, where His mighty works were done. The servant that knew his lord's will, and made not ready, shall be beaten with many stripes; he that knew not, with few. Many feel a delicacy in imitating the language of the Bible as to distinct shades of sinfulness; it appears to them like claiming merit for the imperfect if they assert the relative reality of human virtue apart from Christ, and the graduated heinousness of sinful character. Yet here also the Bible is wiser and truer to experience. It speaks of men with perfect frankness as better and worse.

St. Paul seeks for a reason of the universality of sin, and apparently finds it (the passage is obscure) in the fact that all the sins of mankind are but the unfolding, the detailed particulars, of the initial or germinal sin of Adam (Rm. 5.). Traditional theology has fixed upon this theory, as if it were the Biblical account par excellence of the presence of sin in life. But even St. Paul has other points of view. He can explain sin, and redemption from sin, without in the least touching on the question of man's relation to Adam; a relation, be it noted, which is nowhere referred to by Jesus. The problem of what sin is can and ought to be kept distinct from the problem of its first appearance. Thus the apostle in various passages points to the flesh as being, actually and universally, the occasion of sin; for the flesh is creaturely weakness, and man's possession of a fleshly nature creates a necessity to sin if it meet with no stronger resistance than he can offer apart from the help of God's Spirit. The flesh, therefore, is our trial, but it is not our fate. But as matter of fact, in every man the flesh is actually sinful. The individual receives a nature in wh. the relation between the higher elements and the lower is somehow wrong from the first; and self-scrutiny reveals to him a sinfulness of nature of which individual sins are but symptoms. The constitution with wh. he starts has a fault in it, the roots of wh. go away back beyond the limits of conscious life. Moreover, Scripture has much to say about our connection with a sinful race. Moral evil touches the individual through the organic social whole of wh. he is a part. There is a common fund of sinfulness out of wh. all men draw, and into wh. all in turn pay. The single life is never isolated. But Scripture supplements and modifies this principle of the social character of sin in three ways. First, Ezekiel makes it clear that no man shall die for any sin but his own. The guilt of the fathers reaches and embraces the children only when the children are like the fathers, and freely enter on the evil heritage. Second, a man's relation to God is the most real thing about him—more real, immediate, and potent than any ancestral or social bias to evil from wh. he suffers. Third, our sense of responsibility is quickened by the reminder that we, by the moral quality of our lives, are contributors to the environment in wh. the next generation will live.

(3) The Consequences of Sin.—Sin, according to the Bible, always renders a man answerable to God; or, to put it otherwise, sin involves guilt. The simplest expression for this is probably the word "debt," as in the Lord's Prayer. It is a debt, moreover, which we can never discharge; as Jesus said, we can never do more than it is our duty to do; no surplusage of good works exists from wh. failure can be made good. Guilt is brought home to conscience in undeniable ways, and manifests itself chiefly in shame and fear, wh. testify to the wrath of God abiding on the sinner. Fear, more especially, is the apprehension with wh. the transgressor looks forward to evil, connecting it instinctively with his sin, feeling dimly that by a higher ordinance, over wh. he has no control, sin and evil or suffering are linked together. On evil as a consequence of sin Scripture lays an arresting emphasis. Not that a specific penalty is kept for each specific sin, all down the list; but sin never fails to bring evil of some kind in its train. Loss of communion with God; social misery; the emptiness and pain of defeated desire; the frailty of the body and a thousand ills that flesh is heir to; all these are connected penally with sin, and all are but the harbingers of death, wh. everywhere in the Bible has a unique prominence as the specific punishment of human transgression. "The wages of sin is death." Life is always viewed as a good gift from God, and its withdrawal as privation and penalty. Death robs existence of all that makes it worth having, and ushers man into the final stage of his destiny, in wh. he is separated from God.

The bare doctrine, often alleged to be Scriptural, that mortality is a consequence of sin, is faced by peculiar difficulties at the present day. It is virtually impossible to believe that man, if he has a physical nature at all, and is not pure spirit, owes death to the entrance of sin into the world, and would not have suffered physical dissolution had he not transgressed. This is to deny his real relation to a material world. But from 1 Cor. 15.[44-48] we can see that the core of St. Paul's teaching on this subject resides rather in the conviction that death, as we sinners know it, is the effect of sin; and this is indeed a thought worthy of all acceptation. Apart from sin, death would not have been the thing of horror and anguish that it is; it would not have been an indignity and poignant humiliation; for then it would have lacked the sting imparted to it by sin. Death, then, as become what it is in our experience, has a specific character which it owes to sin; but for those who believe in Jesus this sting, this sense of guilt and dread of judgment, is removed.

There is one consequence of sin wh. at first sight appears to be permanently hopeless, until we examine it more closely. This is man's sheer inability to cease from sinning. Of the fact there can be no doubt at all; appeals to men to regenerate themselves are vain; the Ethiopian cannot change his skin, nor the leopard his spots. Yet man is capable of redemption. Not only so; the relation of God to the sinner is not merely one of condemnation; it is, behind and above and beyond that, a relation of faithful and unpurchasable love. And one of His chief instruments in reclaiming men is just the sense of impotence, of complete inability to redeem himself, that visits the transgressor's heart. This is the first step to emancipation; it is one point in the soul to wh. salvation can be attached. "When he came to himself he said . . . I will arise and go to my father"; "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in Me is thy help." H. R. Mackintosh.

Wady Gharandel (? Elim)

SINAI. The sublime, triple-headed mountain which for centuries has borne the name of Sinai, situated in the granite district called in the Bible Horeb, that is, "the desolate," was the scene of God's proclamation of His Law to the children of Israel. We cannot allow that any other spot can advance a claim to compare with that of this wondrous site. Its north-westerly peak, the Ras Ṣafṣāfeh, rises sheer from the plain Er-Rāḥah, i.e. "the Rest," a plain which is enclosed by granite mountains on every side. Mount Serbal, on the other hand, which some scholars maintain as a rival site, cannot so well fulfil the conditions required, as though there is a large plain in its vicinity, formed by an expansion of the Wādy esh-Sheikh, yet the mountain and plain are there separated by a succession of low hills stretching for several miles. The advocates of Serbal point out that the Wady Feiran, close by it, has a perennial stream which makes it the most charming oasis in the Peninsula. But having spent six months of my life at the traditional site, I am able to report that the plain Er-Rāḥah is capable of containing many thousand tents, being 400 acres in extent, with 230 more at the mouths of two wadies. Besides several perennial springs at the Monastery, a stream runs down during the rainy season from the Wādy ed-Deir, and loses itself in the sand of the plain, so there must be a great store of water underneath, which may be had by digging. Etymology is also against the claim of Serbal. Feirān is evidently Paran, the letter "p" being represented in Arabic by "f," and this district being also the Rephidim of Ex. 17.[1], it is evident that it cannot also be Sinai, to which the Israelites journeyed later.

As for the latest theory, which would place Mount Sinai somewhere near Edom, it rests on the songs of Deborah and Habakkuk, and on the discovery of a name like Midian in that region. But the narratives in Exodus and Numbers agree so well with the journey from Suez to the traditional site, that it would require arguments less vague than poetic allusions to set them aside. The number of stages by which the Israelites travelled to Sinai after crossing the Red Sea is given in Nu. 33.[8-15] as ten, corresponding to those prescribed in Murray's Handbook for Egypt; the journey from Horeb by way of Mt. Seir to Kadesh-barnea is explicitly stated in Dt. 1.[2] to be eleven days; the Israelites, encumbered as they were, seem to have taken twenty-one (Nu. 33.[16-36]). The fifth encampment after leaving Egypt is said to have been by the Red Sea (Nu. 33.[10]), and every traveller by the traditional route can vouch for its accuracy; whereas by the new theoretical route, it would be hard to encamp by the sea in the midst of the wilderness of Tih. As for Midian, the tribes called by that name were simply wandering Bedouin, whose descendants to-day are ready to oblige a traveller with any name he may wish. One might as well build a theory on the undoubted name of Wādy Hebrān, in close proximity to Jebel Mūsa. We are not aware that any mountain has yet been found near Edom which fulfils all the required conditions. And is it possible that the Jewish people ever forgot the locality of the giving of the Law?

Convent Garden, Sinai

Curelly asserts that the monks transferred the sacred places from Feiran to Jebel Mūsa after the Saracenic conquest. Yet in reading the narrative of St. Sylvia of Aquitaine, who visited these sacred places between A.D. 385 and 388, I can verify every detail which she mentions, from my own personal observations at Jebel Mūsa. And how can Justinian's fortifications of the present Convent be placed more than a century after his death?

Ras Ṣafṣâfeh

The mountain mass, then, stands at the highest point of the Peninsula, and forms the crown of one of the most glorious ranges in the world. It is composed of pink granite, doubtless a continuation of that Egyptian stratum known as Syenite, which is so evident at the first cataract of the Nile. Being harder than the Peterhead variety, it is very trying to travellers' boots, and gives point to the statement in Dt. 29.5: "Thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot," and Dt. 8.4: "Neither did thy foot swell these forty years." From an elevated platform, 1000 ft. above the Monastery, rise three peaks, of which the highest is Mt. St. Catherine (8536 ft.), the second Jebel Mūsa, "Mt. of Moses" (7375 ft.), and the lowest the Ras Ṣafṣâfeh ("Peak of the Willow"). Nothing more sublimely beautiful can be seen in this world than a sunset from the Convent garden. The rosy glow on the mountain-tops, gradually giving way before the rising darkness, reminds one irresistibly of "the glory of the Lord." Another splendid effect is produced by the moonlight with its dark shadows, and a starlight night has a charm of its own. But who can tell of the storm, with its ink-black cloud, of the lightning and the thunder reverberating from the granite cliffs, and its sound of many waters in impromptu cataracts?

Barren as the district now is, it must once have been able to support more life than it does at present. Captain Palmer thinks its deterioration is owing to the gradual cutting down of trees, and that the year spent there by the Israelites may have been an unusually rainy season. I once found, near Serabit-el-Kadeem, some blades of grass pathetically trying to push through the sand, as well as a number of tiny violets. At present there is no vegetation but desert herbs, mostly aromatic, which furnish food for camels, and for a few sheep and goats. As there were once 360 monasteries established in this Peninsula, and many anchorites, it is evident that there must have been more cultivation. The present monastery, "The Convent" as it is called, was built and fortified by Justinian. It has a garden, carefully tended, in terraces, which is being added to by degrees. The monks employ the Bedouin, of whom there are four principal tribes, and some smaller ones, to carry grain, &c., for them from Tôr. There are two wells of delicious spring water inside the building, one in the garden and one half-way up the face of the hill, on the sheep-path called by the Arabs sikket Seydna Mūsa, "the way of our Lord Moses."

Ras Ṣafṣāfeh and Plain of Er-Rāḥah

The church inside the Convent walls is very richly decorated, and contains many interesting paintings. In the apse is an alabaster coffin, enclosing the bones of St. Catherine, as well as two silver sarcophagi, inlaid with precious stones, presented by the two Russian Empresses of this name. Beneath the apse is shown the "chapel of the Burning Bush," as identified in the fourth century by the Empress Helena. In the surrounding wadies one still sees the little tree called acacia seyyāl, the only thorn-tree of this desert, corresponding to the ṣeneh of Ex. 3.[2, 3, 4], and we see no reason to doubt the tradition, that at one of the wells inside the convent Moses watered the flocks of Jethro. The services which forty years later he required from Hobab, are just such as a modern dragoman needs from a local Bedawy sheikh, who knows from long experience which side of a sand-hill will afford the best protection from the wind.

The Convent library contains about 2000 Greek MSS., catalogued by Gardthausen; nearly 600 Arabic MSS., catalogued by the present writer in 1893; and 250 Syrian MSS., catalogued by her sister, Mrs. Lewis, in the same year. Since the former monks parted with the famous Codex Sinaiticus, discovered here by Tischendorff in 1844, now at St. Petersburg, the chief treasure of the library is the Syriac Palimpsest of the Four Gospels, discovered by Mrs. Lewis in 1892; we may also mention as of high value two Palestinian Syriac Lectionaries of the Gospels; a magnificent Greek MS. of Eusebius (Eccl. Hist.), a beautiful little Syriac MS. of some of Mar Ephraim's Hymns, and the Syriac Apology of Aristides, discovered by Dr. Rendel Harris in 1889. Of late years a great improvement has been carried out in the library. The ex-Archbishop made structural alterations, and his enlightened successor has introduced European methods.

The usual road for ascending Jebel Mūsa is by the "Way of our Lord Moses," and is about as steep as can be imagined. At a height of about 1000 ft. above the Convent one turns up to the right and passes the remains of several ancient gates, which pilgrims in the Middle Ages used to go through, after confession and absolution, singing the 24th Psalm. We next arrive at a plateau, in which we find a chapel over the cave of Elijah. To our left rises Jebel Mūsa, up which stairs have been cut in the rock, its summit crowned by a ruined church and a dilapidated mosque. On our right hand rises the still steeper Ras Safṣāfeh, which, being free from mediæval traditions, has no stairs to assist us, so that we have to crawl over boulders; and when we reach its top we look sheer down on the plain below. No one who has ever stood on that giddy height will pay much attention to modern theories disputing its identity, but will realise that Nature and Scripture singularly coincide. That the cloud veiling the Deity rested on Jebel Mūsa, and that from the edge of the Ras Ṣafṣāfeh the Hebrew prophet spoke to the tribes gathered on the plain below, his voice being distinctly heard by them, can hardly admit of contradiction.

All the granite mountains of this region are being gradually disintegrated, partly by the frosts of winter, but still more by the heat of summer, so that the slopes and wadies are covered with boulders and débris. A few days' heavy rain brings down the water in torrents, there being no vegetation to hold it, and causes what the Arabs call a seil, Scottice "spate," which carries everything before it, and fills the wadies to the height of 6 or even 10 ft. For this reason camping-grounds are chosen a little above the bed of the wadies. The 90th Psalm bears signs of having been written in this region: "Thou carriest them away as with a flood." "In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth," applies to the vegetation on the plain Er-Rāḥah, which after a day's rain puts on a lovely but evanescent green. In many of the wadies the want of flowers is compensated by the variegated colours of the stones; grey granite from Serbal, pink granite from Sinai, porphyry, quartz, &c., blending their tints harmoniously together. MARGARET D. GIBSON.

SINEW. In Gn. 32.[32] an explanation is given of the reason why the Jews abstain from eating "the sinew of the hip" (RV.), i.e. the sciatic muscle, of animals slain for food. It is a powerful muscle, necessary for control of the limb, damage to wh. is at once obvious in a halting gait. God's touch was taken to have rendered it sacred.

SINIM (Heb. Ṣīnīm, Is. 49.[12]). Since the suggestion that S. means China was made by Gesenius it has had very general support. More recently this view has been impugned. It is clear fm. the context that S. must either be in the extreme south or the extreme east; the latter of these wd. be satisfied by the hypothesis of Ges.; it does not imply intercourse, for the name of the great empire of the far East may have percolated to the nearer East. Bottles have been found in Egp. with Chinese inscriptions, but these are of too recent a date to afford any evidence of commerce in the days of Isaiah, or of the Exile. Another suggestion worthy of consideration is that S. means Syene. The presence of a community of Israelites there within a century after the Exile may be supposed to make this identification more plausible. It is difficult to see how Seweneh became Ṣīnīm. Dillman's arguments agst. S. being China are not convincing. It may be regarded as an insoluble problem.

SINITE, a Canaanite people, not identd. (Gn. 10.[17]; 1 Ch. 1.[15]).

SIN OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

SION. (1) A name applied to Hermon (Dt. 4.[48]). It may perhaps denote the peak of the mountain as seen from the south. On the other hand it may be a scribal error for SIRION, the Sidonian name for Hermon. It is so taken by the Syr. (2) See JERUSALEM, Zion.

SIPHMOTH, a city, prob. in the S. of Judah, to wh. David sent a portion of the spoil taken fm. the Amalekites (1 S. 30.[28]): unidentd.

SIPPAI, a Philistine giant slain by Sibbecai the Hushathite, at Gob (1 Ch. 20.[4]; 2 S. 21.[18], Saph).

SIRAH (Heb. ṣīrāh, "turning aside"), the well or cistern near Hebron whence Abner was brought back by the messengers of Joab (2 S. 3.[26]). It may be ident. with 'Ain Sārah, over a mile and a half to the NW. of Hebron.

SIRION. This was the name given to Mt. Hermon by the Phœnicians (Dt. 3.[9]). It is possible that, like SENIR, it may have applied to some definite part of the range. But it may quite well have been the Phœnician name for the whole mountain, as seen fm. the heights behind Sidon.

SISERA. (1) Captain of the host of king JABIN of HAZOR, who oppressed Israel for twenty years (Jg. 4.[1-4]). It is perhaps straining the language of chap. 5.[19] to infer, as some have done, that Sisera was himself a king. But there is nothing impossible in the supposition that he may have been a vassal of Jabin. His headquarters were at HAROSHETH, and the main strength of his army appears to have been in "nine hundred chariots of iron." The ground chosen for battle with the forces under DEBORAH and BARAK was the great plain of Esdraelon, where the chariots could be employed effectively. Clearly Sisera had not apprehended the coming storm. Under a heavy rain the rich soil of the plain goes swiftly to deep, clinging mud. As the Israelites moved down from Tabor to the conflict, the rainstorm did nothing to impede the light-footed highlandmen. The horses and chariots, sinking in the soft mud, were reduced to helplessness, and fell an easy prey to their foes. In their despairing efforts to escape many threw themselves into the Kishon, wh. had come down in spate, and were swept away. Sisera fled on foot from the field where all was lost, and, taking shelter in the tent of Jael, was there done to death. The last verses of Deborah's song (Jg. 5.[28ff.]) present a pathetic picture of his mother, waiting in vain for the return of her gallant son.

There are certain differences in the story as told in chap. 4. and in chap. 5. These, however, are neither greater nor more numerous than we might naturally expect in compositions so diverse in character. Chap. 4. is a plain prose narrative; chap. 5. is a piece of exultant poetry. The poem is by universal admission far older than the prose in its present form. We can hardly doubt that the compiler of the prose was acquainted with the song. If Jabin is not mentioned in the latter, we may presume it is because he was not present at the battle with wh. the song is concerned. But some would infer that two traditions, one referring to Jabin, and one to Sisera, have been combined, and to make them agree Sisera has been called the captain of Jabin's host. The inference does not seem to be justified.

(2) Head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[53]; Ne. 7.[55]).

SISMAI, AV. SISAMAI, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2.[40]).

SITHRI, AV. ZITHRI, a Kohathite Levite, son of Uzziel (Ex. 6.[22]).

SITNAH, "enmity," or "hatred," the name given by Isaac to a well digged by his herdmen, the scene of strife with the herdmen of Gerar (Gn. 26.[21]). It may be ident. with the well at Sādi, a little to the E. of Ruḥeibeh (Rohoboth).

SIVAN, the third month of the later Jewish calendar. See Year.

SKIRT, in OT. usually means what we intend by the skirt or train of a garment. In Ps. 133.[2] the Heb. peh (AV. "skirt") may be more appropriately rendered "collar" (RV.).

SKULL, PLACE OF A. See Golgotha.

SLAVE, SLAVERY, SERVANT. The word "slave" was originally a national appellative signifying the large numbers of Slavonic peoples (Slavs) who were reduced to servitude by the Teutons (see Skeat, Ety. Dict. s.v.). The word is rare in our English versions—in AV. only in Jr. 2.[14] in italics (i.e. without a corresponding word in the original), and Rv. 18.[13] (σῶματα); in Eng. RV. (1881) and American RV. (1901), in Dt. 21.[14], 24.[7]; Jr. 2.[14]; Rv. 18.[13]. The word rendered "servant" (Heb. עֶבֶד, Gr. δοῦλος, οἰκέτης, παῖς, θεράπων) corresponds more accurately to "slave." The ancient Hebrew civilisation, like that of Assyria and Babylonia, rested on a mild form of slavery, chiefly connected with the cultivation of the soil. The OT. presupposes slavery, and actually represents the curse of Canaan as servitude to his brethren (Gn. 9.[25-27]); and Esau was before his birth destined to serve his brother (Gn. 25.[23]). It allows, sometimes, the women and children of conquered tribes to be reduced to slavery, and, to a more limited extent, permits the enslavement of Hebrews to Hebrews. The descendants of the conquered Canaanites were utilised as slaves (1 K. 9.[20f.]). The slave was reckoned as "property," whether he was "born in the house" or "bought with money."

The Sources of Slavery in the OT. were: (1) War.—This was the most fruitful source, because of the desolation caused by war, as well as the captives who became slaves. (It was an upward step in civilisation when slavery was substituted for slaughter of the captives.) Unhappily among the Israelites the whole population of a captured city was often "devoted to Jehovah," i.e. killed, men, women, and children (Dt. 20.[16]; Jo. 6.[17]; 1 S. 15.[3], 22.[19]; 2 K. 15.[16]). In Nu. 31.[9f.] all the males, both adult and infant, are slain, unmarried women and female infants alone saved; in 2 S. 12.[31] David spared all for slaves (cp. also Dt. 20.[10f.], 21.[10f.]). (2) Debt (2 K. 4.[1]; Am. 2.[6], 8.[6]; Ne. 5.[5]). (3) Poverty (Lv. 25.[39]). (4) Paternal authority, but only in case of a marriageable daughter (Ex. 21.[7]). (5) Thieves (Ex. 22.[2f.]); (6) Purchase, "bought with money" (Lv. 25.[45]). (7) Sons of slaves "born in house" (Gn. 14.[14]). (8) Kidnapping (Ex. 21.[16]; Dt. 24.[7]; cp. Gn. 37.[26]).

Slave Legislation.—We have in the OT. three slave codes: (1) the Covenant code (Ex. 21.[2-11]); (2) Deuteronomic (Dt. 15.[12-18]); (3) Priestly code (Lv. 25.[39-55]).

Pre-exilian, found in the first two, which contemplate only Hebrew slaves: (1) Male.—The term of service is definitely fixed as six years; in the seventh he shall go out "free for nothing," on which Dt. advances, requiring the master not to allow the slave to depart "empty" (15.[13]), but to furnish him "liberally" (15.[14]), lest he should experience destitution worse than slavery. If the slave entered the service married his wife was to go out free with her husband: if he entered unmarried and was given a wife by his master, he was to go out alone, leaving his wife and family with the master. Of this, however, the Dt. code says nothing, thereby either tacitly assuming its validity or implying it had fallen into desuetude, to remain so. In case the slave voluntarily decided to remain for love of his master, or of his wife and family, or for fear of destitution, the master was to bring him to God (אֶל־הָאֱלֹהִים Ex. 21.[6]; see commentaries ad. loc.), and pierce his ear to the door or door-post, thereby making him a bondman in perpetuity (Ex. 21.[6]; Dt. 15.[17])—a custom common among the Arabs, the pierced ear being a sign of slavery. (2) Female.—According to the Covenant code, if a man sold his daughter she could not go out free at the end of six years as the men slaves. Her master is to take her as a concubine for himself, after which, if she ceases to please him, he must let her be redeemed, having no power to sell her to non-Israelites; or he may give her to his son for concubine, in which case she receives the rights of a daughter. But if, after having taken her for himself, the master take another wife, he is forbidden to diminish her food, raiment, or marital rights. In case of non-compliance with any of these conditions the girl is to be released "without money." The Dt. code, though harsher in one point, extending the piercing of the ear to women who elected to remain (15.[17]), provides for the release of the female as of the male at the expiration of the six years; neither did she go "empty."

Post-exilian code (Lv. 25.[39-55]). This provides for both (a) Hebrews, and (b) non-Hebrews, also for service to Hebrew and to non-Hebrew masters. Note, there is no special legislation for the female; we have here probably an advance in civilisation, when slave concubinage was growing obsolete. (a) Hebrews (1) under Hebrew masters. The sabbatical (seventh) year has been replaced by the year of jubilee (fiftieth), at the end of which every man is to return to his possession (Lv. 25.[10]). In the jubilee year the slave is to depart with his family and to the possession of his fathers (25.[41]). Though the service is longer there is a marked amelioration in conditions; the lot of the "slave" is to approximate that of the "hired servant" or "sojourner" (v. 40); he is not to be ruled over with rigour (v. 43); the sale is limited (v. 42); he is protected from want on release (v. 41); the demand for slaves is to be supplied from the foreign slave markets (v. 44); or from the children of strangers sojourning in the land (v. 45). (2) Hebrews with non-Hebrew masters (Lv. 25.[47-55]) may be redeemed by their immediate family, or next of kin, or they may redeem themselves (25.[48, 49]), the redemption price being calculated on the basis of the original price paid and the number of years to run before jubilee (25.[50-53]). If unredeemed, he with his family shall go out in the jubilee year (25.[54]). His Israelitish brethren are to exercise vigilance that the foreign master treat not a Hebrew harshly (25.[53]). (b) Foreign slaves, with Hebrew masters (Lv. 25.[44-46]), are regarded as a "possession" (25.[45]), capable of being transmitted, "an inheritance for your children" (25.[46]); their servitude is to continue in perpetuity (25.[46]). There is no injunction against ruling over them with rigour.

That these laws were neglected or deliberately violated by the rich we learn from Jr. 34.[8f.]. When Jerusalem was surrounded by the Babylonian army Jeremiah persuaded king Zedekiah to proclaim liberty according to the Dt. code (not Ex. 21.[2f.], for cp. Jr. 34.[9], where the maid was to be freed also)—an order with which the princes and people complied, but immediately changed their minds and reduced their brethren again to servitude. The Jews became more tractable after the lessons of the Exile, so that the efforts of Nehemiah (Ne. 5.[1f.]) were crowned with success, the Hebrew slaves of foreigners being first redeemed (5.[8]), and then their brethren at home were freed.

Treatment of Slaves naturally varied much with individual slave owners, but on the whole, both in the earlier and the later periods of Jewish history—and indeed in Semitic history generally—more humanity was shown to slaves than under the Greek and Roman civilisations, and with the Hebrews this humanity was based not on philosophical but on religious grounds; they were all "servants of Yahweh." We often find the heartiest relations between master and slave. Eliezer of Damascus is presumed in default of issue to be the heir of Abraham (Gn. 15.[2f.]), and later he is entrusted with the delicate mission of procuring a wife for his master's son (24.[2]). Saul's servant gave his master advice, upon which the master acted, and borrowed the prophet's fee (¼ shekel of silver) from the servant, thus showing that the servant might even accumulate property (1 S. 9.[5ff.]). In 1 Chr. 2.[34] Sheshan, having no male issue, gave one of his daughters to an Egyptian servant. The slave was incorporated with the Hebrew family, and human brotherhood was more than an idle theory. In other Semitic countries we find approximately the same phenomena. It is likely that many a wretch died from overwork and maltreatment in the great engineering works of antiquity, especially under the warlike Assyrians: and the Hebrew race had a lively recollection of the hard tasks of Egypt (Ex. 1.[11f.]). But there is another side. Joseph, a Hebrew slave, became prime minister and chancellor of one of the Pharaohs. An unnamed Hebrew maid was on good terms with her mistress, the wife of Naaman. The Israelites in Babylonian exile were allowed to retain slaves (Ez. 2.[65]), and so kindly were they treated many preferred to remain. Compare also the favourable conditions reflected in Jr. 29.[5-7]. Discipline without harshness is recommended by Sr. 33.[24ff.] (cp. Pr. 29.[21]).

Privileges (see also under Legislation).—The slave had his rights as a member of society. If a master maltreat a servant so that he die before a day has elapsed the master is to be surely punished (Ex. 21.[20]); if a day or more elapse the loss of the servant is regarded as punishment enough. This distinction between slave and free is removed in Lv. 24.[17]. If a servant's tooth or eye is injured he is entitled to freedom (Ex. 21.[26, 27]). The runaway is not to be surrendered (Dt. 23.[15]); a captive concubine cannot be sold (Dt. 21.[14]). All the slaves were circumcised (Gn. 17.[12, 13, 23]), a rite which must have continued to avoid "uncleanness." The slave is allowed his Sabbath (Ex. 20.[10], 23.[12]; Dt. 5.[14]); takes his part in the Passover (Dt. 16.[11, 14]), and in other sacrifices and feasts (Dt. 12.[12, 18]).

Religious Usage.—The titles "bondservant" or "slave" and "handmaid" (אמה and עבד) were employed even by people in good circumstances about themselves in social intercourse with superiors or equals. From this the term was ennobled to the designation of one conspicuous in God's service, e.g. applied to Moses while alive (Nu. 12.[7]) and when dead (Dt. 34.[5]; Jo. 1.[1]); to the prophets (Is. 20.[3]; Jr. 7.[25]; Am. 3.[7]; cp. עבד in Lexicons); apparently to angels (Jb. 4.[18]); and to "the Branch" (Zc. 3.[8]). This usage was taken up in the NT., especially by Paul, who sometimes applies δοῦλος to himself to express one aspect of Christian living, just as God is sometimes addressed as δεσπότης, "the master of slaves."

New Testament Times.—The NT. is historically set in the midst of the Græco-Roman civilisation which was built upon slavery. Athenæas tells us there were 400,000 slaves to 21,000 freemen in Athens, and 460,000 in Corinth. Alexander the Great sold 30,000 women and children after the taking of Thebes, and his father Philip sold the population of conquered Olynthus. Troops of slave-dealers followed the Roman legions, the prisoners after each victory being put up for sale. Thus in the war with Pyrrhus, after the victory of Æmilius Paullus 150,000 captives were sold. We read of Cæsar selling 63,000 Gauls at once, and after the destruction of Jerusalem 97,000 Jews were sold. In the time of Augustus one Roman freedman left 4116 slaves. In NT. times it is estimated the ratio of slaves to free was two or three to one. How demoralising slavery was for both master and slave in Greece may be seen in the dramas of Plautus and Terence, which depict Greek society. But it was under Rome that slavery justified its existence best politically and economically, while at the same time it worked the greatest moral degradation both for slave and slave-owner. The treatment was inhuman, though legislation slowly stepped in to ameliorate, and frequent manumissions lightened despair. Most of the great minds of antiquity were indifferent to the moral evils of slavery. Aristotle, "the master of them that know," regarded slavery as necessary and natural, and for the mutual good of both parties; and the "divine Plato," while disapproving of the servitude of Greeks to Greeks, accepted slavery as necessary. On the other side stand Euripides, whose large-hearted humanity perceived the good qualities even in slaves; Dio Chrysostom, who condemned the institution as violating the natural rights of man; and Seneca, who preached kindness.

In the atmosphere of the Gospels we find a contrast to the outside world. No doubt the religious and social rights enjoyed by the slave in ancient Israel were continued in the time of our Lord. But slavery is not conspicuous in the Gospels; our Lord seems to come very little in contact with it, though He evidently knew the terrors and cruelty shown toward slaves (Lk. 12.[46]; Mw. 25.[30]). The slaves of His time were mostly foreigners or of mixed blood, and the proportion of slave to free was not so alarming as in the surrounding pagan world. Christ never denounced slavery or commanded its abolition: He gave no specific instructions either to the slave or the master. He intended the enlightening principles of His Gospel for the poor and the meek ones to work as a leaven in the social mass, and restored to labour its true dignity. It is still more striking that Paul, who knew the evils of slavery in the Roman empire better than any preacher of his day, and was second to none in the power of interpreting the spirit of his master, left this terrible scourge undenounced. Though he was familiar with the brutalising influence of the institution, and many of his converts belonged to the slave class, he never gives slaves any encouragement to disobey or run away. He accepted slavery as a necessary phenomenon of the then state of social progress; it was not to be immediately uprooted but ameliorated. He realised that it would have been ruinous both for master and slave to break the bonds before both classes received a patient Christian education. Without mentioning slavery, he everywhere lashed the moral evils which were the concomitants of the institution. He did not begin by dismantling the structure, but attacked it at its foundations by preaching the brotherhood of man, the equality before One who is no respecter of persons. His view was that Christians ought to remain at that time in whatever estate Providence had assigned them (1 Cor. 7.[20-24]). In Eph. 6.[5f.] and Col. 3.[22f.], he reminded both slaves and masters of their duties in Christ; in Phm. he advises with a Christian master; and in the Pauline spirit the Pastorals give us the slave's duty (1 Tm. 6.[1f.]; Tt. 2.[9]). The master was to be the bondman and the slave the freeman of Christ, in whose Gospel there was neither bond nor free (Gal. 3.[28]; Col. 3.[11]). Thus the spirit of Christ, working slowly but surely, has abolished, while Islām has only consecrated, slavery.

Price of Slaves depended on the quality and age of the slave; but the usual price seems to have been 30 shekels of silver (£4, 5s.), the sum which the master received if his slave was accidentally killed (Ex. 21.[32]). The price in Lv. 27.[2f.] is: for male from twenty to sixty years of age 50 shekels, for female of same age 30 shekels; male from five to twenty years 20 shekels, for female of same age 10 shekels; 5 shekels for male from one month to five years, 3 for female; for male over sixty 15 shekels, for female

10. Joseph was sold for 20 pieces (Gn. 37.[28]), and the prophetic price of the Messiah was 30 pieces of silver (Zc. 11.[12])—the sum for which He was betrayed. We read of Ptolemy Philadelphus redeeming Jewish prisoners for 120 drachmæ each, and Nicanor sold Jews at the rate of ninety for a shekel.

Hired Servant (Heb. שָׂכִיר, who works for שָׂכָר; Gr. μίσθιος, μισθωτός, ἐργάτης), one who works for hire by the day or specified short period. He was a freeman, and could not be constrained as a slave. His connection with his superior was loose, and could be dissolved on the completion of his immediate contract. He could not eat the Passover (Ex. 12.[45]). Little is said about hired servants in early Hebrew history; they are not mentioned in the Covenant code (Ex. 21.f.). The Dt. code contemplates them, forbidding their oppression whether Israelite or non-Israelite, and requiring that they receive their wages every evening (Dt. 24.[14, 15])—corroborated by the Priestly code (Lv. 19.[13]).

Lit.: Articles in Herzog-Hauck Encyclopädie[3]; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq.; Hastings' BD. and Dict. of Christ and the Gospels; Ency. Bib.; Grünfeld, Die Stell. der Sklaven bei d. Juden, &c.; Winter, Die Stell. der Sklaven, &c.; Mielzinger, Die Verhält. d. Sklaven bei d. alten Heb.; Sayce, Social Life among the Assyrians and Babylonians; works of Nowack, Ewald, Benzinger, on Archæology. S. Angus.

SLEEP. In the OT. shākāb is a regular euphemism for dying, as in the phrase "he slept with his fathers" (1 K. 11.[43], "Solomon slept with his fathers"). In the NT. it has passed, fm. being used merely in a formula, into a regular mode of speech. It wd. seem to have been introduced by our Lord, as when He uses it with regard to Jairus' daughter they do not understand Him. The Greek word used by our Lord in that case is katheudein, but the later Christian usage was koimasthai, wh. our Lord uses with regard to Lazarus; this also was misunderstood. Mw. uses it of the saints who were raised fm. the dead at our Lord's Resurrection (Mw. 27.[52]); it is used of Stephen (Ac. 7.[60]); the apostle Paul uses it of all believers—"We shall not all sleep" (1 Cor. 15.[51]), "them that sleep in Jesus" (1 Th. 4.[14]). It was also a classic usage, but became more frequent later. This figure is the natural complement of the Christian hope of a glorious resurrection.

SLEIGHT (Eph. 4.[14]) refers to the sleight of hand practised by the dice-thrower.

SLIME (Heb. ḥemār, "bitumen"). It is used of the bitumen near Babylon (Gn. 11.[3]), of that in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea (Gn. 14.[10]). It is used of the bitumen with wh. Jochebed pitched the ark of bulrushes in wh. she had placed Moses (Ex. 2.[3]). The name is connected with ḥāmar, "to boil," "to ferment," "to be red," hence ḥemer, "wine"; it may refer to the bubbles wh. rise to the surface of wells of fluid bitumen.

SMITH. See Handicrafts.

Egyptian Slingers

SLING, a weapon for throwing stones, anciently used in warfare. A corps of left-handed Benjamites, marksmen with the S., fought at Gibeah (Jg. 20.[16]). With a sling David overthrew Goliath. The S. is still used by shepherd boys in Pal.

Assyrian Slinger

SMYRNA appears in Scrip. only in Rv. 1.[11], 2.[8], as the seat of one of the churches to which the messages there preserved were addressed. The city had a long and varied history before the situation attracted the attention of Alexander the Great. On the W. coast of Lydia a long arm of the sea reaches inland, at the eastern extremity of wh. stood the ancient city of Smyrna, clinging to the slope of the mountain wh. overlooks the bay fm. the N. Originally an Æolian colony, it was taken by the Ionians. In their hands it exercised authority over a considerable district. After long strife with Lydia it was finally overthrown, c. B.C. 600, by the Lydian king Alyattes. Smyrna as a "city" ceased to be; but the name lingered on in connection with a group of scattered villages. Alexander is said to have purposed the rebuilding of S. in consequence of a suggestion made to him in a dream, after the battle of the Granicus, by the two goddesses of the city. The work of restoration was reserved for Lysimachus. A site was chosen on the SE. shore of the gulf, where an excellent harbour was formed, across the mouth of wh. a chain might be drawn for safety. It furnished protection for the smaller craft of these times; while larger vessels might be anchored in the bay. A great trade road connected the harbour with the East. Smyrna thus received the caravans of the merchantmen, whose merchandise was carried in her ships across the western waters, while the products of the West, brought to her harbour, were sent thence to the great inland markets. The situation furnished a guarantee of continuous life; and in point of fact, from that day to this, in spite of the changes the centuries have brought, the history of S. has been one of practically unbroken prosperity. A vivid and picturesque account of the city and its history is given by Sir W. M. Ramsay in The Letters to the Seven Churches, pp. 251ff. The Smyrnæans were very proud of their beautiful city. Its handsome streets, with stately temples and public buildings sweeping round the slopes of the hill, were compared to the jewelled ropes of a necklace. The graceful Acropolis suggested the image of a crown, resting on the head of Pagos, " the hill." The blue waters of the gulf, the surrounding mountains and groves, made an exceedingly attractive scene. S. claimed to be " the first of Asia in beauty and size." The drainage of the lower part of the city was defective, and this evil was aggravated by the breeze fm. the sea, wh. in the hottest part of the year fans the city by day. Mod. Smyrna still suffers fm. this defect. The faithfulness of S. to the cause of Rome secured for her the favour of that great Western power. Cicero praises her as " the city of our most faithful and most ancient allies." This fidelity had been proved before the ascendency of Rome had been firmly established. It was successfully pleaded as a reason why S. should be chosen rather than any other city in Asia, in A.D. 26, as the site of the temple to be dedicated to Tiberius.

Cybele, the mother-goddess, was the tutelary deity of Smyrna. This goddess, wearing the mural crown, suggested to Ælius Aristides the picture of the city " as a statue sitting with her feet on the sea and her head rising to heaven, and crowned with a circlet of beautiful buildings " (Ramsay, op. cit., 258). The " crown of Smyrna " was a familiar phrase, probably derived from the appearance of the hill " crowned " by the Acropolis. Apollonius of Tyana makes use of the phrase, declaring that nobility of character in the citizens was a worthier " crown " than " porticoes and pictures and gold."

We see thus how appropriate was the letter addressed to the city wh. had been destroyed, and had risen to a new career of prosperous life, by Him " which became dead and lived again "; how apt His appeal to the fidelity of wh. they boasted, and His promised reward of a " crown of life " (Rv. 2.[8ff.]). The reference to Jews (v. 9) prob. points to a colony attracted by S. as a centre of commerce. Among them the earliest converts to Christianity may have been found.

The harbour was blocked by Tamerlane in A.D. 1402. It was gradually filled up, and is now built over. But in appearance the city retains much of its ancient charm. The present writer saw it in 1888, while the hill still wore its crown of battlements. He can corroborate the description of Mrs. Ramsay: " with Mount Pagos and its ruined castle rising out of the clustering houses, it looks a queenly city ' crowned with her diadem of towers.' "

Smyrna claims to have been the birthplace of Homer.

SNAIL, the tr. of two Heb. words in AV. (1) Ḥōmeṭ, rendered RV. " sand-lizard," declared to be unclean (Lv. 11.[30]). Fm. the connection the rendering of RV. is preferable. (2) Shablūl (Ps. 58.[8]). In the LXX, Vlg., and Psh. this is trd. " wax," but in the Tg. Cc. tūblālā, " snail "; all modern VV., following Luther, tr. S., except those, like the Douay, wh. are dependent on the Vlg. Of the MT. the tr. S. seems correct; there almost appears to have been a different text behind the ancient VV. There is in Pal. a large S. with white shell used by the natives as food.

SNARE stands for several Heb. words. (1) Ḥēbel, lit. " cord," so trd. in Ps. 140.[5], where prob. " noose " is intended, as in Jb. 18.[10] (RV.). (2) Mōqēsh, the snare set by the yāqōsh, " fowler," for birds; by wh. ground game also was taken (Am. 3.[5], " gin," &c.). This is a cord with a running noose. The word is frequently used figuratively (Ex. 10.[7], &c.). (3) Māṭzōd, mĕtzūdāh, is the instrument by wh. the huntsman takes game, prob. a net (Ec. 7.[26]; Ek. 12.[13], 17.[20] [fig.]). (4) Paḥ (trd. " gin " in Jb. 18.[9]; Is. 8.[14]) was prob., like the Arb. fakh, a trap, the jaws of wh. are bone, and the spring twisted gut. Catching birds with the fakh is a favourite pastime of boys in Pal. The bird, caught by the foot, easily springs up a certain distance with this light trap (Am. 3.[5]). (5) Sĕbākāh (Jb. 18.[8]) is a net. In NT. brochos (1 Cor. 7.[35]) is lit. " a noose "; pagis, " a trap." The words are used fig. for anything that takes a man at unawares.

SNOW. Although over the greater part of Pal., even in the severest winter, snow seldom lies more than a few hours, its white glitter in the sun is a familiar sight. It lies thick on the giant form of Hermon in the north. It remains on exposed parts far into the summer, and never disappears from some of the shadier glens. It is seen from almost every high hill in the country. From time immemorial muleteers have carried blocks of snow from the mountain to the cities on the sea coast, to Damascus and other centres, to cool the summer beverages of the people (Pr. 26.[1]). Spotless whiteness is " white as snow " (Is. 1.[18]). Perfect purity is " whiter than snow " (Ps. 51.[7]). It is conceived as being sprinkled from some great treasure-house (Jb. 38.[22]; Ps. 147.[16]). Snow seems to have been regarded as possessing special cleansing properties (Jb. 9.[30]). It is the symbol of the winter's cold (Pr. 31.[21]). Mithl eth-thilj, " like the snow," is the proverbial Arabic expression for drinking-water of delicious coolness.

SNUFFERS, implements connected with the trimming of the lamps in the Temple. In AV. snuffers represent two Heb. words: (1) Mezammĕrōth (1 K. 7.[50]; 2 K. 25.[14]), fm. zāmar, "to prune": there seems no doubt about the meaning. (2) Malqāḥayim (Ex. 25.[38], 37.[23], RV. "tongs," etymologically the preferable rendering). In Is. 6.[6] this word is trd. "tongs." Snuff-dish (Heb. maḥtāh) occurs in connection with above in Ex. 25.[38], 37.[23]; Ges. renders "fire-pan."

SO (Heb. סוא, as vocalised pronounced Sō', but mt. be pronounced Sĕvē), an Egyptian king to whom Hoshea, the last k. of Samaria, sent for help in his rebellion against Shalmaneser. In the annals of Sargon there is reference to a Sibe Tartan, generalissimo of Piri'u, k. of Musr, a name wh. was regarded until recently as equivalent to Pharaoh, k. of Egp., and this Sibe was supposed to be Shabaco. Dr. Winckler's conjecture of a North Arabian Musri appears to render this doubtful. This whole theory has been definitely upset by Dr. Budge (Hist. of Egp. vi. prf. ix–xxx), and Dr. Flinders' Petrie (Hist. of Egp. iii. p. 281). The latter thinks S. was Shabaka, who first was Regent over Egp. under Piankhi, and then succeeded him as k. Dr. Flinders Petrie thinks the difference between the s of "So'" and the sh of Shabaka may be due to dialectic peculiarities. A piece of clay bearing the impress of the seal of Shabaka was found by Layard in Nineveh.

Part of Cartouche of Shabaco, enlarged from Impression of his Signet

Dr. Glaser had been led by his discoveries of early Arabic inscriptions to assign them to a remote antiquity, and then to build up a Minæan empire. This emboldened Prof. Winckler to devise a kdm. of Musri conterminous with Egp. (Musri) but different fm. it, and he supported his views by readings of Asyr. tablets that have not been confirmed. To these Dr. Cheyne added the kdm. of Jerahmeel devised out of various readings which can hardly be taken seriously. Dr. Budge and Dr. Petrie have shown that the Minæan empire, such as it was, was contemporary with Cambyses; and that the North Arabian Musri was the Sinaitic peninsula, long a part of the dominion of Egp.; while Jerahmeel remains in Dr. Cheyne's imagination.

SOAP, AV. SOPE, is mentioned only in Jr. 2.[22]; Ml. 3.[2], where it stands for the Heb. bōrīth, from the verb bārar, "to separate," in the sense of removing impurities. It is lit. "that which makes clean." In both cases LXX renders poia, "grass," probably understanding vegetable alkali. Bōr, from the same root, EV. tr. "cleanness," "pureness" (RVm. Jb. 9.[30]; Is. 1.[25], "lye").

The native women in Palestine sometimes use the powdered desiccated leaves and twigs of the Kali plant as a substitute for soap. "Our English word alkali is of pure Arabic origin, from el-Qali, the name of the green desert shrub, from the ashes of which potash in an impure state was first extracted. Crude potash is still procured from it for the manufacture of native soaps, and this forms quite an industry in the Kalamune district. The shrub is collected by the peasants and piled in heaps over a saucer-like depression in the earth. When sufficiently dry it is set on fire, and the impure potash collected in the basin beneath. It is sent south on camels to Damascus, Nāblus, Ḥaifa, &c., for the manufacture of native or Castilian soap. It is also used for the curing of green olives, and other domestic purposes. In some districts it is employed to remove the natural oil of grapes before they are converted into raisins" (Dr. Mackinnon of Damascus, in a letter to the writer).

The manufacture of soap is a flourishing industry in the towns mentioned above—the olive oil, produced so abundantly in Galilee, being used for the purpose; and the trade in the export of soap is considerable.

SOCO, SHOCO, SHOCHO, SOCOH, SHOCHOH, SOCHOH. These are simply variant forms of the same name. (1) A city in the Shephelah of Judah, evidently in the neighbourhood of Adullam and Azekah (Jo. 15.[35]). Between S. and Azekah, in Ephes-dammim, was the Phil. camp before the encounter of Goliath and David (1 S. 17.[1]). It lay in the commissariat district under Ben Hesed (1 K. 4.[10]), and was one of the strongholds rebuilt by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[7]). It was taken by the Phil. in the time of Ahaz (2 Ch. 28.[18]). OEJ. places it nine Roman miles fm. Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrīn), on the way to Jrs. This corresponds with the position of Khirbet Shuweikeh, c. seven miles NE. of Beit Jibrīn, on the S. lip of Wādy es-Sunṭ. It is a position of considerable strength, easily defensible in days of ancient warfare, and it was specially important as overlooking one of the main avenues from the plain to the inland uplands. The old walls may still be traced, and the remains of antiquity include cisterns and wine-presses. (2) A city in the uplands of Judah, near Jattir (Jo. 15.[48]), prob. = Khirbet Shuweikeh, fully 10 miles SW. of Hebron. There are no remains of importance.

SODI, father of Gaddiel, who represented Zebulun among the spies (Nu. 13.[10]).

SODOM AND GOMORRAH, two of the five cities of the plain. Near Sodom LOT pitched his tent, and in it he later took up his residence (Gn. 13.12, 14.12, &c.). These cities were captured by the kings fm. the N. (14.1ff.), and succoured by Abraham (vv. 13ff.). On account of their wickedness they were overwhelmed "with brimstone and fire fm. the Lord out of heaven" (19.24f.). Thenceforward they often appear as signal illustrations of God's vengeance against evil (Dt. 29.23; Is. 13.19, &c.). The names of their kings are significant: Bĕrā‘, "with evil," and Bĕresha‘, "with wickedness" (Gn. 14.2). Sodom is associated in name with vice of deepest infamy.

The plain in which the cities lay must certainly be sought at the S. end of the Dead Sea (see SIDDIM, VALE OF). The physical conditions of the district prob. furnish the key to the nature of the catastrophe wh. destroyed them. Bituminous regions are liable to destructive eruptions. In the district of Petrolia, Canada, a borehole struck a reservoir of gas wh. rushed up with explosive force, carrying before it a large quantity of petroleum. The gas, taking fire, formed a tall column of flame. The air flowing towards the eruption caused a whirlwind, wh. carried the dense smoke high into the air, and threw down burning bitumen all around (Dawson, Bypaths of Bible Knowledge, Egypt and Syria, pp. 111f.). A deep fissure caused by an earthquake may have occasioned such an eruption on a large scale, with the effects so vividly described in the narrative. The earthquake may have resulted in a general subsidence of the whole district, producing such changes as to render hopeless any search for remains of the fated cities.

SODOM, VINE OF. That any literal plant was ever so designated is open to grave question. "Their vine" (Dt. 32.32) is their nature, wh. has gone to corruption like that of the Sodomites. The "fruits" of such a nature may be fitly described as "grapes of gall," altho' no such literal grapes exist. In point of fact no plant has been found with the characteristics indicated, that can properly be called a vine. The "fruits" referred to by Josephus (BJ. IV. viii. 4), often spoken of as apples of Sodom, wh. look tempting, but wh., when plucked, dissolve into smoke and ashes, may be the ‘ushr, or the colocynth, the fruits of wh., when ripe, contain dry dust; but they bear no resemblance to grapes.

SODOMITE (Heb. qādēsh, fem. qĕdēshāh, lit. "sacred"). The English word is, of course, derived from Sodom, the people of which were reputed as sunk in gross and unnatural vice. Qādēsh and qĕdēshāh, however, were terms denoting the male and female prostitutes attached to certain sanctuaries, where acts of immorality formed part of the ritual of worship. This was abhorrent to the true worship of the pure God. of Isr. (Dt. 23.17). They were found in Judah under Rehoboam (1 K. 14.24). Asa banished them (15.12), all but a "remnant," who were rooted out by Jehoshaphat (22.46). They seem to have returned with the corruptions of later days; and Josiah is said to have broken down the houses of the sodomites, wh. were actually "in the house of the Lord" (2 K. 23.7 RV.). The practices referred to were widely prevalent. The "iniquity" of the Canaanites takes a new meaning for us when we realise the festering corruption there was in the heart of the people's life.

SOJOURNER. See STRANGER.

SOLOMON, the third king who occupied the throne of Isr., was the second s. borne to David by Bathsheba. The name shĕlōmōh, "peaceable" (= Irenæus), may have been suggested by the deep yearning of the sinning but repentant monarch's heart (2 S. 12.24; cp. 1 Ch. 22.8f.). At his birth the prophet Nathan was sent to David, evidently with a message of reconciliation from God, in token of wh. he called the child Jedidiah, "Beloved of Jah" (2 S. 12.25); the first element in this name being derived fm. the same root as David. "Jedidiah," however, disappears from the records at once and finally. It may have been barred fm. common use by its association with the Divine message. The name Solomon was prophetic of the man's character and career. He was as distinctively a man of peace as his fr. had been a man of war.

From his known relations with David and Bathsheba, and, subsequently, with Solomon himself, it may be inferred that the prophet Nathan was not without interest in the training and development of the future king. We may safely take it, however, that the predominant influence was that of his mr. As clever as she was ambitious and unscrupulous, she retained her power over David to the end. She had clearly resolved that her son should occupy the supreme seat, and her energies wd. be bent to fit him for that position. Many of the qualities for wh. he was afterwards distinguished may have been due to the careful nurture and skilful instruction of this shrewd, practical woman of the world. Being what she was, little would be done to neutralise the effect of his surroundings in the harīm, and here, we may be sure, were planted the seeds of that which wrought such havoc in his after life.

There is no record of the promise made to Bathsheba, that S. shd. succeed David (1 K. 1.13), but the chronicler indicates David's mind to that effect. While yet S. was "young and tender," the king describes to him the preparations made for building the Temple. He is told the reason for postponing the work, and on him is laid the duty to see this completed when he comes to the throne (1 Ch. 22.). But David's purpose was evidently unknown to many who had been among his most faithful servants. Adonijah's attempt to seize the throne, while open to reproach as wanting in the respect due to the aged monarch, may have been dictated in part at least by regard to the common weal, in wh., from gathering weakness and multitude of years, David could take but feeble interest. But Nathan and Bathsheba formed a subtle and powerful combination. They obtained a decree from David wh. frustrated the design of Adonijah, and placed Solomon securely on his father's throne. When Adonijah says (1 K. 2.[15]) that the kdm. was Solomon's "from the Lord," this does not necessarily imply previous kge., but only the recognition of an accomplished fact—accomplished, and therefore, in the Oriental view, the will of the Lord. There was no fixed rule as to the succession (see King).

After his father's death S. proceeded to get rid of those who had taken a leading part in the rising of Adonijah. Joab, whose conspicuous services and loyalty through so many years could not save him from the fate wh. he yet justly deserved, and Shimei, the man of bitter tongue and craven heart, were put to death. Abiathar the High Priest was deposed, and banished to his "own fields" at Anathoth. Adonijah, with marvellous clemency, he pardoned, and sent to his house with a grim caution. In slaying Joab and Shimei S. carried out the instructions of David (1 K. 2.[5ff.]). An endeavour has been made to relieve David of this responsibility (see David), but the passage is certainly ancient, and the counsel embodied the dictates of political wisdom. Joab, the most distinguished soldier Israel had produced, had amply earned his popularity with the army: while he lived he wd. always be a possible centre of unrest. No humbler post than that of commander-in-chief wd. have contented him; and with him in that position the peaceful development of succeeding years wd. have been morally impossible. The loyalty of Shimei cd. not be trusted. A resolute partisan of the house of Saul, he was sure to take any chance that offered, to stir up disaffection. The long fidelity of Abiathar to the cause and person of David secured him his life. While Adonijah lived Bathsheba would be uneasy. His unfortunate passion for Abishag, to whom prob. Solomon was himself attached, proved his undoing. The choice of Bathsheba for advocate sufficiently proves his infatuation. The women of the late king belonged of right to his successor. The desire for the Shunammite was taken as evidence of a purpose to seize the throne; and so a pretext was found to get quit of a dangerous rival. Benaiah succeeded Joab as commander-in-chief, Zadok took the place of Abiathar, and the staunch friendship of Nathan was acknowledged by positions of importance given to his sons.

Being thus quit of the main causes of anxiety, and feeling himself firmly seated on his father's throne, Solomon summoned an assembly at "the great high place" at Gibeon, where, on a prodigious scale, he offered sacrifices of thanksgiving. While sleeping, apparently in the sanctuary, he saw God in a vision, and made his famous choice of wisdom in preference to long life, riches, and victory over his enemies. And an illustration of his wisdom is given in his judgment in the quarrel of the two harlots over the living child (1 K. 3.). This sentence, resting on something deeper and more certain than mere kge. of jurisprudence, gave the people great confidence in him as final arbiter in their disputes.

The task of unifying Israel under one central authority was prosecuted successfully by Samuel, Saul, and David. Their victories had placed her in a strong position, reducing to impotence the foes who had formerly oppressed her. A warlike monarch wd. without doubt have sought greatly to increase his dominions. Solomon essayed the less picturesque but more useful task of consolidation. He was left with ample resources. Even if we make allowances for the tendency to exaggerate, the accounts given by the chronicler (1 Ch. 22.[14ff.]; 2 Ch. 1.[15]) represent enormous wealth. He was also master of a strong, well-trained, and disciplined army. The safety of the country was secured by the fortification of Hazor and Megiddo in the N.; Gezer, the two Beth-horons, and Baalath in the W.; and Tamar in the S. These guarded the main avenues by wh. the capital might be approached. Jerusalem was also strengthened by a wall and the fortress of Millo (1 K. 9.[15ff.]). To the military establishment he added 1400 chariots and 12,000 cavalry. Among the broken uplands of Pal. those arms were of little use; but on the wide flats along the shore, on Esdraelon, and in the great open country to the N. and to the E., they would add much to the effectiveness of the army (1 K. 9.[19]; 2 Ch. 1.[14]). The name of S., however, is not associated with any great military enterprise. 2 Ch. 8.[3] attributes to him a victory over Hamath-zobah. It cd. hardly have been of much account, as nothing beyond the fact is mentioned. He seems to have maintained intact the territory he inherited; but what we hear of Hadad in Edom (1 K. 11.[9ff.]) and Rezon of Damascus (vv. 23ff.) probably indicates a weakening of his authority in these directions.

S. endeavoured to cultivate friendly and profitable relations with other powers. He allied himself with the reigning family in Egypt by marrying the Pharaoh's daughter (1 K. 3.[1]), who brought him as her dowry the important stronghold of Gezer (9.[16]). A suitable residence for the fair Egyptian was part of his sumptuous plan of building (7.[8]). A trade in horses and chariots was established with Egypt; and with these, imported fm. Egp., S. supplied the Syrian and Hittite kings (1 K. 10.[28f.]). It is probable that S. also turned to advantage his control of the great highways of commerce, the caravan roads between the Euphrates valley and that of the Nile, wh. passed through his territory. The stream of commodities, therefore, required by the civilisation of the ancient world flowed thro' the passes and across the plains of Pal. With Hiram, king of Tyre, trade relations for mutual advantage were maintained throughout the reign of S. He inherited his father's friendship with the Tyrian king. To the Phœnicians S. was indebted for the cedar-wood from the mountain, brought to Jaffa in floats. Among the Hebrews on leaving Egp. were found skilled craftsmen, workers in wood, brass, the precious metals, &c. (Ex. 31.[4], 35.[35], &c.). The simple life after the Conquest furnished few opportunities for the exercise of their craft, and when S. required the work of skilled hands in the construction and adornment of the splendid buildings by which he was to be remembered for centuries, he had to draw from the accomplished workmen of Tyre. For the development of his trade across the sea, S. was absolutely dependent on the shipbuilders and seamen of his ally. But for his friendship with S., on the other hand, the maritime enterprise of Hiram and his people wd. have been confined to the Mediterranean. In partnership with S. they were able to enter the Red Sea at Ezion-geber, and to open new lines of commerce, bringing fresh varieties of commodities into their markets. Then also, as in later days, " their country was fed from " the land of Isr. (Ac. 12.[20]), the Phœnicians importing the produce of the rich corn land, olive groves, and vineyards of Pal. In payment to Hiram for material and service, wheat, barley, oil and wine were promised (1 K. 5.[11]; 2 Ch. 2.[10, 15]—the chronicler's figures are suspiciously large).

Among Solomon's wives was Naamah the Ammonitess, who it may be presumed was also of royal blood. This alliance would strengthen the sense of security on the eastern frontier. Naamah was the only one of his wives to bear him a son (1 K. 14.[21]).

The reduction to slavery of the children of the old Canaanite inhabitants who had not been expelled from the land, tended to consolidate the kdm. (1 K. 9.[20f.]). The " threescore and ten thousand that bare burdens, and fourscore thousand that were hewers in the mountains " (5.[15]), those who cut the great blocks of stone in the quarries, and those who attended to their transport, were probably drawn from this class. For the carrying out of his splendid designs he imposed forced labour upon his subjects. He raised a levy of 30,000 men, who were sent to toil in Lebanon " ten thousand a month by courses: a month they were in Lebanon and two months at home " (1 K. 5.[13f.]). The principle of the levy had been introduced by David (2 S. 20.[24], RVm.). Its development under Solomon shows that the people were no longer free. The monarch had become absolute, and his will was supreme. All the wisdom with wh. S. is credited did not save him from the temptations that accompany unlimited power. In the early years of his reign he appears at his best. Young, richly gifted in mind and body, sober in judgment, and alive to the responsibilities of his position, his was a truly kingly figure, fitted to win the pride and loyalty of his people; while the prosperity and peace of these days left a happy impression upon their minds. Their confidence in him brought his opportunity to earn the lasting gratitude of Isr. by a rule at once humane and just, and by enterprises designed for the benefit and advancement of the nation. Unhappily he developed a selfish yearning for his own personal advantage, and bent the power now in his hands to the gratifying of his own desires for pleasure and magnificence. By a display of splendour he sought to enhance the greatness and dignity of the empire over wh. he ruled, and to make his father's house illustrious among the nations. JERUSALEM lent itself admirably to his plan of fortification, and became a city of great strength. He covered the eastern hill with buildings of extraordinary size and beauty, including the famous TEMPLE, and the royal residence. His domestic establishment grew until it contained " seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines ": " the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians and Hittites " (1 K. 11.[1ff.]). The maintenance of such a household, with all the officers and servants about his court, and their dependents, while gratifying to the pride of the king, involved an expenditure necessarily oppressive upon a people who in the mass were poor. This was increased by his own expensive tastes, the luxuries and adornments to be provided for himself and his favourites. To meet these demands the country was divided into twelve districts—excluding Judah—which were placed in the charge of the king's officers. Each district had to furnish supplies for one month annually. We may imagine the weight of the burden when it is said that " Solomon's provision for one day was thirty measures of fine flour and threescore measures of meal; ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred sheep, besides harts and gazelles and roebucks and fatted fowl " (1 K. 4.[1-23]). One wonders how S. cd. have failed to see that the inevitable result of such a system must be discontent and alienation of the people. The exemption of Judah from the hardships imposed upon the other tribes, without doubt intensified the old jealousy between Ephraim and Judah, leading to the abortive rising of Jeroboam (1 K. 11.[26ff.]). The father's unwisdom, therefore, prepared the way for the disruption of the kdm., with all its disastrous consequences to the nation, wh. was only precipitated by the folly of his son (12.).

In view of the facts detailed it is natural to ask in what consisted the wisdom for wh. S. is so widely famed. In many respects he showed a conspicuous lack of what we mean by the term. This will be further illustrated below. But "wisdom" in our sense is not claimed for him in the history. He is represented as gifted with keen insight, knowing well the workings of the human heart, and, by discovery of underlying motives, able swiftly to discern the justice of a cause. This was the "wisdom" for wh. he prayed: "Give Thy servant therefore an understanding heart to judge Thy people, that I may discern between good and evil: for who is able to judge this Thy so great people?" In popular estimation this prayer was granted to the full. Again, the "wisdom" attributed to him in 1 K. 4.[29ff.] is clearly defined. He had a passion for information on all subjects open to him, and excelled all others in the learning of his day. He discoursed of trees and plants, of beasts, birds, creeping things, and fishes. He was celebrated for his power to concentrate in brief, pointed, memorable sayings or epigrams, the results of moral reflection, the teachings of experience, and sagacious counsels for the conduct of life (1 K. 4.[32]). He won distinction also in a field that has always possessed a keen interest for the Oriental mind, in propounding and answering "hard questions" or riddles. His reputation in this regard was carried to foreign courts, doubtless by his merchantmen (1 K. 4.[34]), and the queen of Sheba came expressly to put him to proof. An account of such encounters of wits, in wh. S. was said to have been worsted, will be found in Jos. Ant. VIII. v. 3. The king's eminence, his extraordinary wealth, the pomp and splendour of his life and surroundings, deeply impressed the imagination of men. Whatever S. himself wrote, he was known to be deeply interested in these things. The tendency to associate with a great name whatever is produced in the field of his special interest, may reasonably account for the gathering round the name of S. of the proverbial and "wisdom" literature of Israel. It is clear that the Solomon of later days was largely the creation of pious imagination. The monarch who figures so largely in the legendary lore of the Orient has practically nothing in common with reality.

Solomon at first displayed a sincere reverence for, and desire to honour, Jehovah, to whom he looked for the necessary equipment for his great task, and for guidance in discharging it. To him fell the privilege of building the house for the Lord planned by his father David, and nothing was spared to make it worthy. His prayer at the dedication of the Temple, in beauty and dignity, and depth of emotional feeling, is unsurpassed by anything in the OT. It is possible that in the lavish scale of the sacrifices offered something was due to his besetting desire for self-glorification; but they may have been made as a fit token of gratitude out of his ample wealth. The functions of priest and king were not yet definitely separated, and it is clear that Solomon performed sacerdotal acts with general acceptance. He attended with care to the arrangement of the Temple service. The elaborate and impressive ritual was in harmony with the char. of the building. The Temple became the central sanctuary of the nation. The time had not yet come for the abolition of local sanctuaries and high places, and worship continued to be offered in them; but an important step was taken towards the concentration of later days. The influence of Solomon's piety and zeal upon his people was modified by the oppressions to wh. he subjected them, and his falling away in his old age left a painful impression on their minds. The toleration of idolatrous worship within the land must have seemed to many bad enough. But when the king, prematurely old by reason of unbridled self-indulgence, under the power of foreign women, not only built heathen high places for them over against the Temple of Jehovah, but himself took part in the unholy service of Ashtoreth and Milcom, it may well have appeared infamy unspeakable. Ahijah the Shilonite was the leader of the party of protest. Solomon made no sign of penitence, but he was so firmly seated in power that for any revolt there was no hope of success. He was left unpunished, and the penalty of his folly was to fall upon his son. But while the memory of his greatness preserved sufficient loyalty to protect him from the dangers of insurrection, his last days were spent under a cloud. The reign wh. began with such brilliant promise, and reached such a height of splendour and fame, ended amid ominous silence.

The fierce Semitic strain so evident in David is hardly seen in Solomon; altho', when necessary, he cd. act with decision and severity (1 K. 2.[12ff.]). As peaceful in spirit as David was warlike, he did nothing to extend the boundaries of Israel: indeed under him they may have suffered some curtailment (11.[14-25]). The strengthening and adornment of Jerusalem, the erection of the Temple, and the elaboration of its services, lent a growing importance to the capital. The foreign trade which he encouraged did little to benefit the people as a whole. Its main results were seen in the enrichment of the king and those who were around him. It was only in Jrs. that he made silver to be as stones, and cedars as sycomore trees (1 K. 10.[27]). The wealth wh. S. commanded was largely dissipated in wasteful extravagance: a sign of the luxury in wh. he indulged is the extraordinary size of his harîm. His licentiousness is one of the darkest stains on his character. With this the son of Sirach reproaches him, while duly recording his greatness in other respects, "Thou didst stain thine honour and pollute thy seed: so that thou broughtest wrath agst. thy children, and wast grieved for thy folly" (47.[18ff.]). Before reaching sixty he fell into the imbecility and decay of old age (1 K. 11.[4]). He had but one son, and that son Rehoboam. "God's violated law of married love clearly avenged itself on Solomon and condemned his polygamy" (Prof. Flint, HDB. s.v.). He found the kdm. great and strong, but with the possibility of disruption in its heart. His task should have been wisely to remove all causes of alienation, and pave the way to permanent unity. By his oppressions and partiality he drove a wedge into the old fissure, and made disruption inevitable. His alliance with Egypt, where Jeroboam found asylum, must have been weakening; and Rehoboam soon had to suffer at the hands of Shishak (1 K. 14.[25]). He failed in self-discipline. "He talked wisdom and practised folly." The honour offered to Jehovah in the time of his splendour was more than balanced by the degradation of his last days. No king of Israel ever had greater opportunities. Few have displayed a more signal lack of true "wisdom."

SOLOMON'S PORCH. See PORCH.

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS (Heb. 'abdē shĕlēmōh, "bondslaves of S."). The children of these are mentioned with the NETHINIM (Ez. 2.[55]; Ne. 7.[57], &c.). They were prob. descendants of the Canaanites enslaved by Solomon (1 K. 9.[20f.]).

SON. See FAMILY.

SON OF GOD, the designation of our Lord in His Divine Nature as the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. That some such relationship as that asserted in the Creed as subsisting between the First and Second Persons in the Godhead had a place in the Deity, seems to have been a tenet of primitive religion. It is a mystery to the Church after two millennia of Christian revelation and experience; much more wd. such a tenet be mysterious and difficult of apprehension to primitive humanity. As where logical thought failed him Plato took refuge in myth, to present in picture what he cd. not expound in discursive statement, so primitive men invented stories to clarify their thoughts, and, if only vaguely, to define them. In this way, probably, the pantheons of polytheism largely originated. Thus in Egypt to a highly spiritual notion of the Deity there was added an indefinitely numerous pantheon. The most widely diffused form of worship was that of Osiris Isis Horus, in wh. Horus was the son of Osiris, yet at the same time identical with him. In the grotesque Babylonian poem of Creation we have several generations of gods, wh. probably means several layers of stratification due to the pantheon of a conquering tribe or city being superimposed upon that of a conquered people. But the hero of the epic is Bel-Marduk, the son of Hea, and in a symbolic sense of all the gods, who is the destroyer of Tiamat, the principle of evil and lawlessness. In classic mythology we have the thought in various forms because of the commingling of differing races, each with its own mythology. There is Athene springing full armed fm. the head of Zeus; and there is Zeus and Apollo; Zeus and Herakles; Zeus and Bacchus. In considering this we must remember that Zeus had a double meaning; he was not only the mythological son of Kronos, but the supreme Deity, as in the hymn of Cleanthes. We might also refer to the relationship between Odin and Thor, and Odin and Balder, in Scandinavian mythology. In the very earliest form religious thought assumed, the necessity was felt to ascribe to Deity some such relationship.

Such a view crudely apprehended naturally tended to anthropomorphism, idolatry, and polytheism: this was its result throughout the whole human race; hence the call of Israel to bring mankind back to a recognition of the unity and spirituality of God. This being the function of Israel, we shd. expect that any traces of such an idea in their sacred Literature wd. be few and obscure. Leaving to the one side the angels, who are called in Job "sons of God" (1.[6], 2.[1], 38.[7]), and apparently in Genesis (6.[2]), and such phrases as bĕnē'ēlīm (Ps. 29.[1]), we have the words of Agur (Pr. 30.[4]): speaking of the Almighty he says, "What is His name, and what is His Son's name, if thou canst tell?" In this passage it is assumed that the Creator of heaven and earth has a Son, and that no knowledge of the Creator is complete without also a knowledge of the Son. More important are the statements in the 2nd Psalm. First the mysterious Messiah is declared in an emphatic sense to be the Son of God. Next there is the statement in v. 12, "Kiss the Son." Difficult as is this verse on the traditional interpretation, greater difficulty is involved in any other. When the subject is approached fm. another side we have Is. 9.[6]. When we take into account the emphatic position assigned to the "Son" and the marvellous names given Him, "The Mighty God," "The Everlasting Father," it seems impossible to escape the thought that these things are spoken of One whose Sonship to God implied a superhuman relationship. Although the term "Son" is not used, there is implied a Being that is other than God, yet so closely related to Him as to be God. Here we wd. only refer to "Wisdom" in the earlier chapters of Proverbs, in wh. we have the unity in difference implied in the Nicæan doctrine presented under another aspect. What in a human being wd. be a faculty is regarded as an independent but closely associated personality. Then there is the "Angel of the Presence," who accompanied the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness when JHWH had declared that He wd. not go with them (Ex. 33.[2, 14]). All these passages reveal a sense that somehow there is a division in the essence of Deity as necessary to an adequate idea of God as Unity.

In the period between the Testaments, so far as evidence can be drawn fm. the Jewish literature of the time, the thought did not receive much development. In the Apocrypha the title S. of G. used in the emphatic sense appears to occur once. In the book of Wisdom it is said: "If the Just be the Son of God He will help Him and deliver Him fm. the hand of His enemies. Let us examine Him with despitefulness and torture, that we may know His meekness, and prove His patience. Let us condemn Him with a shameful death (from His words shall be His visitation)" (Ws. 2.[18-20]). One is tempted not only to take ὁ δίκαιος as "the Son of God" in an emphatic sense, but also to see in these verses a prevision of the sufferings of Christ. In the pre-Christian Apocalypses the title does not occur; in Enoch, in the book of Similitudes, the dignity ascribed to the "Son of Man" almost implies the higher (see SON OF MAN). In Philo we come nearer the NT. conception as crystallised in our creeds, of the Logos who is Son of God. It is difficult in studying the doctrine of the Logos in Philo to be certain where we have to do with rhetoric and where with definite thought. When he calls the Logos "the first-born Word," "the second God," regarding Him as neither quite a creature nor absolutely uncreated, as the advocate (παράκλητος; cp. 1 Jn. 2.[1]) of creation with God, it is difficult to think of Philo as other than a soul feeling after the truth wh. was revealed in Christ.

With the opening of the New Testament we come at once into clearer light. In the Synoptics, wh. may be said to be a threefold republication of the primitive Gospel, we have the title ascribed to our Lord repeatedly. The earliest is the statement of the angel at the Annunciation, "He shall be called the Son of the Highest" (Lk. 1.[32]), "that Holy Thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (v. 35). The next external testimonies are the heavenly voices at His baptism, "This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Mw. 3.[17]; cp. Lk. 3.[22]). In the Temptation the devil's efforts were directed to make Him doubt His Divine Sonship and show His doubt by applying tests to make plain His relationship to God (Mw. 4.[1-10]; Lk. 4.[1-13]). There are testimonies to His Sonship to God given by the demons (Mw. 8.[20]; Mk. 3.[11]; Lk. 4.[41]). His testimony concerning Himself as reported by the Synoptics must be taken into account; the acknowledgment of His claims wh. was wrung fm. Him by the adjuration of the High Priest at His trial before the Sanhedrin (Mw. 26.[63, 64]; Mk. 14.[61, 62]; Lk. 22.[70]); it is implied in His parabolic teaching, e.g. in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, God is the proprietor and He is the Son sent to the husbandmen and murdered by them (Mw. 21.[37f.]); the Marriage Supper made for the son of the maker of the feast shows the same thing, as God is the maker of the feast (Mw. 22.[2-14]). It is implied in His other teaching as well, as when He demands, "What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is He?" (Mw. 22.[42-46]). And when He describes the Last Judgment, He, the Son of Man, says to the righteous, "Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kdm. prepared for you fm. the foundation of the world" (Mw. 25.[34]). Though we may not press it, yet the agonised cry in the garden, "O My Father! if it be possible let this cup pass fm. Me" (Mw. 26.[39]), seems to assert a claim to a closer relationship to God than is implied in the ordinary sonship of mankind to their Creator. Then there is the effect He produced on those with whom He came in contact; thus Peter at Cæsarea Philippi said of his Master, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God" (Mw. 16.[16]); so too at the Cross the centurion declared, "Truly this was the Son of God" (Mw. 27.[54]).

The fourth Gospel occupies a unique position in regard to Christology; the assertions of our Lord's Divinity on the one hand, and of His humanity on the other, are clear and direct. The Logos doctrine with wh. it opens represents under another figure the relationship symbolised in the passages we have been studying as Sonship. It is a development of the teaching of Philo; a development caused to a great extent by intercourse with Christ. John exhibits his sense of the identity of the relationship when he says, "The Word was made flesh . . . and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father" (Jn. 1.[14]). In v. 18 this identity is assumed; the Logos is essentially the Revealer of God; in the v. in question this office is assigned to the Only-begotten. We have in this chap. the testimony of the Baptist in regard to the descent of the Spirit upon our Lord at His baptism, and the consequent demonstration of His Divine Sonship (Jn. 1.[34]). When Jesus reveals to Nathaniel that He knew the subject of his meditation "under the fig tree," he answers, "Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God" (Jn. 1.[49]). Later we have the confession of Martha, "I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, wh. shd. come into the world" (Jn. 11.[27]). There is further direct assumption of Sonship, as in the passage beginning "The Father worketh hitherto, and I work." Notwithstanding that the Jews, recognising the claim, sought to kill Him because of it, He proceeded to apply and emphasise it, claiming that all men "shd. honour the Son even as they honour the Father" (5.[23]). Even more explicit is the later statement, "Say ye of Him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest, because I said, I am the Son of God?" (10.[36]). The whole Intercessory Prayer proceeds on the presupposition of such a relationship. Further, it was part of the accusation against Jesus before Pilate that "He made Himself the Son of God." We have the testimony of the evangelist, given some four times in the 3rd chap., in wh. he shows the necessary connection between the Divine Sonship of Jesus and the salvation of sinners. In the last verse of the Gospel in its original form he assigns the purpose why he had written it: "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (20.[31]).

As the book of Acts is mainly an account of the work of the apostle Paul, we may consider the evidence of Christ's Divine Sonship in it along with that in the Pauline Epistles. After the narrative of his conversion we are told of Paul, "Straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that He is the Son of God." In his sermon in the synagogue of Antioch in Pisidia Paul quotes the 2nd Ps., "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee," and applies it to Christ.

We have not referred to the confession of the Ethiopian eunuch (8.[37]): although the verse is found in the Vlg. and the Psh., yet as it is wanting in the five great uncials its right to be in the text seems doubtful.

When we pass from the Acts to the Epistles, fm. Paul the preacher to Paul the letter-writer, we find the proofs that Paul regarded Christ as the Son of God too numerous to be considered individually. In the earliest of his epistles, the 1st to the Thessalonians, he refers to their spiritual history, "How they turned to God fm. idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son fm. heaven" (1 Th. 1.[10]). In Galatians, wh., if not the next in point of date, belonged at all events to the group wh. follows in point of time, we find that Paul ascribes his conversion to the fact that God was pleased to reveal His Son in him (Gal. 1.[15, 16]); he further shows that the deliverance of the world fm. the bondage of corruption and the adoption of believers into the family of God were due to the Divine Sonship of Christ (Gal. 4.[4, 6]). It is the source of the unity of believers; they are "called to the fellowship of His Son" (1 Cor. 1.[9]); this truth is the subject of all preaching (2 Cor. 1.[19]). The Epistle to the Romans is filled with the thought that salvation is through the death of Him who is the Son of God (Rm. 5.[10], 8.[3, 32]). What is characteristic of Paul's earlier epistles we find also in those of the first imprisonment (Eph. 4.[13], by implication Php. 2.[5-11]; Col. 1.[17]). Throughout his whole teaching Paul's message is that with wh. he began in Damascus, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

The great Christological treatise wh. is called the Epistle to the Hebrews, whether written by Paul or not, is full of Pauline ideas. Certainly the Divine Sonship of Christ, wh. we have seen to be so prominent with St. Paul, is equally prominent in it. The great theme of his argument is the superiority of the priesthood of Christ over that of Aaron, and an element in this is the fact that Christ is the Son of God. He begins his argument by showing that the Christian revelation was necessarily superior to such as preceded, because in it God had spoken to us by His Son. He develops that idea by showing Christ's superiority to the angels, by whom, according to Jewish tradition, the law had been given; then His superiority to Moses, by whom it had been delivered to the people; the point in both cases being that He was "the Son." He gradually leads up to the Melchizedekian priesthood; part of its superiority being due to the symbolic immortality of Melchizedek, that he was made like unto the Son of God, and because Christ, being "the Son of God," hath "the power of an endless life," "seeing He ever liveth to make intercession." But the very fact that our High Priest is greater and more glorious than any son of Aaron makes our responsibility the greater and our condemnation more terrible: how much sorer punishment shall be meted out to them who "crucify the Son of God afresh and put Him to an open shame." As we have already said, the whole argument of the epistle and the practical application of it turn on the Divine Sonship of our Lord.

The Epistles of John exhibit, as might be expected, the same characteristics that we saw in the Gospel; the Sonship of Christ is the great assumption behind the exhortations. He begins by asserting our fellowship to be "with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ" (1 Jn. 1.[3]), and our fellowship with one another is through the cleansing power of His blood. All evil involves the denial of the Son as well as the Father (2.[22]), all good in believing in Him (3.[23]); the indwelling of God is the reward of him that confesses "that Jesus is the Son of God" (4.[15]). His whole argument comes to a climax in the last chapter; the phrase or its equivalent occurs nine times. Indeed in 5.[13] the apostle declares his purpose in regard to those for whom he is writing: "These things have I written that ye might believe on the name of the Son of God." So too with the 2nd epistle. Though the phrase in question does not occur so frequently in Revelation, yet the repeated references to "the Lamb in the midst of the throne," and the way all praise "to Him that sits upon the throne" is associated with that to the Lamb, implies a similar relationship but under a different figure.

We have thus seen that the thought that Jesus Christ was and is the Son of God permeates the whole New Testament.

The Theological Content of this Doctrine.— It does not come within the scope of this Dictionary to consider the prolonged controversies that raged on this subject during the early Christian centuries —controversies the importance of wh. are unduly under-estimated now. The first point implied in this title was recognised by the Jews when Jesus claimed it: they charged Him with blasphemy: "Thou being a man makest Thyself God." It implies essential Divinity. As to the mysterious fact, it gains immensely in credibility when it is remembered by whose testimony it is established. They are all either the associates of our Lord or the intimate friends of those who had been so. Of the Synoptists, Matthew was a disciple; Mark was the interpreter of Peter, one of the three drawn into most intimate relationship with Him; Luke was the companion of Paul, who, although not one of the earlier apostles, yet as at first the opponent of the Gospel collected all evidence concerning Jesus fm. an antagonistic point of view, and fm. this had become a convinced believer in His Divinity. The writer of the fourth Gospel was, like Peter, one of the inner circle of three. Not only so, but all the apostles who "had companied with Him," and all the seventy who had enjoyed some of His society both before and after His Passion, all proclaimed His Divine Sonship, and most of them sealed their testimony with their blood. That those with whom He had walked and talked, had eaten and drunk, declared Him, despite all opposing prejudices due to education, despite the infliction of scourging and the threat of death, to be the Son of God, implies that the evidences He gave of His Divinity were strong to a degree that is inconceivable to us. This is not invalidated by the fact that the Roman emperors were deified, for Roman ideas of Godhead were vastly lower than were those of the Jews; and all these witnesses were Jews. Further there is implied a certain dependence, if only economic. See TRINITY.

SON OF MAN (Heb. ben-'ādām, Aram. bar-'enosh, Gr. ho huios tou anthrōpou). The main interest this term has for us is the use our Lord makes of it to designate Himself. To appreciate this aright it is necessary to consider it historically. In the OT. the term S. of M. means "man," especially in his weakness. It is a striking fact that of the words used for "man," that wh. implies his weakness is chosen; thus in Is. 2.[9], "The mean man ('ādām) boweth down, and the great man ('īsh) humbleth himself"; this is implied also in the connection in wh. the term S. of M. occurs; thus, "What is man ('ĕnōsh), that Thou art mindful of him? and the S. of M. (ben-'ādām), that Thou visitest him?" (Ps. 8.[4]). The plural of this is used for men in general, but with a similar suggestion, as "The Lord beholdeth all the sons of men (bĕnē-hā-ādām)" (Ps. 33.[13]). The most striking use of this title is as applied to the prophet EZEKIEL; in the book of that prophet eighty-nine times does JHWH address him as "S. of M." Daniel is thus addressed by GABRIEL (Dn. 8.[17]). In all these instances real humanity in all its weakness is implied. The most important use of the term is to be found, not in the Heb. portion of the Scripture, but in the Aramaic. In Daniel 7.[13] we are told that "there came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a S. of Man" (RV.); the previous empires had been symbolised by animals—a lion, a bear, a leopard; this, God's empire, is symbolised by a man. It is to be observed that in the two Gr. VV. and the Psh., as also in Luther, the term is indefinite. The term is thus purely descriptive, not denominative.

The next appearance of the title is in the middle book of the Enoch books, "the Book of Similitudes"; here it has become unmistakably denominative. To prove this we shall quote the principal passages in wh. it occurs. In doing so we shall make use of Dr. Charles' version. The principal passage (46.[1-3]) is obviously modelled on Dn. 7.[9-14]: "[1] And then I saw One who had a head of days, and His head was white like wool, and with Him was another Being whose countenance had the appearance of a man, and His face was full of graciousness like one of the holy angels. [2] And I asked the angel, who went with me and showed me all the hidden things, concerning that Son of Man, who He was and whence He was, and why He went with the Head of Days? [3] And he answered and said, This is the Son of Man who hath righteousness—with whom dwelleth righteousness, and reveals all the treasures of that wh. is hidden, because the Lord of Spirits hath chosen Him; and His lot before the Lord of Spirits hath surpassed everything for ever." We have in a subsequent passage (48.[1-4]): "[1] And in that place I saw a fountain of righteousness wh. was inexhaustible, and around it were many fountains of wisdom, and all the thirsty drank of them and were filled with wisdom, and had their dwellings with the righteous, and holy, and elect. [2] And at that hour that Son of Man was named in the presence of the Lord of Spirits, and His name came before the Head of Days. [3] And before the sun and the signs were created, and before the stars of heaven were made, His name was named before the Lord of Spirits. [4] He will be a staff to the righteous on wh. they will support themselves and not fall. He will be a light to the Gentiles and the hope of those who are troubled of heart." We find in the following chap. (49.[4]), "He will judge secret things, and no one will be able to utter a lying word before Him, for He is the Elect One before the Lord of Spirits according to His good pleasure." Not only is it evident that the title S. of M. here designates an individual Being, but also one of super-angelic dignity, who though not eternal yet existed before the material creation. He is identified with the Elect, the Anointed One, i.e. the Messiah. He is to be judge also at the last day.

Professor James Drummond has maintained that these passages are Christian interpolations. But they are so involved in the structure of the book that the idea of interpolation becomes improbable.

We now proceed to consider the NT. use of the phrase "Son of Man." It occurs only as applied to Christ once outside the Gospels—in Stephen's dying exclamation (Ac. 7.[56]). In the OT. sense it occurs in He. 2.[6]; Rv. 1.[13]; the last an echo of Dn. 7.[13]. In the Gospels, of the eighty times wh. this phrase occurs, only once is it on other lips than those of our Lord Himself. This instance, however, is of special interest, as it shows the sense in wh. the Jews understood the title. Our Lord had just received in the hearing of the multitude the Divine testimony that He was sent of God; some had thought it was a peal of thunder; others, hearing that words were spoken but unable to grasp their purport, said that "An angel spoke to Him"; others, however, had understood what was said. Our Lord proceeded to explain the reason of the voice coming, and then, seeing His coming triumph by means of death, concludes, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me." There has been no word of His being the "Son of Man." He had last used the phrase in connection with the coming of the Greeks; then it is addressed primarily to the two apostles who introduced them—it was not addressed to the multitude, and there is no evidence that it was heard by them. The people, recognising that He intimated His death, and understanding that He claimed to be the Messiah, are in a difficulty. They say: "We have heard out of the law that the Christ abideth for ever, and how sayest Thou, The Son of Man must be lifted up? who is this Son of Man?" This may be paraphrased: "You claim to be Messiah, the Son of Man, yet you intimate that you are to be crucified; what very special Son of Man is this?" The whole point of their argument lies in the assumed identity of S. of M. with "the Christ." The title was one of the recognised equivalents of "Messiah." From its use in the Enoch books we shd. expect it to be well known in the school fm. wh. these emanated, wh. in our opinion was the Essenes (WAITERS FOR THE REDEMPTION). What may have been the reasons wh. led our Lord to adopt this title as Messiah? The meaning of the title wd. not be obvious to the Romans; any one who claimed to be the Anointed asserted in no obscure way that he was a king. The career of any claimant to kingship wd. be liable to be cut short speedily. This title S. of M. wd. convey no meaning to any one not well acquainted with the books of Enoch.

While the title conveyed the idea of Messiahship, revealing yet concealing the claim, there were other ideas contained in the term. It asserted the absolute humanity of Him who assumed it. He claimed to be SON OF GOD, and His miracles justified the claim, so that Peter, who was in most intimate association with Him, declared Him to be the Son of the Living God. The marvels that attended His death were so astounding that the centurion, on duty at the cross, is compelled to say, "Truly this man was the Son of God" (Mk. 15.[39]). So impressed were men with this side of His nature that He had not many years left the world when the Gnostics arose, many of whom declared that our Lord only seemed to be Man. This title asserts that not only had He a human body, but that He had a human history; He had not entered the world in maturity, breaking in upon history at once in fulness of mental and physical powers. No! it was through the gateway of infancy and childhood that He entered humanity. But we saw that the term in Heb. meant "man" in his weakness; the title then asserts indirectly what the evangelist deduced fm. His deeds, "Himself took our infirmities."

There is yet another aspect to this title. When we translate it back into Heb. we find it reads Son of Adam. Adam was the representative of the race; he had been tested but had failed, so had "brought death into the world and all our woe." Who fitter to be representative of mankind and stand the test anew on their behalf than the "Son of Adam"? The argument of the apostle in regard to our sonship to God may be turned another way. "If Son, then Heir": the heritage Adam left his progeny was guilt; He assumes that guilt as His by being S. of M.; He enters heir to the inheritance of woe. As the great First-born He is the Goel, the Avenger, who has come to destroy death and "him that had the power of death, that is the devil" (He. 2.[14]). There is yet further "Brotherhood to men." By the fact that He has partaken of human nature so absolutely in all its weakness, we can realise His sympathy with us in all our sufferings and temptations; thus He is the Brother "born for adversity." The fact that He is our Omniscient Creator wd. enable Him to know our every feeling, while His Love wd. enable Him to have a tenderness for us that we shd. not be afflicted above what we shd. be able to bear. Since He has taken our nature we can realise His sympathy better, and so be comforted in all our sorrows.

SONG OF SOLOMON, or more properly Song of Songs (as in the Hebrew Bible), i.e. the best or choicest song, comes immediately after Job in the third canon of the Hebrew books. It is the first of the five Megilloth (or "Rolls"), which comprise the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. These books are read on certain fasts and festivals of the Jewish Church. As its position indicates, the book was admitted late into the Canon. Although not quoted in the New Testament, it was probably regarded as sacred in the time of Christ, though its canonicity was discussed even later. The ground of its admission must have been undoubtedly that it was taken to express allegorically the relation of Jehovah to the Jewish people. This is shown by the fact that it was read on the eighth day of the Passover feast, which commemorated Jehovah's deliverance of His people and His union with them by an everlasting covenant. Christians also regarded it as allegorical, expressing the relation of Jesus Christ to His Church (cp. the headings to chapters in the Authorised Version), hence the book was regarded with the same veneration among Christians as among Jews. But whether the intention of the author or editor was allegorical and mystical or not, was questioned by Theodore of Mopsuestia in the sixth century. For this literal view he was anathematised by the council of Constantinople in A.D. 553. Origen expounded it at great length, and St. Bernard of Clairvaux wrote eighty-six sermons on it, and then had only reached the beginning of the third chapter. Once the allegorical method was taken, numerous interpretations became possible. These may be found in the various commentaries that have been written on the book.

In itself the work is entirely concerned with human love, and is made up of a number of songs as inconsequent as the passion described. Three main characters appear in the book: Solomon, the Shulamite maiden, and a shepherd; while the "daughters of Jerusalem" appear as a kind of chorus. Many exponents of the work find in it an attempt at Hebrew drama, but the efforts made to break it up into acts and scenes are not very convincing (for two of these see Driver's Intro., ed. 6, pp. 438ff.). There are no scenic directions, and there cannot be said to be any real progress in the passion or in the events recorded. The plot is taken to be that Solomon had taken a Shulamite maiden to his court and now pleads for her love. She, however, remains faithful to her shepherd lover, to whom she is in the end restored. Delitzsch identifies the shepherd with Solomon, and sees only two main characters, and so he construes the course of events differently (see Driver as above).

The material of the work, even if it be considered as a drama in its present form, consists of a number of songs and snatches of songs. Were these composed for this work, or are they material which the author found already in existence? The probability of the latter theory has been made evident by the investigations of a Prussian consul, J. G. Wetzstein, whose results are given in Delitzsch's Commentary on the Song of Songs. He found a great similarity between the songs used at modern marriage ceremonies in Palestine and those of this book. The seven days of the marriage festival itself are called the "king's week." Solomon is thus the bridegroom (any bridegroom) as king; the Shulamite (referring to Abishag the Shunammite, 1 K. 1.[3f.]) is the bride; the "daughters of Jerusalem" are the virgins of the district, who take part in the marriage ceremonies (their name indicating that the songs probably originated in or near Jerusalem); the "sixty mighty men" are the companions of the bridegroom. The order of the songs in our book does not altogether correspond with that in modern use, as the description of the physical charms of the bride in 7.[1-7] should come before the approach of the bridegroom in 3.[6ff.] The whole work, therefore, according to this view, consists of the regular songs of the marriage festival, but not in order, together with a number of songs in praise of love generally, such as were sung at these festivals.

Whether the editor of the book used these songs with any idea of a dramatic unity is difficult to decide. A full discussion of this point will be found in J. W. Rothstein's article on the Song in HDB., vol. iv. pp. 589–597.

Of the authorship and date of the work little can be said but what is negative. The view that Solomon is the author is impossible according to either of the views of its nature given above, and because of the linguistic evidence (see below). The date of the poem is disputed. Some hold it to be pre-exilic on account of the mention of Tirzah, which was the capital of the Northern Kingdom in the tenth century (1 K. 14.[17]–16.[23f.]), and the apparently fresh memory of the brilliance of Solomon's court. According to this view the form of the relative pronoun (see Driver's Intro., p. 449), and the writer's knowledge of the places of North Palestine, indicate that the work came from the Northern Kingdom. The foreign words are then explained as having been introduced into Palestine by commerce with the East. But apart from a few passages of northern origin in the Old Testament, the form of the relative pronoun is that used only in exilic or post-exilic writings. The mention of Tirzah and of the glories of Solomon's court may be due to the poetical style only. One of the Persian words used (that for "orchard" in 4.[13]) would not come in by commerce, and the word used for "palanquin" or "chariot" in 3.[9] seems to be Greek. The earliest time possible for the composition of the Song of Songs would thus be the Macedonian period, when such words first came into the Hebrew language.

G. W. Thatcher.

SONS OF GOD. (1) The title is used to indicate the status conferred on those who believe in Jesus Christ (Jn. 1.[12]; Php. 2.[15]; 1 Jn. 3.[1f.]). The phrase is practically ident. with that elsewhere trd. "children of God" (see Adoption). (2) See Angels.

SONS OF THE PROPHETS. See Prophet, Prophecy.

SOOTHSAYER, SOOTHSAYING. See Divination.

SOPATER, a Berœan Christian, s. of Pyrrhus, who accompanied St. Paul through Macedonia as far as Asia, on his way to Jerusalem (Ac. 20.[4]). The name is another form of SOSIPATER, and the father may be mentioned for distinction.

SOPE. See SOAP.

SOPHERETH, ancestor of a family among "Solomon's servants" (Ne. 7.[57]), called "Hassophereth" in Ez. 2.[55], "Assaphioth" in 1 Es. 5.[33] RV.

SORCERY. See DIVINATION.

SOREK, VALLEY OF. Here was the home of Delilah, the temptress and undoer of Samson (Jg. 16.[4]). OEJ. notes a place called "Capharsorec," near to the town of "Saraa," i.e. ZORAH, Samson's native place. It is represented by the mod. vill. Khirbet Sūrīk. It stands to the N. of Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār, about a mile and a half to the W. of Zorah (Ṣar'ah). We may therefore ident. the valley of Sorek with Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār.

SOSIPATER, if he be not ident. with SOPATER, is named only in Rm. 16.[21], as a "kinsman" of St. Paul (i.e. poss. a Benjamite), who joins in salutations to the Roman Christians.

SOSTHENES. (1) Ruler of the synagogue in Corinth (Ac. 18.[17]). The conversion of Crispus, who held the same office, is recorded in v. 8. S. apparently succeeded him, and in virtue of his position took the lead in complaining to the Roman governor against St. Paul. Gallio's contemptuous dismissal of the case as dealing with Jewish trifles—"words and names and your own law book"—was the signal for an outbreak in which some old scores would be paid off. A prosperous Jew would not be very popular among the Greeks. (2) St. Paul's associate and possibly amanuensis in the writing of 1 Cor. (1.[1]). He may have been a native of Corinth. This wd. explain his part in an epistle to the Christians there. But there is no reason to suppose that he is identical with (1).

SOTAI, ancestor of a family of "Solomon's servants" (Ez. 2.[55]; Ne. 7.[57]).

SOUL AND SPIRIT. Although the Heb. terms of wh. these words are the tr., nephesh and rūaḥ, occur frequently in the OT., the distinction does not appear to be so clearly drawn as in the NT., in wh. the terms ψυχή and πνεῦμα stand opposed to each other. We shall begin our study by considering the usage in the NT. These two terms occur along with σῶμα in 1 Th. 5.[23], "And may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Some, like Professor Jowett in his commentary on this epistle, declare that the apostle had no distinct notions in regard to these terms. "He (Paul) is not writing a treatise on the soul, but pouring forth, fm. the fulness of his heart, a prayer for his converts." Did this passage stand alone, a good deal cd. be said for Dr. Jowett's view. When, however, we find St. Paul making the distinction between the first and second Adam turn on the difference between "a living soul" and "a quickening spirit"; when further we find (He. 4.[12]) a writer of the Pauline school say of the Word of God, it is "living and active . . . piercing to the dividing of soul and spirit" (RV.), it seems difficult to maintain that the distinction was merely a rhetorical amplification.

Assuming, then, that there is a distinction between these terms, it is necessary that we endeavour to discover what it is. The first step in such an investigation must be the careful study of the passages in wh. the terms occur and the various senses in wh. they are used. To take spirit (Gr. pneuma, Heb. rūaḥ), we find it used for "wind." "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof" (Jn. 3.[8]); so it is used in the LXX, e.g. Jb. 1.[19]. Again it is used for the "breath," hence yielding up the breath—"giving up the ghost" as the equivalent of death (Mw. 27.[50]); so Js. 2.[26]. These two, breeze and breath, it may be remarked, were meanings in classic Greek (Plato, Phædr. 229; Thuc. ii. 49). At the opposite pole fm. this is our Lord's declaration, "God is a Spirit"; and connected with this is the designation of the Third Person in the Trinity, "the Holy Spirit" (to pneuma to hagion), as Eph. 4.[30], "Grieve not the Holy Spirit." Angels are declared to be "spirits." "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister?" (He. 1.[14]). There are also "unclean spirits" (pneumata akatharta). In regard to the apostles we are told that our Lord "gave them power against 'unclean spirits'" (Mw. 10.[1]). It is used also for a portion of man's nature; as in the conclusion of our Lord's statement as to the spirituality of God, "They that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth" (Jn. 4.[24]). We find this also in the Epp.; thus 1 Cor. 2.[11], "For what man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of man wh. is in him?" Popular opinion held that though "spirits" might be visible they were not tangible; hence our Lord, when the apostles doubted after His resurrection, says, "Handle Me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have" (Lk. 24.[39]). There are also some cognate uses of the word wh. have to be considered; "the spirit of bondage" (pneuma douleias, Rm. 8.[15]); here it means the disposition, as also in a passage in the TR. found in the Bezan Codex, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of" (Lk. 9.[55]). Further, when a man is specially under the influence of the Divine Spirit; as Mw. 22.[43], "David in the Spirit calleth Him Lord."

It is necessary to consider the functions of spirit not only positively, but negatively, that is, in the light of the faculties and capacities of human nature with wh. it is contrasted. The first is "SOUL." The passages quoted already (1 Cor. 15.[45]; He.

4.[12]) sufficiently prove that there is a distinction. The distinction is carried out in the derivative adjectives; thus the "spiritual (pneumatic) man" is contrasted with the "natural (psychic) man" (1 Cor. 2.[13, 14]); in fact the "psychic" or soulish man is defined as one that "has not the spirit" (Ju.[19]). The spirit is contrasted with FLESH (sarx), as "The spirit is willing but the flesh is weak" (Mw. 26.[41]); believers "walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit." By a comparison of passages it will be seen that there is a connection between ψυχή and σάρξ wh. will be considered below. Some, dwelling on the distinction between "reason" (nous) and "understanding" (dianoia), have been inclined to identify the spirit with the first; but it is expressly distinguished fm. the nous. "My spirit prayeth, but my understanding (nous) is unfruitful" (1 Cor. 14.[14]).

At the same time the usage of St. Paul, to whom this word is almost restricted, varies; nous is sometimes contrasted with the "flesh" (sarx), as in Rm. 7.[25], "So then with the mind (nous) I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin"; so conversion is "the renewing of the 'mind' (nous)" (Rm. 12.[2]); yet again the "mind" may be "reprobate" (Rm. 1.[28]), the Gentiles walk "in the vanity of their 'mind' (nous)" (Eph. 4.[17]). It is a faculty wh. may be the instrument of the spirit or of the flesh.

In this connection we ought to consider resemblances as well as contrasts. The most important of these is HEART (kardia); it has been borrowed fm. OT. through the LXX. It is identified by Paul with "spirit"; thus he speaks of "circumcision of the 'heart,' in the 'spirit'" (Rm. 2.[29]). Many of the functions ascribed to the "spirit" are also ascribed to the "heart," as cp. 2 Cor. 1.[22] with Rm. 8.[16]; both are the sphere of the Divine Spirit's influence: so too in regard to worship, cp. Mw. 15.[9] with Jn. 4.[23, 24]. Both are contrasted with "soul," and regarded with it as completing the inner nature (cp. Ac. 4.[32] with Lk. 1.[46, 47]). It may be observed that "heart" in the Scriptural sense of the word has nothing to do with the affection; only in relation to God are "heart" and "love" associated (Mw. 22.[37]; Mk. 12.[30]; Lk. 10.[27]) in quotation fm. Dt. 6.[5]. It is the seat of reasoning (Lk. 9.[46, 47]; Mk. 2.[8]), of meditation (Lk. 21.[14]). This practical identification of "heart" and "spirit" widens our knowledge of the Scriptural notion of the latter. The spirit, then, is the Divine in man; when man is under Divine inspiration he is "in the Spirit"; wd. he approach God aright he must do so "in the Spirit"; it is the faculty of faith, it is that by wh. we can be the "children of God." It is thus the highest part of human nature, that wh. makes us kin to the angels and to God Himself.

Soul.—This may be taken as a portion of human nature inferior to the "spirit"; God is never called a Soul, nor is the Third Person in the Holy Trinity ever called the "Holy Soul." We have seen that "spirit" is distinguished fm. "soul"; in one aspect they are united—the immortal part is called by both names; thus He. 12.[23] speaks of the glorified believers as "the spirits of just men made perfect," and in Rv. 6.[9] the "souls" of those "that were slain for the Word of God." "Soul" (psychē) and "natural" = "soulish" (psychic), are often contrasted with "spirit" and "spiritual," and the latter are also contrasted with "flesh" (sarx) and "fleshly" (sarkikos, sarkinos); we may therefore regard them as in some degree identical. It may be noted that while ψυχή has not generally a bad connotation, σάρξ usually has; both the adjectives are associated, if not with moral evil, yet with moral weakness, wh. gravitates towards it; thus in Js. 3.[15] we find the "wisdom" that results in strife is characterised as "earthly, sensual (ψυχική), devilish"; again we are told that "the natural (ψυχικός) man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God . . . neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2.[14]). Paul in 1 Cor. 15.[44, 46] lays stress on the superiority of the resurrection body over that wh. is laid in the grave, since the latter is only a "'natural' (ψυχικόν) body." So too of sarkikos, "carnal"; the apostle Paul says, "I am carnal, sold under sin" (Rm. 7.[14]); again he says, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty" (2 Cor. 10.[4]): however, sarx by itself, unless it refers to the physical frame, has always an evil association; as "In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing" (Rm. 7.[18]); "The carnal mind (to phronēma tēs sarkos, "the mind of the flesh") is enmity against God" (Rm. 8.[7]). In the preceding verse the position is yet stronger: "To be carnally minded (i.e. to have the life purpose wh. is associated with the flesh) is death" (8.[6]). The usage in regard to psychē is different in the Gospels and the Acts fm. what it is in the Epp. It means frequently "life." "They are dead which sought the child's life" (ψυχή, Mw. 2.[20]). "Is not the life (soul) more than meat" (6.[25]). "The Son of Man came . . . to give His life (soul) a ransom for many." This sense also occurs in the Epistles, as Rm. 16.[4]. Even in the Gospels we find instances of the distinction, as in the Magnificat, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" (Lk. 1.[46]). There is a use of "soul" as "person" nearly peculiar to Acts, as "three thousand souls" (2.[41]); "threescore and fifteen 'souls'" (7.[14]), &c.: it occurs also in 1 P. 3.[20], "few, that is eight persons." Akin to this is Rv. 18.[13], "souls of men."

We find, then, that "soul" and "spirit" are two distinct portions of our nature, not different aspects of one and the same. On the other hand, there does not seem to be any evidence in favour of Pfleiderer's contention that Paul's doctrine was that the Messianic pneuma was the share of man in the essence of Christ's life, a donum superadditum. Against this is the peculiarly personal function ascribed to the "spirit." "What man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of man wh. is in him?" (1 Cor. 2.[11]); here "spirit" performs the function of self-consciousness. If we gather up what has emerged in our study we find that the "spirit" is that part of man wh. is akin to God, who is "the Father of our 'spirits'" (He. 12.[9]). If we assume the identity of "heart" and "spirit" we find that faith is one of its functions—"With the heart man believeth" (Rm. 10.[10]): "conscience" also; thus in 1 Jn. 3.[20, 21], the alternatives are presented, "If our heart condemn us . . . if our heart condemn us not." On the other hand, everything connected, not only with the bodily senses, but also with the discursive intellect, is summed up in the soul. It is more than merely the vital principle of the body. In the ecstatic speaking with tongues under the influence of the Spirit, in wh. the human spirit was active, there was need for the interpretation of the discursive intellect.

We must, however, approach this subject fm. another side—the phenomena of conversion or Regeneration. The state of man before the spiritual change takes place in him is said to be one of death—he is dead in trespasses and sins. This does not imply any want of intellectual ability; the wise of this world and their cunning craftiness are contrasted with those who possess "the simplicity that is in Christ." This death affects only the spirit, that part of man's nature by wh. he can have intercourse with God, by wh. he can hold the relation of sonship to Him. To say that the "spirit" is dead does not mean that it is non-existent: a corpse is a dead body, but it exists, it possesses weight, it occupies space; only it does not live, it is no longer an organism, the instrument and expression of a vital process. The spirit exists, but not as the organ and instrument of the Divine Spirit; it is dead. But this dead spirit is quickened to new life by the Spirit wh. Christ hath given us. By the spirit that is in us being again made alive we become once more "sons of God." At his creation man had this spirit, he had the image of God; but by the Fall the Divine image was lost, man became spiritually dead. Like some aborted organ this dead spirit was conveyed down the generations. It was, however, only dead Godward; towards the soul and the body it continued to fulfil its legitimate functions. When God created the human body fm. the dust of the ground, He breathed into the nostrils the breath of life, infused into the organism something fm. His Divine Nature—Peter says we are "partakers of Divine Nature" (2 P. 1.[4]),—and there was evoked the soul to be the nexus uniting the Divine and the material, the spirit and the body.

If this is a true exhibition of the doctrine of the apostles, then we shd. expect to find it in the writings of the earliest of the Fathers. Though there is nothing bearing on this to be found in the Apostolic Fathers, fm. the nature and purpose of whose writings it was not to be expected, yet in Justin Martyr we find it distinctly enunciated. In the fragment of his treatise on the Resurrection we have this statement: "The body is the dwelling of the soul, the soul the dwelling of the spirit." We find a similar statement in his dialogue with Trypho; he makes Trypho say (Dial. 6), "As the body without the soul is dead, so is the soul without the quickening spirit (ζωτικὸν πνεῦμα)," proving that Justin thought this distinction to be one recognised by Jews as well as Christians. Similarly Irenæus (contra Hær. V. 6.[1]), "The soul and the spirit are certainly a part of the man, certainly not the man; for the perfect man consists in the commingling and the union of the soul receiving the Spirit of the Father, and the admixture of that fleshly nature wh. was moulded after the image of God" (Roberts's translation). Many of the Gnostic heresies assume this trichotomy. The Apollinarian heresy cd. never have arisen had this doctrine been generally held. Apollinaris maintained that the unity in the person of Christ consisted in the part that the human spirit occupied in the human economy being supplied by the Second Person in the Trinity; a view that was rejected by the Church because it made the human nature of our Lord incomplete. It wd. seem that the doctrine of a trichotomy was abandoned to deprive Apollinarianism of a harbour. We must, then, assume that it was part of the primitive system of doctrine wh. was laid aside for controversial reasons.

As the language of this trichotomy was borrowed fm. the OT., so to some extent was the doctrine itself; only it never reached the clearness of definition in the OT. wh. it attained in the NT. As was natural, the human spirit was quickened by the coming of Christ in a way it had never been before. His influence preceded Him, as the dawn before the sunrise; so men were quickened into newness of life, but not as they were when He had come in the flesh. We find rūaḥ (spirit), nephesh (soul), bāsār (flesh), all used in similar senses to the Greek pneuma, psychē, and sarx; and passing through nearly the same variations of meaning. Thus rūaḥ means "wind," as in Ps. 1.[4], "Like chaff wh. the wind (rūaḥ) driveth"; so Ex. 10.[13]; 1 K. 19.[11], &c.: also "breath" as Jb. 17.[1], "My breath (rūaḥ) is corrupt"; so Ps. 146.[4]; Ec. 3.[19]: the disposition, "an haughty spirit" (Pr. 16.[18]), "a contrite spirit" (Ps. 34.[18]), &c. Although the doctrine of the Trinity is not formally taught in the OT. the language used frequently suits the Christian view of the function of the Third Person, as in Gn. 1.[2],

"The Spirit of God moved (was brooding, RVm.) upon the face of the waters"; and 2 Ch. 15.[1], "The Spirit of God came upon Azariah," &c. There are many references to the human spirit, as Jb. 32.[8], "There is a spirit in man"; Nu. 16.[22], "The God of the spirits of all flesh." The uses of nephesh coincide in like manner pretty nearly with those of psychē. As to bāsār, the evil connotation sarx has in the Pauline writings does not seem to attach to its Heb. equivalent. As we saw that kardia was nearly parallel in meaning to pneuma, so is lēb or lēbāb, "heart," to rūaḥ; it is with the "heart" that man is related to God; "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart" (Pr. 3.[5]). There is a passage wh. relates lēb, "heart," to nephesh, "soul," "The heart knoweth its own bitterness (the bitterness of its soul)" (Pr. 14.[10]), as if the nephesh were, to use Justin's words, "the dwelling" of the rūaḥ.

While necessarily the OT. was the principal source of the NT. trichotomy, there are other traces of this doctrine wh. seem to carry it farther back in history. The Egyptians' sepulture arrangements imply a certain trichotomy. There was the "Ba," wh. on death flew back to the gods, and the "Ka," wh. was more nearly associated with the body. It was for the "Ka" that the body was embalmed, and that feasts were left in the tombs. Plato, who professed to be much influenced by Egyptian thought, as one may see fm. the frequency with wh. he refers in his illustrative myths to Egypt as their place of origin, had a trichotomy, but one scarcely parallel with that wh. we are here considering. In Philo, Josephus, and the Apocryphal writings are evidences that a trichotomy resembling that of Paul was in common thought. The Neo-Platonist movement developed it further; this, however, might be in consequence, to some extent at least, of Christian influences. The philosophy of the Stoics took it up also, till at length Marcus Aurelius states it almost in terms. It is interesting to note the close connection the Stoic school had with Cilicia, Paul's native province; Zeno, its founder, was born in Cyprus, wh. is off the coast of Cilicia; Chrysippus, its second founder, was born in Soli; several of the presidents of the school were Tarsians. St. Paul might have learned the terms to wh. he gave their Christian connotation in the school at Tarsus.

Were this the place for a dissertation on psychology, the Pauline trichotomy might be defended as psychologically true. Recent investigations on the subliminal consciousness appear to prove that there are powers in our nature performing intellectual operations beyond the ken of the conscious "Ego." If the pneuma represents the self-conscious "Ego," then the "subliminal consciousness" may represent the psychē, "the soul."

Lit.: Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology; Beck, Biblical Psychology; Laidlaw, Bible Doctrine of Man; Dickson, St. Paul's Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit; Pfleiderer, Paulinism, vol. i.

SOUTH. See Negeb.

SOWER, SOWING. See Agriculture.

SPAIN appears in 1 M. 8.[3] as the scene of Roman victories, and a land rich in gold and silver. It is described as "very far" from the Romans. The apostle Paul cherished the hope of being able to visit it after he should have seen Rome (Rm. 15.[24, 28]). The country known then as Spania (Lat. Hispania) corresponded generally to mod. Spain. The Greeks called it Hesperia, or Ibēria, from the river Ibēr (the Ebro). The Phœnicians seem to have been the first to discover the riches of the country, and to have had colonies there in antiquity, probably to work the veins of precious metal found especially in the uplands between the rivers Bætis and Anas. Under the leadership of Hamilcar, Hasdrubal, and Hannibal in succession, the Carthaginians subdued the country (B.C. 236–219). Fm. S. Hannibal set out on his memorable invasion of Italy. With the defeat of Carthage S. fell to the Romans, but the conquest was not completed till the reign of Augustus. It was valuable on account of its agricultural and mineral wealth. The inhabitants soon fell into Roman ways, and adopted imperial sentiments. There is no evidence that St. Paul was ever able to gratify his wish.

SPAN (Heb. zereth), the distance between the point of the thumb and the point of the little finger when the hand is stretched out, about nine inches (see Weights and Measures).

Sparrow

SPARROW (Heb. tzippōr, Gr. strouthion). The Heb. really means "a small bird," and the name is derived fm. the chirping; hence in the EV. it is usually rendered "bird" (Gn. 7.[14]; Lv. 14.[4]), and several times "fowl" (Dt. 4.[17]; Ps. 148.[10]). Though the trapping of birds for food is common all over the E. the S. is not easily caught, so much so that the Arabs have proverbs of its wariness. The only cases in wh. tzippōr is rendered S. in the EV. are Ps. 84.[3] and 102.[7], the one passage referring to its habit of nesting beside human dwellings, and the other to its gregariousness, and consequently the specially lonely appearance that one " alone upon the housetop " wd. present. In the NT. our Lord refers to sparrows as creatures of least value, three being sold for a farthing, and five for two farthings. The true sparrow is common in Pal., although in some districts the crested lark is fully commoner; probably the distinction was not noted.

SPEAR, SPEARMAN (Heb. ḥănīth, rōmaḥ, kīdōn, Gr. longche). The spear was a weapon early evolved; it combined to some extent the advantages, as an offensive arm, of the sword and the dart. It essentially consisted of a long rod or staff with a sharpened head; at first the head was probably merely sharpened, then its piercing power was increased by arming the head with flint. This, however, ere very long gave place to metal, first bronze, then iron. It is difficult to assign distinct meanings to the different Heb. words given above. It wd., however, seem that ḥănīth was the regular military spear. It was Saul's favourite weapon; it was stuck in the ground beside his bolster during the night (1 S. 26.[7]) when in the camp; it leant on the wall beside him at feasts when it was not in his hands (1 S. 18.[10], 20.[33]) in his own house; when last seen, wounded in the battle of Gilboa, he was leaning on his spear (2 S. 1.[6]). That Saul hurled it at David is no evidence against it being a spear, as the Homeric warriors always used the spear as a missile in the first encounter (Il. vii. 244, 249). If we may deduce the appearance of the ḥănīth fm. the S. of the Egyptian and Assyrian warriors, it does not seem to have been much if at all longer than the height of a man (Layard, Mon. of Nin., plate 69; Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i. fig. 26). The Assyrian S. must have been very strong, as a warrior is seen dislodging stones with it (Layard, Mon. of Nin., plate 66). The rōmaḥ was probably a longer and slighter weapon, possibly not unlike the Arab S., wh. bears the same name, rumḥ; it is about 14 or 15 feet in length. Against this is the fact that Joel calls upon the Jews to " beat their pruning-hooks into spears," a statement that wd. indicate a shorter weapon unless it was merely the spearhead that was to be supplied fm. the " pruning hook." It is to be noted that in the contrasted passage in Is. 2.[4] and Micah 4.[3], the word for S. is ḥănīth. This form of S. seems to have been the common weapon, the want of wh. was evidence of utter disarmament. When Rehoboam placed magazines of arms in the cities of Judah this is the weapon wh., along with shields, is supplied. It is usually thought that kīdōn means a " dart," but there is nothing in the use of the word to fix this. It seems difficult to understand how Goliath cd. have a " javelin of bronze " between his shoulders. A good deal can be said for the suggestion of Thenius that we shd. read māgēn, " shield," in this passage, in agreement with LXX and the Tg. Jn. This suggestion is all the more plausible that in the Samaritan script (see WRITING) wh. preceded the square character, and was therefore probably that in wh. the MS. was written fm. wh. the LXX translation was made, m and k are very like, g and d not very unlike, and with the final letters alike kīdōn mt. easily emerge. It cd., besides, scarcely have been a short weapon like a " javelin " with wh. Joshua signalled to the men in ambush behind Ai (Jo. 8.[18]). In the NT. only in regard to the weapon with wh. the soldier pierced our Lord's side does the word occur; it is the cavalry lance in all likelihood that is there meant. The " sarissa," a spear of 16 feet long with wh. the Macedonian phalanx was armed changed the character of warfare; it met the charge of cavalry with a hedge of pikes. The Roman legionary tactics were freer, and superseded the phalanx; still the idea of the hedge of spears maintained its place. Singularly, both the cases in wh. spearmen occurs—one in the OT. and the other in the NT.—are mistranslations. In Ps. 68.[30], instead of " the company of spearmen " we ought to read " the wild beast of the reeds," and the " two hundred spearmen " of Ac. 23.[23] really ought to be " slingers."

MOUNTED SPEARMAN OF SARGON'S TIME

SPECKLED BIRD (Heb. haʿayiṭ tzābūʿa, Jr. 12.[9]). As the MT. stands there is very considerable difficulty in interpreting these words. The rendering of the Heb. is grammatically doubtful; it is not certain whether the first syllable is to be regarded as the " article," as in the AV., or as the " interrogative," as in the RV. and Vlg. Then the word rendered " bird " means " ravenous bird," like an eagle or a vulture; on the other hand tzāʿūʿa means not so naturally "speckled" as "dyed," though it does mean this; it also, however, means "taloned," as in AVm., fm. a root meaning "to seize," "to grasp." The LXX (B), however, gives a totally different interpretation, "Is not my heritage to me a hyæna's cave." The LXX (A) instead of "hyæna" reads "robbers." An Arb. root, ghāt, means "to dig," whence ghāît, "a depression in the ground"; fm. this it seems possible that "den" may be the meaning here. The word trd. "speckled" is rendered "hyæna" by Gesenius. The whole passage wd. be read, "My heritage is the lair of a hyæna, the lair is round about upon her. Come gather together every beast of the field that they devour her." At the same time something may be said for the RV.; only there seems to be an incongruity in all the beasts of the field being assembled to devour a speckled vulture, wh. does not apply to their being assembled to devour what a "hyæna" or "robbers" had collected.

SPELT. See Fitches.

SPICE, SPICES. Several Heb. words are so trd. (1) Bāsām (SS. 5.[1], RVm. "balsam"), bōsem, besem, pl. bĕsāmīm. According to Ex. 30.[23] this was a generic name covering myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia. The Oriental love of pungent odours brought these into general use, and made them important articles of commerce (Ek. 27.[22]). They formed ingredients in the holy anointing oil. They were esteemed as royal gifts (1 K. 10.[2, 25], &c.). They were part of the stores guarded in the chambers of the house of the Lord (1 Ch. 9.[29], &c.), and they were reckoned among the treasures of the wealthy (2 Ch. 32.[27]). Spices were employed in the purification of women (Est. 2.[12]), and in preparing the dead for burial (2 Ch. 16.[14]; EV. "sweet odours," Heb. "spices"). (2) Nĕkōʾth occurs in two passages, Gn. 37.[25], 43.[11]. In the former RVm. suggests "gum tragacanth or storax." It may have been only a general name for fragrant substances. (3) Ṣammīm. This also is a generic term, under wh. are included galbanum, onycha, and stacte. The Gr. arōmata (Mk. 16.[1], &c.) and amōmon (Rv. 18.[13], AV. "odours") both seem to denote aromatic materials generally.

SPIDER (Heb. ʿakkābīsh, Jb. 8.[14]; Is. 59.[5, 6]; sĕmāmīth, Pr. 30.[28]). There seems no reasonable doubt that the former of these words in the two passages in wh. it occurs means S. in our sense of the term, as there is reference to the "web" and to its frailty. All the versions agree with this. There is more difficulty about the second. The passage does not suggest a spider "taking hold with her hands." This is not the action of a S., nor do its legs resemble hands. All the versions agree in regarding the creature intended here to be a species of "lizard"; so the RV. They are numerous in Palestine.

SPIKENARD (Heb. nērd, SS. 1.[12], &c.) is an oil with a pleasant perfume obtained from the "spike" of a plant, Nardostachys Jatamansi, a native of India. The Arabs call it Sunbul Hindi, "Indian spike." The nardos pistikē of Mk. 14.[3]; Jn. 12.[3], prob. means "liquid nard." The higher qualities were of great value. The "spikenard" used in anointing the Saviour's feet would cost about £12.

Spikenard

SPINDLE. See Spinning.

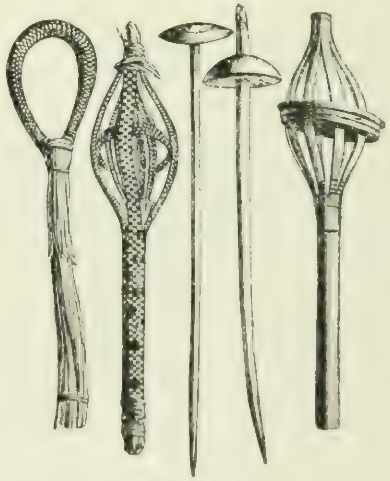
SPINNING. Wool, fibre or flax (see Linen), camel's hair, goat's hair, silk, and cotton were all used by the ancients in producing woven fabrics.



Spindles

The thread or yarn was made by the use of distaff or spindle. The former was a stick, to the top of wh. the wool or fibre, properly prepared by scouring and carding, was attached. It was held under the left arm. The stuff was drawn out and twisted with the right hand, and rolled on a ball, which revolved with the twisting of the yarn. The spindle prob. resembled that still in common use in the East. A staff is passed through the centre of a circular board, and the material is attached to a hook on the end. The yarn is twisted by revolving the spindle, wh. is steadied by the circular disc. Among the Hebrews, as among the mod. Arabs, this work was done by the women (Ex. $35.^{25f.}$; Pr. $31.^{19}$). "One that holds the spindle" (so we shd. prob. render maḥăzīq bappelek, not one "that leaneth on a staff," AV. in 2 S. $3.^{29}$), is an effeminate person, a great contrast with the warrior Joab.

SPIRIT. See Soul and Spirit.

SPIRIT, THE HOLY; PARACLETE. The Holy Spirit in Christian Theology is the third person in the Unity of the Godhead, and the doctrine of the Spirit and His work is an outcome of the Divine revelation of God to men, which grew from more to more, till in the teaching of Christ and His apostles it attained completeness. The growth of the conception can be traced through the progress of God's revelation of Himself to men, and we shall seek to sketch in brief outline the varied stages in the formation of this idea, as we find them in the Scriptures.

- I. The Spirit in the OT.
  - 1. Term and uses.
  - 2. Work ascribed to Spirit.
  - 3. Development of conception in OT.
- II. The Spirit in the Apocrypha.
- III. The Spirit in the NT.
  - 1. Terms.
  - 2. Work ascribed to Spirit.
  - 3. Teaching regarding the Spirit.
    - (a) In the teaching of Jesus.
    - (b) In the teaching of St. Paul.

I. In the Old Testament. 1. Term and uses.—The word rūaḥ, translated "spirit," comes from a root "to breathe," "to blow," and also means "wind," "breath." As the breath of man is a sign of life, the term came to mean "breath of life" or generally "life" (Gn. $45.^{27}$; Jb. $12.^{10}$). A further modification took place, and "spirit" was applied to the mental life of man—the emotional life (Gn. $41.^{8}$; Nu. $5.^{14}$, or the life of will or thought (Jb. $15.^{13}$, $32.^{8}$), and then the term was used of the spiritual life of man as distinct from the flesh. Lastly the term was carried over from the human to the Divine sphere, and the Spirit of God is the vital energy of the Divine Nature which is represented as working in the world and among men. The combination Holy Spirit does not belong to the OT., and only occurs twice, viz. Is. $63.^{10, 11}$; Ps. $51.^{11}$.

2. Work of the Spirit.—(a) The Spirit, the vital energy of the Divine Nature, is represented as operative in creation. The Spirit broods (Gn. $1.^{2}$) on the primæval chaos and brings forth the order of the universe. Thus in the OT. He is the "Giver of life." The breath or Spirit of God vitalises what the Word creates, and also preserves the life of the world and the creatures in it (Ps. $33.^{6}$, $104.^{30}$).

(b) Again the Spirit is represented as coming upon men and endowing them with special gifts. Intellectual life generally is the gift of the Spirit. The breath of God in man made him a "living soul" (Gn. $2.^{7}$), thus marking him off from the animal creation. But not only personal life generally but all special endowments of body or mind are referred to the Spirit's working. Thus the prowess of the Judges, Gideon (Jg. $6.^{34}$), Samson ($13.^{25}$), &c.; the mechanical skill of Bezaleel (Ex. $36.^{1ff.}$); the wisdom of Solomon (1 K. $3.^{28}$), are effects of the Spirit's work.

(c) The most outstanding aspect of the work of the Spirit in the OT. is found in connection with the inspiration of the prophets (cp. art. Prophet). All the varied forms and stages of prophetic inspiration, from the seer and diviner to the great ethical prophets, are connected with the Spirit. The Spirit, in fact, was supposed to endow men for any special service. Thus we have references to the anointing of the Messiah with the Divine Spirit to enable Him to fulfil His vocation (Is. $61.^{1ff.}$, $42.^{1}$).

(d) In addition to these special activities of the Spirit we find Him represented as bringing to men spiritual enlightenment and moral elevation (cp. Ne. $9.^{20}$; Ps. $51.^{11}$; Is. $63.^{10, 11}$), while the prophets look forward to the time when these ethical operations shall be extended and the Spirit poured on all flesh (cp. Jr. $31.^{31ff.}$; Jl. $2.^{28}$; Ek. $36.^{26f.}$).

3. Development in OT. ideas.—The Spirit, all through the OT., is the expression used for God exerting His power, and this came in course of time to be personified as the quasi-personal energy of God in man. The Spirit came more and more to be regarded as the Divine elevating and moralising influence in human life.

II. In the Apocryphal Literature the Holy Spirit is seldom alluded to, and there is, at least in the Palestinian writers, no approach to the doctrine of a personal Spirit. The Alexandrian school, however, preserved the idea of the all-pervading influence of the Divine Spirit, which is sometimes identified with Wisdom. In Philo the Spirit comes to all men. It is the pure wisdom of which every wise man partakes. In this connection the doctrine of the verbal and mechanical inspiration of the Scriptures was developed. The prophet is the mouthpiece of the Divine Spirit. Little is said of the Spirit's work in enlightening the minds of men or renewing the moral nature.

III. In the New Testament. 1. Terms.—In the NT. the doctrine of the Spirit has a large place.

Here we find varied names applied, e.g. Holy Spirit, Spirit of God, Spirit of Jesus, Spirit of the Father, Spirit of the Son. Other terms are applied, corresponding to the gifts and graces imparted by the Spirit to men, e.g. Spirit of truth, Spirit of wisdom, of grace, of life, of adoption, while the personal name of the Paraclete or the Advocate (AV. Comforter) is applied by Jesus to the Divine Spirit who shall carry on His work after His departure (cp. Jn. 14.16ff.).

2. Work ascribed to Spirit.—In the Synoptic account of the life of Jesus a great rôle is ascribed to the agency of the Spirit. Before the Incarnation He drew near to men and awakened prophetic activity, which for centuries had slumbered. Zacharias predicts His coming, Simeon and Anna are moved by the Spirit to recognise Him in the Temple. The Spirit announces to Mary the birth of her Son, and the conception is ascribed to His agency (cp. Jesus Christ, Virgin Birth), though here the idea of the Spirit is the OT. one of the creative energy of God Himself. The life thus miraculously begun is sustained by the Spirit. Before the commencement of the public ministry we find the narrative of the illapse of the Spirit at the baptism of John (Jn. 1.33). This experience is regarded as the anointing of the Messiah for His work. Thus we find Jesus claiming that the Messianic prophecies that speak of the anointing of the Spirit apply to Him (Lk. 4.18ff.), and His life is now full of the manifested workings of the Spirit (Lk. 4.14). It is to this Divine energy that the miracles and teaching of Jesus are ascribed (Mw. 12.28; Ac. 1.2).

After the resurrection the Spirit was imparted to the apostles (Jn. 20.22), and on the Day of Pentecost to the whole Church (Ac. 1.5, 8, 2.1ff.). The rushing, mighty wind filling the house, and the tongues of fire, were the outward signs of the descent of the Spirit, which filled the recipients with new enthusiasm and endowed them with special miraculous powers, of which the gifts of tongues and prophecy were the most outstanding.

3. Teaching of NT.—(a) In teaching of Jesus. The Synoptics have preserved little with regard to the Holy Spirit which goes beyond the OT. The inspiration of the Scriptures is recognised (Mk. 12.36; Lk. 24.44). The Holy Spirit is promised to the disciples (Mw. 10.20), and will be given to all who ask the Father for the gift (Lk. 11.13). The most remarkable statement in the Synoptics is the baptismal formula (Mw. 28.19). Although many recent scholars have denied that these are genuine words of Jesus, the statement only completes the teaching of the fourth Gospel. It places the Spirit in co-ordination with the Father and the Son, and comprehends all three under the Divine name.

The teaching of the fourth Gospel devotes a large place to the work of the Spirit. He is the agent in the production of the new birth, working silently and mysteriously in the hearts of men (Jn. 3.5-8). He is the source of spiritual life (Jn. 7.39). The chief part of the teaching of Jesus is found in the last discourse (Jn. 14.–16.). Another Paraclete, the Spirit of truth, is promised (14.26). The Paraclete will carry on the work of Christ after His departure. He is spoken of as a personal agent distinct from Christ and the Father. "The Father will give you another Paraclete." "I will send Him from the Father." The functions of the Paraclete, who shall be present with the disciples (Jn. 14.17), are various. He shall bring the teaching of Christ to the remembrance of His followers (14.26). He shall teach them all truth (16.13). He shall glorify Christ by revealing Him to the disciples (16.14). His work shall extend to those who know not Christ. He shall convince the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment (16.8ff.).

(b) These promises were fulfilled after the Ascension in the experience of Pentecost, in the subsequent work of the apostles, and in the life of the Church, and we find all the apostolic writers referring to the reality and effect of the Spirit's presence. In the epistles of St. Paul these references are frequent, and have led to the full development of the doctrine of the Spirit. But we must remember that the apostle gives us no direct exposition. His allusions are more or less of a casual nature, and in order to appreciate them we must remember the state of opinion in the Church at Paul's time. The early Church regarded itself as the product of the Spirit's work, and manifestations of the Spirit's activity were found in the special and extraordinary powers given to the early Christians, such as the gift of tongues, miracles, visions, revelations, and prophecy. The more miraculous these gifts were, the more they were prized. Accordingly we find Paul writing to the highly-strung Church of Corinth on this subject. For him the gifts, which he also claims to possess, are to be tested by their utility in edifying the body of Christ. He finds the chief manifestation of the Spirit's work in the ordinary life of Christian men and women, not in extraordinary endowments. The life of love and faith was for him the supreme manifestation of the work of the Spirit. It is the "more excellent way" (1 Cor. 12.31). The Spirit is before all else the Spirit of sanctification, and its fruits are "faith, hope, and love" (1 Cor. 13.13), or "love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Gal. 5.22, 23)—ethical qualities common to all Christians. In addition the Spirit is the Spirit of sonship, teaching men to recognise God as their Father, to say "Abba, Father" (Rm. 8.15). It is also the work of the Spirit to sanctify the body, which is the temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. 3.[16], 6.[19]). In discussing the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit Paul prefers prophecy, because of its value in edifying the Church (1 Cor. 14.[3ff.]). In the later Epistles the Spirit becomes the bond of unity and the source of common life of the Church, as well as the inspiration of the individual Christian.

With regard to the personality of the Spirit, the references of St. Paul naturally involve for us the conclusion that the Spirit is a person distinct from the Father and the Son. The Spirit is distinguished from God and Christ. The Father sends forth the Spirit into the hearts of men (Rm. 5.[5], 8.[15]). The Spirit bears witness with the spirits of men (1 Cor. 12.[11]) and dwells in them (Rm. 8.[9]). Then in the Apostolic benediction (2 Cor. 13.[14]) the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are placed in co-ordination, as also in the passages 1 Cor. 12.[4-6]; Eph. 4.[4-6]. This co-ordination, along with the work ascribed to the Spirit, seems to imply much more than poetical personification.

Thus in the progress of revelation the Spirit, which was at first the name for the Divine energy, came to be personified, and to hold a larger place, till in the teaching of Jesus and the apostles He is regarded as a distinct personal existence, occupying a place co-ordinate with the Father and the Son, and having a definite work ascribed to Him in the process of saving men. The teaching of Christ and His greatest apostle led in after times to the formulation of the doctrine of the Trinity.

Lit.: OT. Theologies, Davidson, Schultz; NT. Theologies of Stevens, Weiss, Beyschlag; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus; Pfleiderer, Paulinism; Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, &c.; articles in HDB. and smaller Dictionary of the Bible, &c. W. F. Boyd.

SPONGE, a composite animal of the Protozoa class. Beneath the enveloping membrane wh. forms the living basis of the amœbiform animalcules that make it up is a skeleton, wh. is composed, in the case of the S. of commerce, of a mass of interlacing horny fibre. When the fleshy portion is dissolved and removed this fibrous mass has a power of drawing up water into it, a power wh. was recognised in very ancient times and utilised. Pliny (Nat. Hist. ix. 45) mentions three different kinds of S. They are still largely fished in the Levant. During our Lord's crucifixion a sponge was filled with vinegar and placed on a stalk of hyssop and held to His mouth to allay the fevered thirst (Mw. 27.[48]; Jn. 19.[29]).

SPOON. See Incense.

SPRING. See Fountain.

STACHYS, a Roman Christian, saluted by St. Paul (Rm. 16.[9]). An old tradition says that St. Andrew appointed him Bishop of Byzantium, a position which he held for sixteen years.

STACTE (Heb. nāṭāph, from nāṭaph, "to drop") applies to some fragrant gum wh. exudes in drops (Ex. 30.[34]). In Jb. 36.[27], where alone elsewhere the word occurs, it is used of "drops" of water. The gum intended cannot be identified with certainty: it may have been storax, or myrrh.

STAFF. See Rod.

STALL. See Manger.

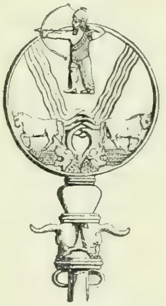
STANDARD (Heb. degel, nēs). When military science advanced so far that the warriors acted in masses, there was a need for some point round wh. to form and rally, hence the invention of standards. These are frequently depicted on the Egyptian monuments, as these show troops arranged in phalanxes, or marching in regiments. They do not occur in the Assyrian bas-reliefs, wh. more generally represent the soldiers acting individually.



Assyrian Standard

Roman Standard

The Romans brought this, as everything else connected with the organisation of armies, to great perfection. It was generally an eagle (aquila) that was the standard of a legion, hence the reference in our Lord's eschatological discourse (Mw. 24.[28]; Lk. 17.[37]), "Wheresoever the carcase is there will the eagles be gathered together." See Banner, Ensign.

STAR (Heb. kōkāb, Gr. astēr). In the article on Astrology and Astronomy we considered how far the stars were grouped together in constellations by the ancient Israelites, and how far the laws that regulated the appearances of these luminaries had been apprehended by them. In connection with Astrology and Astrologers we considered some of the ideas then prevalent as to the effect the heavenly bodies had on the earth, and the fortunes of individual persons. In the present article we shall consider the stars as phenomena. The brilliance of the stars in the nearer East is one of the things that very early strike the visitor. This characteristic is noted in Scripture. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever" (Dn. 12.[3]). The sparkling of the points of light, and the impossibility of marking off areas of the heavens for enumeration, gave a sense of multitude that seems specially to have impressed the Israelite. This is frequently referred to (Gn. 15.[5]; Dt. 1.[10]; Ne. 9.[23], &c.). A very casual inspection of the heavens showed the observer that high as the moon is above the earth the stars are yet higher. A yet more careful observation showed that the sun passed between the earth and the stars, therefore that they were yet higher than the sun. Hence the height of the stars is a point noted (Jb. 22.[12]; Is. 14.[13]; O. [4]). Purity is naturally suggested by the bright light of the stars; so the strictness of God's judgment is shown by the statement, "The stars are not pure in His sight" (Jb. 25.[5]). Of course there are astrological notions, but these are not prominent in Scripture. When it is said that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Jg. 5.[20]), it may merely mean that the stars affected the weather, and that the rain had made the plain of Esdraelon mud, in wh. the chariots, the strength of Sisera's army, sank. This may not be much truer than the astrological interpretation, but at all events it is different. In the NT. the phenomena of meteors seem most to have struck observers. It is one of the signs of the last time that "the stars shall fall from heaven" (Mw. 24.[29]; Mk. 13.[25]); so too in Revelation one of the frequent portents is the fall of a star from heaven (Rv. 6.[13], 8.[10], 9.[1]). In Jude the wicked are described as "wandering stars" (Ju.[13]). The fact that some stars were brighter than others was now striking the Jewish observer, as it had long been patent to Babylonian and Egyptian watchers of the heavens. In both Old and New Testament the relation between the stars and the angels is prominent. When the God of Israel is called "JHWH (Lord) of Hosts" the reference seems to be at once to the "host of the angels" and the "starry host." At creation we are told that "the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy." The same identity we find in the poetical book of the NT., the Apocalypse. In the beginning of it we are told that "the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches" (Rv. 1.[20]). Not only are the holy angels so reckoned but also those that "kept not their first estate"; their fall is described as the "third part of the stars of heaven" being "cast to the earth" by the tail of the great red dragon. Our Lord Himself assumes the title of "the bright and morning star" (Rv. 22.[16]), as the precursor in His first coming of an evergrowing, everlasting day. Not impossibly there was also a reference to Balaam's prophecy of the "Star that shd. come out of Jacob" (Nu. 24.[17]), perhaps also to the star that accompanied His birth.

The Star of the Wise Men.—After the account in Mw. of the birth and genealogy of Jesus we are told of the arrival of Wise Men (Magi) from the East, and of their demand to see the babe that had been born king of the Jews, accompanied by the information that they had "seen His star in the East and had come to worship Him." These Magi certainly were astrologers, but by that fact then also astronomers, so this star cd. be no casual meteor. In astrology certain quarters of the heavens were recognised as being associated with certain nationalities, or even persons. In the quarter of the heaven appropriate to Judæa some phenomenon occurred wh., according to astrology, portended the birth of a monarch whose advent meant much to all the world. What the nature of this phenomenon was has to be considered. We must remember that the word astēr did not necessarily mean a single star, though generally that was the distinction between this word and astron; the evangelist was not describing what he himself had seen, but what had been related to him. Abarbanel had declared that a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the constellation Pisces was specially fateful for the Jewish people, and that such a conjunction had occurred before the birth of Moses; he anticipated the appearance of the Messiah in the latter half of the fifteenth century because of a similar conjunction in 1463. Kepler calculated that this conjunction occurred twice in the year B.C. 7. Dr. Pritchard calculated that it had taken place thrice in that year; on 29th May, the 1st October, and on the 5th December. It shd. be noted that Lewin and Sir Wm. Ramsay on independent data arrive at that year as the date of the Advent. If at the first of these conjunctions a bright nova appeared in the immediate vicinity of the two planets, this wd. give emphasis to the fateful conjunction. They mt. wait till the second conjunction occurred and then start for Judæa. Meantime the nova we have supposed wd. be diminishing. The Magi mt. arrive at Jrs. about the time of the December conjunction; if then the previously diminishing nova flared out afresh, a thing that has happened with these bodies, and if the constellation in wh. it had appeared was to the south at the hour they started for Bethlehem, it mt. quite well seem directly over not only the town of Bethlehem, wh. is all that is required by the words, but even over the individual inn (khān) in wh. the Virgin and her husband had taken shelter. All the phenomena seem on the above hypothesis to be explained. It is not, however, necessary to think of a "new" star; the "conjunction" wd. be sufficient. The "templum" in the skies wh. the Magi had determined referred to the child mt. be all that is meant by the phrase epanō hou ēn to paidion. It does not follow that astrology is true because these astrologers came to a right conclusion. Other remarkable coincidences have occurred. In the year 1577 the astronomer Tycho Brahe, who was also an astrologer, observed a comet fm. wh. he deduced that a child wd. shortly be born in Scandinavia who wd. devastate Germany and disappear in 1632, all wh. was fulfilled in Gustavus Adolphus.

All that the correct prediction of the Magi means is that God met them on their own terms, and used them to emphasise the Incarnation.

In a book recently published (The Magi: How they recognised Christ's Star), Col. Mackinlay maintains that the star was merely the morning star, wh. was then at the beginning of its eight years' cycle. No one who has resided in the East and started on journeys a couple of hours before sunrise but will agree with all he says about the welcome splendour of the morning star. All that must have been ordinary to the Magi; all the cycles of Venus must have been familiar to them. He makes no attempt to show what made the Magi come to the conclusion that this particular cycle of the morning star had any reference to Judæa more than to any other kingdom; so far as is shown, according to Mackinlay's theory, they mt. have been in the habit of appearing in Jrs. every eight years with the demand to be shown the newly-born king of the Jews. It seems to us that Mackinlay has no reason to assume, as he does, that ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ necessarily means that it was a star only seen in the eastern portion of the sky, therefore a planet revolving round the sun, and not, as we think it does, to the place where they made their observation looked at fm. the latitude of Jrs. On this supposition it is difficult to put a reasonable meaning on Mw. 2.[9]; if when they left Jrs. to go to Bethlehem they saw the star to the E., it is difficult to understand how it cd. seem to go before them to Bethlehem, wh. is nearly directly S. of Jrs.

Star Worship was an early form of polytheistic worship, and one to wh. the Israelites seem to have been peculiarly prone. In the book of Dt. they were warned against it (Dt. 4.[19], 17.[3]); it was one of the sins of wh. the ten tribes were guilty, and wh. led to their being sent into captivity (2 K. 17.[16]); also it formed part of the sin of MANASSEH (2 K. 21.[3, 5]). Jeremiah accuses the inhabitants of Jerusalem of "burning incense to all the host of heaven" (Jr. 19.[13]). They probably brought this form of polytheism with them from Babylonia. Amos accuses his brethren of worshipping Kaiwan (Chiun, wh. is Kaiwan with the vowels of Shiqqutz, "abomination") = the planet Saturn, wh. is again identified with SUCCOTH-BENOTH. Nergal, who was worshipped by the men of Cuth, was the planet Mars; Nebo, so frequent a component of Babylonian names, is the planet Mercury; and Ishtar, who is probably indicated by the title "Queen of Heaven" (Jr. 44.[17]), is the planet Venus. At the same time it seems almost certain that the deities were originally local, and that the identification with certain heavenly bodies was an after development.

STATER, the word used in AVm. and RVm. to represent the coin Peter took fm. the fish's mouth to pay the Temple dues for himself and his Master (Mw. 17.[27]). It really was originally a weight, but of somewhat varying amount. The coin was first issued in gold of the weight of 133 grains, slightly heavier than our sovereign. Prof. Ridgeway has shown that it was regarded as the value of an ox at the date of its issue. The most common coin called S. was the silver S., wh. was reckoned as equal to a SHEKEL: this was clearly the case in regard to the coin in the fish's mouth. The common shekel was nearly half as heavy again as the gold S., being 194 grains; thus, in weight of metal, between our florin and half-crown; its value consequently wd. be about 2s. 3d., or 55 cents. The "shekel of the Sanctuary" (Ex. 30.[13]) was considerably heavier, about 224 grains, making the value slightly more than half-a-crown or about 64 cents. This was in all probability the coin in wh. the Temple dues were paid. It was equivalent to the didrachm of Antioch or of Tyre. See MONEY.

STEALING. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

STEEL (Heb. nĕḥûshāh, nĕḥōsheth). The Heb. word wh. S. represents is always translated "brass" except in four instances: nĕḥûshāh in 2 S. 22.[35]; Ps. 18.[34]; Jb. 20.[24]; and nĕḥōsheth in Jr. 15.[12]. It is difficult to think of bronze by any process of annealing being made so elastic that "bows" cd. be made of it; but this wd. seem to have been the case. If what we mean by "steel"—i.e. iron combined with a small portion of carbon—was known at all to the Jews, it is indicated by the term barzel mitz-tzāphōn, "northern iron" (Jr. 15.[12]). See METAL.

STEPHANAS, a Corinthian believer who, with his household, was baptized by St. Paul himself (1 Cor. 1.[16]), and described by the apostle as "the first-fruits of Achaia" (16.[15]). His coming to Ephesus was a cause of gladness to St. Paul. He was present when the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians was written (v. 17).

STEPHEN stands out in the early annals of the Church as the first Christian martyr. Probably of Hellenistic origin himself, he was one of the seven chosen to relieve the apostles, by undertaking the work of distributing alms among the Hellenistic widows (Ac. 6.[1ff.]). This duty doubtless suggested the name of "deacon," wh. is often applied to him and to his colleagues. He was the most distinguished of the group, and did not confine himself to the service mentioned. He is described as "full of faith and of the Holy Spirit" (v. 5), "full of grace and power" (v. 8). He wrought signs and wonders among the people, and did the work of an evangelist among the Hellenists, the Jews from the provinces who were in Jerusalem. In the disputations wh. ensued, his skill and ability received signal illustration; but his opponents, although worsted in argument, were not persuaded. Probably wounded pride had something to do with the conspiracy they formed against him. If they could not vanquish him in debate, they might at least silence him. The heart of their charge against him was, that according to his teaching, Jesus of Nazareth would destroy the Temple, and change the customs delivered by Moses (v. 14). Unperturbed he appeared before the council, his calm, strong face suggesting that of an angel, and presented his defence in the form of a review of the history of revelation. In his review, as was natural if he were of Hellenist extraction, he uses the LXX. His narrative in many points does not coincide with that of the OT. This may be due in part to the freedom of a spoken utterance, and in part to sources of information wh. are now lost. His interpretation of the history is consistent with perfect reverence and respect for Mosaic law, and for the Temple. He makes it clear, however, that God never intended men to think that He was confined to any sacred building (7.$^{48f.}$; cp. 1 K. 8.^{27}; Is. 66.$^{1f.}$). Some movement among his hearers at this point may have interrupted the development of his theme, and the record closes with the stern rebuke of vv. 51–53. In their wrath they "gnashed on him with their teeth." In no doubt as to the fate in store for him, S. "looked up stedfastly into heaven," and declared the vision vouchsafed him of the Son of Man. This provoked an outburst of fury, wh. wreaked itself in stoning him to death.

This was the signal for the breaking out of the first persecution endured by the Christian Church, wh. resulted in scattering the preachers of the Gospel far fm. Jrs. It is hardly open to doubt that the impression made on the young man Saul (v. 58) by Stephen's heroic bearing had some influence in preparing the way for his conversion. And in the doctrine of the great apostle of the Gentiles there is a significant resemblance to that for the teaching of wh. he "consented" to the execution of Stephen.

STEWARD. This word does not, in the OT., represent any single Heb. term, but rather is the tr. of two periphrases. The earliest of these, ben mesheq bethi, lit. "son of the possession of my house" (Gn. 15.^{2}), is the description wh. Abraham gives to Eliezer of Damascus. The suggestion of the phrase is that he was regarded as his master's heir. Probably there was a customary law that when the sheikh was, like Abraham, childless, then one born in the tribe or bought into it who had gained the confidence of the sheikh was his acknowledged successor: much as, in modern commerce, the business manager wd., in similar circumstances, have the first offer of the business, on the demise of the head. The next phrase, hā-'īsh 'asher 'al baith, "the man who is over the house" (Gn. 43.^{19}), is used in regard to Joseph's major-domo; he is distinctly merely an upper servant. In the case of Arza, who is called "steward of (Elah's) house in Tirzah," he is clearly higher than an ordinary servant, as he has a house of his own in wh. he can entertain the king. The Gr. words are two, epitropos and oikonomos. The former of these is used in respect to Chusa, the husband of JOANNA (Lk. 8.^{3}), and of the overseer of a vineyard (Mw. 20.^{8}). The other is much commoner. It is used with derivative verb and noun in the parable of the "Unjust Steward" (Lk. 16.$^{1-8}$), who seems to occupy the place of "factor." The usage in the epistles is not different (1 Cor. 4.$^{1, 2}$; Tt. 1.^{7}; 1 P. 4.^{10}).

STOCKS. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

STOICS, one of the two sects of philosophers wh. PAUL encountered at Athens (Ac. 17.^{18}). They descended fm. Socrates through the Cynics, their founder, Zeno, having begun his study of philosophy under Crates the Cynic. One peculiarity of this school is that the members of it were to so large an extent drawn fm. the East. Zeno, the founder, was born in Cyprus; Chrysippus, its second founder, was born in Tarsus, as were others of the earlier lights of Stoicism. Before the time of Paul the centre of Stoicism had moved to the West, and the most important Stoics were to be found in Rome. While still lectures were continued in the Stoa Poecilē, fm. wh. the school had got its name, the men that gave Stoicism its influence were in Rome, and had been for more than a century; Cato of Utica was a Stoic, and now Seneca, one of those who had most influence in the imperial circles, was a Stoic also. The general characteristic of Stoic views was great moral earnestness, and addiction to practical rather than speculative activity; and this was a portion of its attraction for the Romans. There were several points in wh. Stoicism formed a preparation for Christianity. One thing that Stoicism made prominent, wh. Christianity also assumed, was the supreme importance of man as man, consequently of character as over against birth or wealth. The most famous teacher of this school in the times immediately succeeding that of Paul was Epictetus, a slave, afterwards manumitted. Closely connected with this was their doctrine of the essential unity of the human race, through a common relationship to God. The Stoic view of God, if one disregards the materialistic shell in wh. their views were conveyed, had much in common with the Christian; God—or, to give the Hellenic name, Zeus—was not outside the universe, but pervaded it; His providence guided it. The idea of Virtue living in harmony with this God-guided universe is not very different fm. doing right by doing what is in accordance with the law written in the heart. Not an altogether unimportant fact is a singular similarity in nomenclature, though without any real identity of meaning. When our Lord said to the woman of Samaria, "God is a Spirit," these words as recorded in Greek by John wd. be accepted as true by the Stoics; they too said "God was pneuma (spirit)," but with them "spirit" meant the primeval fire, sometimes an atmospheric current. They maintained that this pneuma was the reason (logos) of the universe—a statement in perfect harmony with the teaching of the prologue of the fourth Gospel, even to the very words. At first sight Stoicism is an absolute fatalism: heimarmenē, "fate," fixes everything, arranges everything in a course fm. wh. it cannot stray. Yet with that strange apparent self-contradiction wh. is to be found in all the creeds that are accused of fatalism, Stoicism called for the loftiest moral activity, and had the strictest views of individual responsibility. Stoicism was a Pantheism, but so is Christianity, a fact we sometimes forget. Like the Christian, the Stoic affirmed that in God we "live and move"; but, also like the Christian, he asserted the Fatherhood of God to men as proved by the quotation made by Paul fm. Cleanthes and Aratus (Ac. 17.[28]). The resemblance in teaching produced resemblance in conduct—so much so that Marcus Aurelius feels it necessary to differentiate between them, and declare that while the endurance of the S. proceeds fm. wisdom, that of the Christian is the result of obstinacy. Both systems posited an ideal man; Christianity had, however, the advantage that the ideal had become actual in Jesus Christ. Both systems declared that the present frame of things shd. be burnt up. Stoicism also posited total depravity; the excellent were few—Socrates, Antisthenes, Cato of Utica. And the change fm. the state of folly to that of wisdom was not expected to be gradual, but had many features in common with that of Christian conversion. One can scarcely fail to note the prevailing Stoical character of St. Paul's speech on Areopagus, and correlate this with the fact that so many of the leading Stoics were natives of Cilicia, the province in which Paul himself had been born; and that one of the two Stoic poets he quotes was Aratus, like himself a Tarsian. The leading point of contrast between the two as moral systems, irrespective of doctrine, was in the disposition wh. each induced; while Christianity demanded love to all, especially to the brotherhood, and personal humility, Stoicism expected pride in the "Wise Man," who was the superior of the gods, freedom fm. all emotion, love as well as hate. These resemblances do not indicate that Christianity borrowed fm. Stoicism, but that both had Asiatic elements in them. The resemblance between Stoicism and the teaching of Ecclesiastes is more apparent than real. The Pharisees had not a few points of identity with the Stoics, but these did not enter into the essence of either system. Josephus' identification of the views of the Jewish sect with those of the followers of Zeno is due to his effort to make Judaism intelligible to his Greek and Roman readers.

STOMACHER. The Heb. word so trd. in EV. denotes some article of female dress (Is. 3.[24]): the meaning is, however, entirely lost.

STONES, PRECIOUS STONES. The common Heb. term is 'eben; the equally common Gr. is lithos. A stone is a piece of rock separated and capable of being moved about. The most prominent use of stones is for building. As in Palestine the great mass of rock is limestone, it has supplied the building material at all times. The intrusive basalt that is not uncommon is sometimes used. In some structures of the Mohammadan period the black stone and the white appear alternately to produce a pattern. As, however, the basalt is more difficult to work, it is used much seldomer. There is also sandstone, but, being largely impregnated with lime, it is not a comfortable stone to work. The limestone is of varying degrees of hardness, and so suitable for different purposes. From the want of wheeled vehicles the building stones are quarried in small sizes, so that a donkey can carry four of them as a load. It is to be presumed that similar conditions have at all periods largely prevailed, except during the times of the Romans. Hence such huge stones as are in the foundation of the Temple cd. only be moved into place at great expenditure of time and labour; there was reason in calling such stones yĕqārōth (1 K. 5.[17]), "precious" (Is. 28.[16]). Stones were also used as missile weapons; primarily slings were used to discharge S. ('abānīm). Water-worn stones seem to have been used for this purpose, as presenting fewer inequalities to divert the flight (1 S. 17.[40]; Jg. 20.[16]); larger stones were used for such engines of war as those introduced by Uzziah (2 Ch. 26.[15]), as ballistæ, or catapults. These engines were greatly improved and multiplied by the Greeks and Romans, who made both assault and defence of fortresses more scientific. It is probable that the S. for these military engines wd. be roughly rounded to avoid the deflecting effect of the resistance of the air. There was, further, among the Jews, the use of S. as the means of execution. The criminal was taken to the brow of a hill where there was a precipice; he was cast down thence, and large stones thrown down upon him fm. the height. From the nature of the prevailing rock, loose stones of all shapes and sizes abound, except in the rich plains (see Crimes and Penalties). S. had also more domestic uses as Millstones; these were ordinarily made of basalt. As hand mills were mostly used, the S. cut into shape for this purpose were not large. In NT. there is reference to a larger form of millstone, wh. was in a mill turned by an ass, mulos onikos (Mw. 18.[6]; Mk. 9.[42]; Lk. 17.[2]); to this our Lord referred as being bound to the neck of one cast into the sea as a punishment. Stones were, and are still, used to cover wells and cisterns, wh. may easily be polluted by anything falling into them; and also, as water is a precious commodity, to prevent any one without right taking it. These were usually shaped to fit the circular aperture (Gn. 29.[2]); many of these wells were in the field, away fm. the immediate dwellings of their owners. Probably also pits were used as secret granaries (Jr. 41.[8]); these wd. be protected and hidden by S.

Another Gr. word is trd. S. in Rv. 2.[17], "I will give him a white 'stone' (psēphos), and on the 'stone' a new name written wh. no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." This Gr. word is used for the voting pebble, as Ac. 26.[10], "I gave my voice against them"; and the verb derived fm. it for reckoning (Lk. 14.[28]; Rv. 13.[18]). The interpretation of the "white stone" has occupied commentators a great deal. Some have thought it referred to the "tessera" or token thrown by the emperors to the populace at the games, entitling the person that received it to provisions, garments, &c.; these had, however, nothing mystic or secret about them: further, there is no point in the fact that it is a white stone that is used. Others have thought it referred to the lot, but there is no suggestion of "casting the lot" in the passage; and the "new name," unknown to every one save to him whose it was, is utterly unsuited to the circumstances contemplated in the text. Another theory is more suitable: that the "white stone" was a tessera hospitalis (Gr. sumbolon), wh. entitled him that received it to help and entertainment. One thing in favour of this is, that the tallies had an inscription on them; they were broken through the inscription, and each of the contracting families took a piece; on the tally being presented its genuineness was proved by this, that the inscription wd. now be read. The main objection to this is, that there is no word of the stone being broken. We wd. adventure another explanation. The victor is to be given "to eat of the hidden manna," as well as to receive the "white stone." Where was the manna hidden? According to He. 9.[4], "the golden pot that had manna" was in the Ark; in Ex. 16.[34] the manna was said to be put "before the testimony." If the narrative tells the event in its chronological setting, then the Ark was not yet made; it might afterwards have been put in the Ark. Beside the manna in the Ark were the tables of the law; and the first words inscribed on the tables of the law were, "I am the Lord (JHWH)," the new covenant name of God to Israel. The principal objection to this is that psēphos suggests a smaller stone than we think of when we speak of the "tables of the law"; yet this white stone had writing on it, and there is no definite size attributed to psēphos. At all events the white stone must have written on it the covenant name of God—the covenant with the individual who claims to have overcome. And God's name to him has as its reciprocal his name to God.

Voting Tablets

Individual stones were regarded as landmarks, as "the stone of Bohan, the son of Reuben" (Jo. 15.[6], 18.[17]): there is no record of what this Reubenite did to be so immortalised. There is the scene of Joab's murder of Amasa, "the great stone wh. is in Gibeon" (2 S. 20.[8]); there also is "the great stone" of Bethshemesh (1 S. 6.[18]), where, possibly by blunder of hearing, 'eben, "stone," has been changed into 'Abel, and regarded as a proper name —the LXX has lithou. These probably were not stones wh. had been set up, but rather were blocks or boulders, results of geologic processes in the past, borne, it mt. be, far fm. the place of their origin.

"The stone Ezel" in 1 S. 20.[19] MT., and hence in EV., is a doubtful case; in the first place, in v. 41, where we shd. expect the same word, we find negeb, "south." The VV. are at variance with MT. and also with each other; Tg. Jn. has "the S. atha" in both cases; the LXX has argab, also in both cases; the Psh. has kepha, "stone"; only the Vlg. follows MT. If the LXX reading is accepted the genesis of MT. is easily explicable: argab wd. seem to mean "cairn."

There is another class of S. wh. has to be considered, those that have been set up in commemoration of some event; as, e.g., Samuel set up Ebenezer, "the stone of help," to commemorate his victory over the Philistines (1 S. 7.[12]). Jacob at Bethel set up the S. wh. had been his pillow, to be a pillar, and said it "shall be God's house," and poured oil upon it; this was not only commemoration but consecration. At first it wd. seem as if this were parallel with the ideas of fetish-worshippers; they think that a spirit inhabits their "fetish"; the contrast is that it is always an inferior spirit that is thought of; the Great God whom they all acknowledge never occupies this position. It is the Great God with whom Jacob makes his covenant. The S. at Bethel, and similar much earlier erections, may be regarded as the germ fm. wh. both the temple and the altar, if not also the idols of later times, sprang. There are not a few solitary stones to be found on the E. of Jordan, usually called by the Celtic name of menhir, "long stone" (see illustration, Benzinger, HA. 57), wh. probably had an origin similar to the stone of Bethel.* The process of the evolution of the temple may be seen carried a step further in the dolmens, "table stones," common in Brittany, and not uncommon in the United Kingdom; they consist of two or three short, upright stones with a large flat one on the top of them.

* There may be a reference to this in Jacob's Blessing (Gn. 49.[24]), in wh. God is called "the S. of Isr."

They are frequent E. of Jordan. Another set of monuments are the cromlechs, "crooked stones," "stones arranged in a circle" (in Britain formerly "dolmens" were called "cromlechs"). Stonehenge may be regarded as an evolution of the cromlech. These often had a central "menhir" or "dolmen," wh. served as an altar. Sometimes human bones have been found under these "dolmens," likely those of victims. The upright stones in Gezer seem to represent a still later development; they seem to have had no directly sacred significance, they merely ornamented the high place at Gezer; these served the same decorative purpose that the obelisks did in an Egyptian temple. The "menhir," somewhat modified, became the matztzēbāh, perhaps in form indicated by Benzinger (H.A. 380), wh. is derived fm. Phœnician sources. Roughly it may be said to be a square column with a cubical base, and a small pyramidal form, with base larger than the top of the column, as capital. There were probably variations on this. Not impossibly the altars on the Bamoth wd. follow to some extent the form of the "dolmens"; probably later modifications wd. be introduced as taste advanced. Possibly some wd. be regular "cromlechs," wh. again mt. be modified, as we find in GEZER, to an approximation to the arrangements of a temple.

Precious Stones.—Jewels have always been specially prized in the E.; partly because through so large a portion of its history government has been so inefficient, when it was not directly hurtful, that there was no security for property. Hence it was desirable to have wealth in as portable a form as possible; the small size and great value of gems made them the most useful representatives of value. Moreover, beauty of colour has always had a special attraction for the sensuous Oriental. As we have considered all the precious stones occurring in Scripture under their respective names, we shall occupy our space here with more general considerations. The first thing that meets the student is the dubiety that surrounds the whole subject. It is very uncertain whether any of the stones mentioned, at all events in the OT., as precious can be identified. Sometimes the name may be carried down with little change, as is the case with the sapphire and emerald, yet evidently not applied to the same gems. With the NT. the student has the advantage of Pliny's contemporary and elaborate, if often vague and confused, descriptions of the gems then popular; and Theophrastus, who, if three centuries earlier than the writers of the NT., yet wrote in the same language. In regard to the OT. we have the LXX, wh. shows the opinion of Jews of the third and fourth cents. B.C. of the Gr. equivalents of the Heb. terms. In Arabic the Heb. name may at times be preserved, but we have no certainty that the same precious stone is meant. Further, by the Egyptian explorations we are able to decide to some extent what gems were known to the Egyptians who were contemporaries of the Biblical writers. Not of so much value, though not quite valueless, are the opinions of the Talmudic rabbis. Yet withal, our information is still very indefinite. There are three related groups of gems: two in the OT., the gems in the High Priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.[17-20]), and those on the robe of the king of Tyre (Ek. 28.[13]); and one in the NT., the foundations of the New Jerusalem. The list in Ezekiel in MT. has only nine gems, but in the LXX there are twelve; it wd. appear as if a row of gems had dropped out fm. the MT. list. With regard to the High Priest's breastplate we have the list of the gems as given in Josephus to compare with that in the LXX; yet there are some differences, e.g. "sardonyx" is put instead of "sardius," and the order of the gems is changed in the second, third, and fourth rows, in wh. the second and third members are transposed. As it is doubtful whether the breastplate came back fm. Babylon, we cannot affirm that Josephus was in a better position than ourselves to describe those gems; his list seems to be derived fm. that of the LXX. The fact that the names of the tribes were engraved on the gems excludes the diamond and the varieties of corundum, the emerald and sapphire, wh. are too hard to have been engraved by the means then available. Dr. Petrie (HDB.) has suggested that the stones in the breastplate were arranged according to harmony of colours, wh. is probable, but not so certain that one may decide anything on the ground of that alone. We have not even that guide to aid us in regard to the foundations of the New Jrs., or the robe of the king of Tyre. There are other two gems mentioned besides those in these lists: kadkod (Is. 54.[12]; Ek. 27.[16]; AV. "agate," RV. "rubies"), wh. some have identified with the "ruby" on rather insufficient evidence; it seems extremely doubtful if the ruby had reached Syria till after the conquests of Alexander. Another rendered "ruby" is pĕnīnīm; it is probable that this may mean "coral." Gems are used as symbols of preciousness (Jb. 28.[16-19]; Pr. 3.[15]) and of beauty (La. 4.[7]). Many have seen or imagined a significance in the several jewels, but this has no basis save in fancy. Magical properties also were attributed to certain stones, but we have no evidence that the Biblical writers made any use of or reference to this.

STONING. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

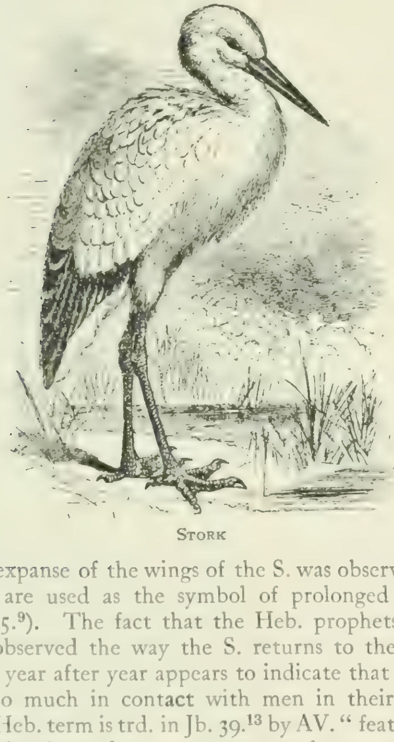
STORK (Heb. ḥăsīdāh), a bird common in Middle and Southern Europe and Asia, though only a visitor in the British Isles and France. In Palestine there are two species comparatively common. There is the white S., Ciconia alba, wh. is the species best known in Holland and Germany. It usually nests on the top of high buildings in Europe, apparently claiming the protection of man. In Palestine it frequents ruins and rocks; occasionally it builds on trees. Probably this was its general nesting-place till tall trees became rare in Palestine. It usually goes in pairs. The black S., Ciconia nigra, is as common, but, as it is a much shyer bird, is less in evidence; it feeds in flocks, but away fm. human habitations. The meaning of its Heb. name, "pious," seems to indicate that the S.'s fidelity to its mate and its kindness for its young were the qualities most observed. It was declared by the law to be unclean (Lv. 11.[19]; Dt. 14.[18]); it is noted as building its nest in fir trees (Ps. 104.[17]); its migratory habits had been observed: "The stork in heaven knoweth her appointed seasons" (Jr. 8.[7]).



STORK

The expanse of the wings of the S. was observed, so they are used as the symbol of prolonged flight (Zc. 5.[9]). The fact that the Heb. prophets have not observed the way the S. returns to the same place year after year appears to indicate that it was not so much in contact with men in their days. The Heb. term is trd. in Jb. 39.[13] by AV. "feathers," for wh. there does not seem much reason, and RV. "kindly," wh. is more probable. A singular phenomenon is presented by the LXX; the Heb. is never trd. by pelargōs, the ordinary word for S.; sometimes they transliterate asida, as if they did not know the Gr. equivalent; they once render herodios "heron," and once epops "hoopoe," yet the stork is common in Egypt.

STRANGER. While in the pre-exilic history of Isr. (see FOREIGNER) the number of resident aliens was very considerable, some even having a special relation to the worship, e.g. Obed-edom the Gittite (2 S. 6.[10]), in the time of Ezra a stricter view was adopted. When the Jews were no longer a free nation living in their own territory, but merely a race, with a peculiar religion, scattered among towns and villages inhabited by men of kindred descent but different faith, the tendency was that the Jews shd. fall to the level of their heathen surroundings. Later, when in the Greek and Roman empires the sentiment of nationality became less potent, and the purity of Judaism as a religion was recognised, the entrance of PROSELYTES did much to break down Jewish exclusiveness. Among the Greeks, where the performance of certain sacred rites made the restriction of citizenship as absolute as among the Jews, the same influences broke down the barriers under the Roman rule. Still, even in St. Paul's times, the distinction between a citizen and a "sojourner" (metoikos, paroikos) was a recognised one (Eph. 2.[19]). See PROSELYTE.

STRAW. In our sense of the word S. is seldom seen in the East. The Heb. teben corresponds with the Arb. tibn. This consists of the corn-stalks, crushed and broken in the process of treading out, or threshing, mingled with the chaff, from wh. by winnowing the grain has been separated. Tibn is part of the provision laid in for winter provender. It is given to the horses mixed with barley; and is the staple food of some of the humbler animals when herbage is exhausted. It is mixed with mortar, and with clay in the making of bricks, wh. are dried in the sun. These are the uses to wh. "straw" was put in Bible times (Gn. 24.[25]; Ex. 5.[7], &c.).

STREET. In Oriental cities one has often felt that while the houses may be built with some regard to security and comfort, the streets have simply "happened." They are narrow and tortuous, forming a maze wh. even natives at times find it difficult to thread. In a walled city like Jrs. space was an important consideration. There the streets frequently run under archways, on the top of wh. houses are built. Close building also furnished some protection from the sun. Windows of dwelling-houses never open on the streets, but casements often project from an upper storey. Sanitation makes slow progress, and refuse in great quantities still finds its way into the streets, where the dogs are the principal scavengers. Pavement is now seen in some of the main thoroughfares; but it is not safe to venture forth without a light after nightfall in most quarters. The practice of paving may have been introduced by the Greeks. Herod the Gt. laid a street in Antioch with "polished stones" (Ant. XVI. v. 3). The great cities of the Greek and Roman period were divided by two main streets, cutting each other in the heart of the city at right angles. The excellent pavement of these streets may be seen still among the ruins. Of the colonnade wh. lent such stateliness to the street, dividing the roadway from the path for foot passengers on either side, the best illustration is found in the ruined remains of Jerash. See illustrations, p. 130.

The Heb. word ḥūtz is lit. " that wh. is without," i.e. outside the house; and so is applied to street (La. 2.[19], &c.). Rĕḥōb is prop. a broad space, such as was found at the gates, or an open square in the city. In these beasts of burden are unloaded, travellers often spend the night, and there the children play (Gn. 19.[2]; Zc. 8.[5], &c.). The Greek plateia answers in meaning to rĕḥōb, but is used in NT. interchangeably with rhumē for " street " (Mw. 6.[5]; Ac. 9.[11], &c.).

Goods are exposed for sale on the sides of the streets. Men following a particular trade tend to gather in one street (e.g. " Baker St.," Jr. 37.[21]; cp. BJ. V. viii. 1). This is seen in such cities as Cairo and Damascus, where certain streets are devoted purely to business. These " bazaars," as they are called, of the silversmiths, the silk merchants, &c., are closed at sunset, and strictly guarded.

Street in Damascus

STRIPES. See Crimes and Penalties.

STRONG DRINK. See Wine.

STUBBLE. (1) Qash. The grain is often reaped with the hook, the ears being cut off, and large part of the stalks left standing. These are denoted by qash. This the children of Isr. had to gather and chop for brick-making (Ex. 5.[12]); see Straw. In the hot sun it swiftly becomes tinder-dry, and if set on fire, burns fiercely (Ex. 15.[7], &c.). (2) Teben (Jb. 21.[18]). This is the mod. tibn; see Straw. The Gr. kalamē corresponds to qash (1 Cor. 3.[12]).

SUAH, an Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Ch. 7.[36]).

SUBURB. The usual Heb. word so trd. in EV. is properly " pasture land," migrāsh, from gārash, to drive out. It is used to describe the land surrounding the cities given to the Levites (Nu. 35.[2], &c.). In 1 Ch. 5.[16] we should clearly read with RVm. " pasture lands of Sharon."

For the word used in 2 K. 23.[11], see Parbar.

SUCCOTH (" booths "). (1) A city in the territory of Gad, E. of the Jordan (Jo. 13.[27]). After leaving Penuel on his way to Shechem, Jacob came to S., the name being given to the place because of the " booths " he made there for his cattle (Gn. 33.[17]). Gideon, pursuing Zebah and Zalmunna, crossed the Jordan (Jg. 8.[4]), and came to S. (v. 5), before Penuel (v. 8). It must therefore be sought E. of the river, in the Jordan valley, no great distance fm. the Jabbok. Jerome (on Gn. 33.[17]) places S. beyond Jordan, in the district of Scythopolis. This suggests that it was N. of the Jabbok. Neubauer (Geog. du Tlm. 248) gives the Talmudic name as tar'alā. This name Merrill would find in Deir 'Allā, a mound which lies c. a mile N. of the Jabbok. In this he is followed by other scholars. Driver (Genesis, 301f.) would place Mahanaim " (say) at Deir 'Allā, four miles N. of the ford by wh. the Ghōr route crosses the Jabbok; Penuel near where the Ghōr route crosses the route fm. es-Salṭ to ed-Dāmiyeh; and Succoth on one of the lower terraces of the Jordan valley, W. of the point just suggested for Penuel." (2) The first station of the children of Isr. after leaving Egp. (Ex. 12.[37], &c.). The name may be the Heb. form (with substitution of s for th) of the Egyptian Thuke, the district of Pithom. Here for the first time the people dwelt in " booths," and it is just possible this may account for the name. (3) The Succoth near wh. the brass castings were made (1 K. 7.[46], &c.) prob. = (1).

SUCCOTH-BENOTH, one of the deities introduced by the men of Babylon who settled in Samaria (2 K. 17.[30]). Benoth may be a form of Banītu (Zer-banitu of the inscriptions), the wife of Marduk, the city-god of Babylon. S. may mean the " processional shrines " in wh. the images were carried (Sayce, HDB. s.v.).

SUKKIIM. A nation forming part of Shishak's army when he marched against Judah (2 Ch. 12.[3]). Identification with the inhabitants of Suakin has been suggested; but no certainty is possible.

SUMMER. See Winter.

SUN (Heb. shemesh: this word is found in most Semitic languages with but slight variations; Aram. shimsha, Asyr. shamshu, Arb. shems). In a comparatively cloudless climate like that of SW. Asia the brilliance of the S. is specially prominent; its influence, benign or maleficent, was always before the inhabitants. Artificial light was so inefficient that the working day was bounded by sunrise and sunset (Ps. 104.[22]); hence the emphasis of the phrase, " the greater light to rule the day." The portions of the day were reckoned as they still are, by the position of the S. in the heavens; sunrise, noon, and sunset are the divisions of the Oriental's day. Even to nations as little astronomical as the Hebrews the connection of the succession of the seasons with the progress of the S. through the constellations of the Zodiac was known. Although in the countries like those inhabited by the writers of Scripture the difference in the length of day may not be so observable as in more northern lands, yet the fact that the sun rose and set further to the north in Summer than in Winter cd. not fail to be noted. Further, not only time but space was measured by the sun; E. was sunrise, mizrāḥ (Jo. 4.[19]); W. was sunset, ma'arāb (Is. 45.[6]). In taking the directions, a man is supposed to look to the rising S., therefore south was to his right hand (1 S. 23.[19]), north to his left (Gn. 14.[15]). In these circumstances it was not wonderful that the sun was early an object of worship. In Babylonia and Assyria, fm. wh. the Israelites originally came, the S. was worshipped under the name Shamash. Probably many of the local deities assigned a place in the mythological genealogy were sun-gods, but names and attributes were changed for harmonistic reasons. It is to be observed that the S. was not identified with the deity, but was regarded as his sign, as may be seen in an illustration in Hommel's Gesch. Bab.-Assyr., plate opposite p. 596; in it worshippers are represented coming before the enthroned god, while a figure on the canopy under wh. the god is seated lets down with cords the sun's disc. In Egypt, where Isr. dwelt for four centuries, the worship of the sun was also prominent. Ra was the S. generally, or more particularly the S. at noon. Chepera was the rising S., and Tum the setting; while Aten was the solar disc. The worship of the S. was clearly practised among the Phœnicians also, although our information concerning them is somewhat scant; they were the immediate neighbours of Israel. With these surroundings it is not surprising that Isr., when they sank fm. the spiritual worship of JHWH, betook themselves frequently to the worship of the sun. The name of Beth-Shemesh indicated that as a place consecrated to the solar worship, probably fm. Canaanite times. Job refers to sun-worship as one into wh. a person mt. easily fall away (Jb. 31.[26]). Towards the end of the kingdom of Judah, JOSIAH, we are told, " put down the priests . . . that burned incense to the S." (2 K. 23.[5]); further, that he took away " the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the S. . . . and burned the chariots of the S. with fire " (v. 11). Among the abominations wh. were shown to Ezekiel in vision was the sight of " five and twenty men . . . who worshipped the S. toward the E." (Ek. 8.[16]). The religious view of the S. wh. the Jews as worshippers of JHWH took, was widely different. Their God had created the S.; commanded it and it rose not (Jb. 9.[7]); marked the race it was to run, and prepared a tabernacle for it in the E. whence it goes forth, and in the W. to wh. it returns at night (Ps. 19.[4]). God can make it return to confirm the faith of Hezekiah (Is. 38.[8]). More even, a saint like Joshua may command the S. not to set (Jo. 10.[12, 13]). The saints of JHWH are guarded that " the S. shall not smite them by day." It is the symbol of God (Ps. 84.[11]), of permanence (72.[17]), of beauty (SS. 6.[10]). In NT. the scorching effect of the S. is most prominent (Mw. 13.[6]; Js. 1.[11]; Rv. 16.[8]). Part of the bliss of the New Jrs. will be that there will be no need of the sun (Rv. 21.[23]).

SUPH, AV. RED SEA. A place in the Arabah is described as " over against Suph " (Dt. 1.[1]). Yam Ṣuph is the usual name of the Red Sea. The word for " sea " has probably fallen out of the text. AV. may be right in restoring it. The Gulf of 'Aqaba, in that case, is intended.

SUPHAH (RV.), a place not identified, east of the Jordan (Nu. 21.[14]).

SUPPER. See FOOD.

SUSA. See SHUSHAN.

SUSI, father of Gaddi, who represented the tribe of Manasseh among the spies (Nu. 13.[11]).

SWADDLING BANDS (Jb. 38.[9]; Lk. 2.[7]). These consist of the cloth in wh. fm. time immemorial in the East it has been the practice to wrap up the body of a new-born child, and the bandages by which it is secured. This method greatly facilitates the handling and carrying of the child, and obviates the danger of cold through accidental exposure. It is continued for at least a year, when the little one makes its first attempts at walking. This may account for the uniform straightness of Eastern limbs, and the erect carriage of the person. The salt applied to the skin in swaddling, is to prevent chafing (Ek. 16.[4]). Swaddling is an evidence that the child is well cared for (La. 2.[22]).

SWALLOW (Heb. dĕrōr, Ps. 84.[3]; Pr. 26.[2]; there are two other words, 'āgūr and sīs (sūs), one of wh. is trd. CRANE and the other S., but the AV. and the RV. differ as to wh. is wh.). As to the first of the words there seems a certainty that it means our S., and probably also the " swifts " and " martins," wh. resemble so much the S. in flight. In the two places where it occurs (Ps. 84.[3] and Pr. 26.[2]), the peculiarities noted—nesting where human beings congregate, and rapidity of flight—are characteristic of the S. Sometimes in Palestine they are allowed to build within the house, where the continually open doors and windows afford them abundant means of entrance and exit. While the etymology, from dārar, " to fly in circles," suits, the VV. are all against translating " turtle dove " in Ps. 84.[3 (4)]: in Pr. 26.[2] Psh. and Tg. tr. " winged animal," " bird "; the LXX and Vlg. tr. " sparrow." Guthe decides in favour of dĕrōr being " the bat," without assigning any reason. In the two passages in wh. the other two words are found (Is. 38.[14] and Jr. 8.[7]), the LXX and the Vlg. render with RV. sīs (sūs) " swallow," and 'āgūr is omitted; in the Tg. and Psh. 'āgūr is treated as an adj. to sīs. The characteristics ascribed to sūs suit the swallow. There are two species of swallow in Palestine, besides several varieties of swift and martin.

SWAN (Heb. tinshemeth), a bird classified as unclean in Lv. 11.[18]; Dt. 14.[16]; AV. trs. "swan," but RV. renders "horned owl"; this latter rendering has the advantage that it is in harmony with the birds immediately preceding, "the little owl and the great owl." The S. is almost impossible, for it is rarely seen either in Egypt or Palestine; moreover, it has none of the characteristics wh. are to be found in other birds declared unclean. The "ibis" and the "purple water-hen" have both been suggested, with considerable probability: both are common, and devour frogs and other unclean animals. The authority of the Tg. of Onkelos is in favour of RV.

SWEARING. See OATH.

SWEET CALAMUS, SWEET CANE (Ex. 30.[23]; Jr. 6.[20]). This has not been identified. Jeremiah describes it as "from a far country." The fragrant reed or wood was therefore not indigenous in Pal.

SWINE (Heb. ḥazīr, Arb. khinzīr, Gr. NT. χοῖρος, ὗς: in the LXX the latter alone is used, wh. only appears in NT. in a quotation—2 P. 2.[22]). The S. was declared to be unclean (Lv. 11.[7]; Dt. 14.[8]). The S. seems to have been viewed with special horror; to Isaiah to "eat swine's flesh" was the most abominable wickedness (65.[4]): the most impure of conceivable offerings was that of "swine's blood." Yet it must have been pretty familiar, else such a proverb as Pr. 11.[22] wd. never have been thought of. In the LXX the horror of the fate that befell Naboth is enhanced by the introduction of swine as, with the dogs, drinking his blood. With the influence of the Greeks the use of swine's flesh appears to have spread; this became more marked under the Romans, among whom pork was a favourite article of diet. Epiphanes, recognising the horror with wh. the Jews regarded swine's flesh, when he endeavoured to make them abjure their faith, strove to compel them by torture to eat it (2 M. 6.[18]). It was looked upon as deepening the desecration of the Temple that "swine's flesh" was offered on the altar (1 M. 1.[47]). The Roman influence led to large herds of S. being kept (Mw. 8.[30]; Mk. 5.[11]). The horror at the S. seems to have been lessened when our Lord cd. use a figure connected with the feeding of pigs (Mw. 7.[6]); and Peter cd. refer to the washing of them (2 P. 2.[22]). Some have thought the S. was declared unclean for dietetic reasons, that the flesh tended to produce cutaneous disease, but there seems no proof of this; certainly S. are kept by the Christians in Pal. and they do not seem to be afflicted specially. It may have been inherited fm. Egypt if we may trust the account Herodotus gives of the Egyptian horror of the swine (Herod. ii. 47): "If a man in passing accidentally touch a pig, he instantly rushes to the river and plunges in with all his clothes on." Yet he tells us that they use the S. to tread the grain into the ground and to thresh it (ii. 47).

SWORD (Heb. ḥereb, Gr. NT. machaira, romphaia, only in LXX xiphos). An ancient battle was decided by the advance of the heavy armed soldiers, who had as weapons a heavy spear and a S. Generally the spear was hurled against the warrior opposite, then when the spear throw was evaded the warriors came to fight with the S. at close quarters. In earliest times the weapons wd. be wooden clubs or maces headed with stone; the greater severity of the wound inflicted by weapons with point and edge led to the use of metal as the material of wh. offensive arms shd. be made. The first edged implements were flint knives, but swords of flint were impossible (see KNIFE). The first metal used for swords appears to have been bronze, that is, copper alloyed with tin. However, we must bear in mind, when we make affirmations as to the early preference for bronze over iron, that iron readily rusts away, while the "patina" that covers bronze is much slower in its action, and in fact protects the metal fm. rapid corrosion, so we cannot argue the proportion of the use of these metals fm. the proportion of the remains. It may be doubted whether the Hebrews knew anything of "steel" till after the Exile. Of course before NT. times it was well known. The shape of the S. varied with age and country. Fm. their monuments we can learn the shape of the Egyptian and Assyrian S. Wilkinson says (AE. i. 210): "The Egyptian S. was straight and short, fm. two and a half to three feet in length, having apparently a double edge tapering to a sharp point. It was used for cut and thrust." There were also scimitars with broad curved blade well in front of the handle; and daggers with a long handle and a blade of seven to ten inches. The Assyrian S. was a little longer and slimmer than the Egyptian. Both nations wore their S. in the girdle on the left thigh. Although we have neither instance nor representation, fm. the statements of Scripture we may be sure that the S. of the Hebrews was, like that of the Egyptians, made for thrusting as well as cutting—Joab's murder of Amasa implies this; as striking evidence is given by the battle of HELKATH-HAZZURIM (cp. 2 S. 20.[10]). It wd. appear to have been short, otherwise it is difficult to understand how Saul cd. effect his suicide by "falling on his S." (1 S. 31.[5]). EHUD's dagger of a cubit's length was probably shorter than the ordinary S., or the length wd. not have been mentioned. That it was worn in a sheath is made known by the incident in the murder of Amasa, by wh. JOAB secured that he shd. have his S. in his hand. The Greek form of S., wh. of course was the ruling one during Maccabean times, was short, and shaped like a leaf. In the NT., whenever the S. is mentioned the Roman S. wd. be in the mind of the writer. The Romans originally used the Greek S., but, impressed with its deadly power at the battle of Cannæ, they adopted the Spanish S., wh. was rather longer than the Greek, and had a straight edge. While both the Greek and the Roman S. had two edges, it wd. seem that some swords were made like our cavalry S., with only one edge; hence the reference to "two-edged" S. (He. 4.[12]; Rv. 2.[12]). Further, the S. is used for "war" (Jr. 14.[13]): "Ye shall not see the S." To exterminate the inhabitants of a city is to "smite them with the edge of the S." (Jo. 11.[14]). The S. stands also for military prowess, as in the interpretation the Midianite gave of his comrade's dream: "This is nothing else save the S. of Gideon the son of Joash" (Jg. 7.[14]). In the NT. our Lord uses it of discord: "I came not to send peace but a S." (Mw. 10.[34]). The S. of the Lord is the lightning (Is. 34.[5]), as the symbol of God's vengeance (Ek. 21.[5]). The prohibitory power by wh. man was restrained fm. re-entering Paradise is symbolised as "a flaming S. wh. turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gn. 3.[24]). In the NT. the "Word of God" is "the S. of the Spirit" (Eph. 6.[17]). In the kingdom of Christ the weapons are not carnal but mighty; to these spiritual weapons our Lord referred when He told the disciples to sell their garments to buy a sword.

SYCAMINE OR BLACK MULBERRY

SYCAMINE. This tree is mentioned only in Lk. 17.[6]. It is properly the black mulberry, known in Pal. as the Syrian or Damascus mulberry (tūt Shāmī). St. Luke distinguishes between this tree and the SYCAMORE (19.[4]). The fruit, resembling large blackberries, with a slightly acid flavour, is greatly relished in the East.

SYCAMORE, SYCOMORE (1 K. 10.[27], &c.; Lk. 19.[4]). Amos was a dresser of sycomores (7.[14]) wh. bear figs of indifferent quality. They were apparently very plentiful in ancient times (2 Ch. 1.[15], &c.). David placed an officer in charge of the sycamores and olives in the lowland (1 Ch. 27.[28]). It grows to a goodly size, reaching at times 50 ft. in height. The timber is light but durable. Its spreading branches cast a grateful shade. Planted as they often are by the wayside, the traveller must pass under them. This furnished his opportunity to Zaccheus (Lk. 19.[4]). Seated among the foliage on one of the lower limbs, he would be within a foot or two of the Saviour's head.

SYCHAR is described as "a city of Samaria," "near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph." It was not far from Jacob's Well (Jn. 4.[5f.]). Although there is evidence that the ancient Shechem reached further eastward than the mod. city, there is nothing to show that it ever approached the neighbourhood of Jacob's Well. We may dismiss the idea that Shechem and Sychar were identical. There was a tendency for a time, in default of any more likely site, to accept the vill. of 'Askar as the ancient Sychar. It lies at the base of Ebal, two miles E. of Nâblus. But the presence of a spring furnishing abundant supplies of water made it difficult to understand why a woman should have been in the habit of carrying supplies "all the way" from Jacob's Well, as the narrative clearly implies. The sacredness of the well, and the medicinal quality of the water, would hardly account for this. And Mr. Macalister has shown reason to believe that 'Askar dates from Arab times (PEFQ., 1907, 92ff.). There he tells of his examination of the mound Telūl Balāṭā, N. of the hamlet Balāṭā, and W. of the so-called Tomb of Joseph, about equidistant fm. the well, and fm. 'Ain 'Askar. It was occupied from the days of the Heb. monarchy to the time of Christ. It is very prob. that here we have the site of the ancient Sychar.

SYCAMORE

SYENE, RV. SEVENEH, a town on the southern border of Egp. (Ek. 29.[10], 30.[6]—in each case read with EVm. "from Migdol to Syene"). It corresponds to the mod. Assuān, on the right bank of the Nile, opposite the island of Elephantine, where recently papyri have been found wh. cast light on the life of a Jewish colony there (B.C. 471–410). In the neighbourhood were the quarries which supplied the famous red granite seen in the obelisks, &c. From ancient times it was a military post guarding the frontier towards Ethiopia.

SYNAGOGUE (Heb. keneseth, Gr. συναγωγή). The word S., lit. "an assembly," is used to denote either the congregation or the place of meeting. The origin of the S. system is obscure, but we can see how it must have arisen to meet the sptl. wants of the Israelites. In addition to the Tabernacle and Temple services, the needs of the people seem to have been supplied from very early times by special local assemblies, while the Sabbaths and the new moons too were seasons of meeting (1 S. 20.[5]; 2 K. 4.[23]). We have an indication of something of the same kind in Is. 8.[16], and then the exile taught the Isr. the possibility of sptl. worship apart from ritual or local associations (Ek. 8.[1], 11.[15], &c.), so that the people had reached the stage necessary to allow the general development of the S. along with legal Judaism after the days of Ezra and his reformation. After that time every Jew was expected to be acquainted with the Law, and so, for the purposes of popular instruction, there arose the Beth-ha-keneseth, while within or alongside of it the Beth-ha-midrash was established for the training of scholars. The first mention of the actual building of a S. is that by the Alexandrian Jews at Ptolemais or Accho (3 M. 7.[20]), as a memorial of deliverance fm. the massacre planned by Ptolemy IV. Philopator (B.C. 217–215); nevertheless such buildings seem to have existed in all parts of Judea at least as early as the Persian period (Ps. 74.[8]). In harmony with this we are told that even in "the Dispersion" such institutions existed "in every city fm. ancient generations" (Ac. 15.[21]). As in Palestine itself, these also were meant for the same double purpose, and this their names indicate—προσευχή, place of prayer, and διδασκαλεῖον (Philo), place of instruction. By the first century such buildings had become very numerous. In Jrs. alone we read there were 480, quite a number being maintained by foreign Jews (Ac. 6.[9]). Later we read of twelve in the city of Tiberias.

RUINS OF SYNAGOGUE AT KEFR BIR'IM, UPPER GALILEE

In the selection of the site for a S. regard was to be had where possible to the proximity of water, as was required for ablutions (Ac. 16.[13]), and in agreement with this we find in a decree of Halicarnassus (Ant. XIV. x. 23) that the Jews were to be allowed to "make their proseuchæ by the seaside, accdg. to the custom of their forefathers." In regard to the position and use of the bldgs. themselves it was required that they be treated with respect. The rabbis used to say that the city having its gardens higher than the S. would certainly be destroyed at last. Of the synagogues of Bab. it was said that while they were built for other purposes in addition to that of prayer, yet they were not to be treated irreverently; and "to be behind a S." during divine service was regarded as a scorning of religion altogether. Another matter too had to be considered in the arrangement of the bldg., as it was required that "all worshippers in Isr. have their faces turned to that part of the world where Jrs., the Temple and the Holy of Holies are" (cp. 1 K. 8.[30, 38]), and so it became the rule that the door was so placed that the Israelite when entering and when at prayer shd. at the same time face the ark and the Holy City. This rule is prob. of later origin than apostolic days; with one exception the ruins of the synagogues of Galilee (A.D. 150–300) do not conform to it. At the present moment, however, it is universal, and to ensure its practice in Western lands in every Jewish house a picture or tablet on the E. wall with the word mizrāḥ, "east," upon it, indicates whither the occupants are to turn even at times of private prayer.

For the establishment of a congregation there was required only that there shd. be a community having ten men of leisure (batlanīm) who were known to be of humble disposition (Ber. 6.[6]) and ever ready to meet at the times of service. This number was necessary as the oral law taught that the Shechinah did not meet with fewer, and besides they were required to fill the various offices and carry through the synagogal functions. The organisation was essentially presbyterian, and these ten men (or a greater number in a larger community) were responsible for the conduct of the service in decency and order, for the exercise of discipline, and the care of the poor. They were designated "elders" or "rulers" of the S. (Mk. 5.[22]; Lk. 7.[3], 8.[41, 49], 13.[14], &c.), as also parnasīn (the Aramaic for shepherds), with wh. designation cp. Ek. 34.[5, 8, 20]; Zc. 11.[15-16]. The high responsibility attached to their office was meant to be conveyed by this word, for as God Himself was the chief shepherd of Isr., so those who were called by this name were expected to care for His flock in the highest sense (Jr. 3.[15]), and so the rabbis tell us that the Holy One mourns over the congregation whose shepherd conducts himself haughtily toward his flock, and that every shepherd who leads his congregation in gentleness has the merit of guiding them in the path for the world to come. The officiating minister was usually assisted by three archisynagogi, three deacons, a teacher, and in days when tr. was needful, by two interpreters. The election of the chief ruler, who was designated shalīḥ or angel (Rv. 2.[1]), was vested in the congregation (Ber. 55[a], deduced from Ex. 35.[20]), but was controlled by the Sanhedrin, a commission of wh. examined candidates and certified as to their fitness. Almost equally prominent was the ḥazzān or teacher (Lk. 4.[20], ὑπηρέτης, "minister"). In the mod. S. he leads the cantillation, but in former days he had also various other duties, including the charge of the bks. and the teaching of the children during week-days.

Ruins of Synagogue at Tell Ḥum

The internal arrangement of the S. building was usually extremely simple. All that was required was a plain room, and very often in the case of the smaller communities an upper room—removed fm. the noise and bustle of the street—wd. be preferred. But much money was often expended on ornamentation, both external and internal. The synagogues of Galilee, and especially that at Tell Ḥum, were built of massive stones, beautifully cut and ornamented with symbolic figures and animals. The S. of Alexandria rivalled the Temple in beauty and wealth, and it was said that he who had not seen it, knew not the glory of Isr. The essential furniture consisted of an ark or chest for the S. rolls, wh. was placed in a recess named the Sanctuary or Temple at the inner end of the bldg., and to this several steps led up. In front of the ark they burned a perpetual light as a memorial of that in the Tabernacle or Temple (Ex. $27.^{20}$), and besides, it was considered as a symbol of the human soul (Pr. $20.^{27}$), of the Divine Law (Pr. $6.^{23}$), and of the manifestation of the Deity (Ek. $43.^{2}$). In front of the steps leading to the sanctuary was a reading-desk, at wh. the chief ruler conducted the public prayer with his face toward the ark, while in the centre of the bldg. there was a large platform or pulpit fm. wh. the Law and the Prophets were read, the sermon delivered, and announcements made. The chief seats (Mw. $23.^{6}$), in front of the ark, were primarily meant for the elders. In the S. of Alexandria there were 71 such seats, and they were gorgeously adorned (Succa, 81^{b}). Before and during the apostolic days the common people had no seats (Js. $2.^{2\text{-}4}$), and as in the Ss. and Oriental churches to-day the women were kept apart from the men.

The general order of the service was pretty well fixed even before the Christian era, and consisted of liturgical prayers with the cantillation of the Psalms, readings fm. the Law (parshaioth) and the Prophets (haphtaroth), and a sermon. The greatest change took place in regard to the choice of lessons. At first these were left to the reader, but gradually they became fixed. The oldest custom was that of dividing the Pentateuch into 154 Sabbath portions, to wh. were added 30 special lessons for fasts or feasts, and by this arrangement the whole Law was read through twice every seven yrs. Others read the special lessons as an extra portion on the days to wh. they referred, and they completed the Law in three yrs. Later an annual cycle of 54 lessons was introduced, and this holds to-day. We are told that Antiochus Epiphanes forbade the reading of the Law, and that for the time being the Jews read instead lessons from the Prophets, and that with the return of freedom both were retained. The volumes of the Law and the Prophets were in the form of parchment rolls, with the reading in columns like the pages of a bk. The Law had two rollers, and as the Lessons were consecutive it was always open at the place to be read; but the bk. of the Prophets had only one roll, and as only sections were read, it was wound up when the reading was over, and the place had to be sought on every occasion (B.B. 14^{a}; Lk. $4.^{17}$). These things were fixed, and it was the duty of the elders to guide the details, to call fit persons to read, pray, and preach, and to indicate where the congregation shd. repeat the "Amen." In theory it was admitted that services might be conducted in any language (Sota vii. 1), but it is scarcely likely that any others except Heb. (interspersed with Aram.) and Gr. were used, the former by the Palestinian Jews, and the latter by the Israelites of the Dispersion, whose Bible of course was the Greek (LXX).

The chief service was on the Sabbath morning, and it really commenced by each worshipper passing "two door lengths" into the bldg. and reciting the words of Ps. $5.^{7}$. On this occasion the phylacteries were not used, and prob. the ṭallith or prayer-cloth was not introduced till post-apostolic days. The prayers were then recited. They included the Shema' (Dt. $6.^{4\text{-}9}$, $11.^{13\text{-}21}$; Nu. $15.^{37\text{-}41}$), selections from the Psalms, and we think also, even as early as the days of our Lord, some sections of the Shemoné Esré, "Eighteen Blessings" (1, 2, 3, 16, 17, 18). Then there followed the Law and the Prophets, with Targum as we find them printed to-day in Hōq le Israel. The section fm. the Law was divided among seven readers, who were as far as possible selected to represent all Isr., and so there was usually one Cohen or priest, one Levite and five ordinary Israelites. After the reading came the derashah or sermon based upon it, and the service was concluded with the blessing (Nu. $6.^{24\text{-}26}$) pronounced fm. the steps in front of the ark. Similar services were held on Sabbath afternoon and on Monday and Thursday, but without the readings fm. the Prophets, while feast and fast days had of course special services of their own. Attendance at the S. was expected to be regular (Lk. $4.^{16}$). It was taught that prayer was effectual only fm. the S., that a man's prayer was not heard outside the S. unless he were unavoidably prevented fm. attending; that resorting to the S. lengthened life; that one who passed from the study to the S. and fm. the S. to the study was worthy to receive and did receive the Shechinah; and that the angel of death hid his weapons in the S., where no children were taught and where ten men did not pray.

Ruins of Synagogue at El Jish (Gischala)
Upper Galilee

The elders (πρεσβυτέροι or γερουσία) exercised all the powers of ecclesiastical discipline. The smallest session consisted of three, one of whom, presumably the shaliḥ, was required to know the Law. In more serious cases they were joined by four members fm. the judicial bench—the minor Sanhedrin. Their decisions were enforced by temporary exclusion, wh. mt. lead up to excommunication. Punishment by scourging was also inflicted (Mw. $10.^{17}$), and it was the duty of the ḥazzān to see to this. Appeals to higher courts were recognised.

The collections were taken up by the ḥazzān and two or more gabbâi tzedāqa who were chosen by the congregation, and who were required to be distinguished for honesty, wisdom, and justice, and for having the confidence of the people. Collections were made for synagogal purposes, for poor students in Jrs., and for local poor. As Jews could not handle money on the Sabbath, the ḥazzān took promises at the times of meeting, and on the following day he and the almoners collected it (cp. 1 Cor. 16.[1-3]). This collection in coin was known as " alms of the box " (קוּפָּה), and was made weekly. In addition there were the " alms of the dish " (תַּמְחוּ), consisting of remnants of food, &c., wh. were taken up each day and distributed to the very poor in the morning. It was expected that a Jew wd. contribute to the former after one month, and to the latter after a three months' residence in any place.

It is not difficult to trace the foundation and practice of the Apostolic Church to the S. system, and to see that we have really nothing to do with the Temple worship, wh. was meant to be unique and to be devoted to the sacrificial ritual. Synagogues might be established anywhere, and the eleven in the upper room exceeded by one the legal number for the establishing a S. of the Nazarenes. The apostles fm. the first followed the S. practice, and James, the Moderator of the first Christian synod, names the Christian place of meeting a S. (Js. 2.[2]), while the assembly over wh. he presided and all that led up to it, show that the first century Church was ruled on synagogal lines. That meeting was in itself a representative assembly dealing with business referred to it by an inferior court—the Presbytery of Antioch —wh. was itself made up of the representatives of various congregations (Ac. 11.[20-28]). The Jrs. Synod—or Christian Sanhedrin—issued authoritative decrees (δόγματα κεκριμένα, Ac. 16.[4]), thus exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction over presbyteries and churches. That the authority was competent, the churches recognised by their submission (Ac. 15.[31, 41], 16.[4, 5]). Every detail of the Primitive Church organisation and practice is synagogal—the equality of elders and rulers (Ac. 20.[17, 28]), the episcopal power vested in the presbyters, the daily ministration (Ac. 6.[1]), the matter of collections, the use of the word angel (Rv. 2.[1], &c.) for the presiding elder, and the general order of Christian worship: all are synagogal and presbyterian.

Great Synagogue.—According to the rabbinical tradition the Great Synagogue came into existence on the cessation of prophecy in Isr., and its members were the transmitters of the oral law fm. Ezra (B.C. 444) till the days of Simon the Just (B.C. 300), after whose time its duties are said to have devolved on the scribes. It claimed to be the supreme religious authority in Isr., and the rabbis tell us that it was first presided over by Ezra. Joshua, Zerubbabel, Haggai, Zechariah, Nehemiah, Malachai, and others were among its members.

Its motto was, " Make a hedge round the Law," and its common teaching was a development of the saying, " The [illegible] the Law, the [illegible] of God and mercy "; but very soon the Law absorbed the most of their attention, and in its service they sought " to reveal the glory of Isr." Its members are said to have completed the canon of the OT. in its three divisions—Law, Prophets, and Writings; to have revised its text; to have instituted the S. organisation and prayers; and to have done much more that we know to be of much later date. The only OT. notice of anything of the kind is in Ne. 8.[13]. Kuenen has sought to show that the name originally applied only to this great convocation, and that no such standing authority ever existed as the rabbis represent the Great Synagogue to have been. If anything of the kind ever existed at a later time, it was probably nothing more than a committee of the Sanhedrin.

WM. M. CHRISTIE.

SYNTYCHE and EUODIA were female members of the Church at Philippi (Php. 4.[2]), who had laboured with St. Paul in the Gospel, but who seem to have fallen into variance with one another. St. Paul exhorts them to be of one mind.

SYRACUSE, in the harbour of which St. Paul's ship lay three days on his voyage to Rome (Ac. 28.[12]), was situated on the E. coast of Sicily. In B.C. 734 a band of Corinthian emigrants took possession of the island of Ortygia, hitherto in the hands of the Phœnicians, and founded a colony. The island wh. guarded the harbour was connected with the mainland by a bridge. The settlement spread to the mainland, and took its name from the marshy vale of Syraco. The circuit of the city wall at its greatest was c. 14 miles. In B.C. 486 Gelon became " tyrant," and under him the city prospered greatly. In subsequent years the Syracusans defeated the Carthaginians (480), the Etruscans at sea (474), and the Athenian expedition (415–413). The government had been changed from a " tyranny " to a democracy. In B.C. 405 Dionysius restored the tyranny, and during his reign (405–367) the power of the city was extended, both in Sicily and in S. Italy. After a changeful history, in the course of wh. the Carthaginians were held at bay, the city passed into the hands of Hiero (B.C. 275), who made friendship with the Romans, and reigned till 216. His grandson Hieronymus favoured the Carthaginians, and was overcome (B.C. 212) by the Romans, who had already taken the rest of the island. Sicily was then placed under a prætor, whose seat was in Syracuse. One of her most famous citizens was Archimedes, whose inventions during the siege caused the Romans much trouble. He was among those killed by the victorious troops when the city was captured. Syracuse of to-day, a city of some 31,000 inhabitants, lies almost wholly on the island Ortygia. There are manufactories of chemicals and pottery; and large quantities of olive oil and fruit—lemons, oranges, almonds, &c.—are exported annually.

SYRIA (see ARAM). Herodotus declares the identity of the Assyrians and the Syrians. " The people who by the Greeks are called Syrians are called Assyrians by the barbarians " (Herod. vii. 63). This, however, may, without undue scepticism, be doubted; Woodhouse (EB. "Syria") thinks that it may be an extension of the application of Suri, the name of a Babylonian province beside the upper waters of the Euphrates. Homer (Il. ii. 783) and Hesiod (Theog. 304) are supposed to refer to the Syrians under the name Arimoi. Herodotus extended S. fm. Babylonia on the E. to Asia Minor on the W., and fm. the confines of Egypt to the Euxine. Among the Greeks after the time of Alexander the Great, the name S. was applied to the dominions of the house of Seleucus; i.e. the S. of Herodotus without Pal. and Phœnicia, but including wide provinces beyond the Euphrates. Again it was restricted to the territory S. of the Taurus and Amanus mountains, but with the addition of Pal. and W. of the Euphrates. It was bounded on the S. by the desert of Arabia and on the W. by the Mediterranean. This pretty much coincided with the Roman province of Syria. Pal. was regarded as a portion of this province, but when not under tributary sovereigns it was governed by a procurator, who was under the authority to some extent of the legatus pro prætore at Antioch. The geologic character of S. is very much the same as that of PALESTINE, mainly oolitic limestone, with intrusions of basalt. To the S. of the rough Amanus mountains begin the long parallel lines of mountains, the Lebanon and the Antilebanon, holding between them the long debated territory of Cœle-Syria, for the possession of wh. the Lagids and Seleucids so often fought. To the E. of the Antilebanon lies the smiling valley of DAMASCUS, with its streams and its orchards. E. of this are deserts, across wh., a little to the N., lies Palmyra, Tadmor in the wilderness. To the N., under the shadow of the Armenian mountains, is Commagene, where reigned the last monarchs that could claim descent fm. Seleucus. Farther S. is Apamene with its capital Emesa, afterwards known as the birthplace of Heliogabalus. In the time before Alexander (see ARAM) S. was divided into many separate states, all called Aram, as Aram-Zobah and Aram-Beth-Rechob. All these were conquered by David, and remained tributary under the rule of Solomon. On the break up of the Davidic empire what had been its provinces resumed their independence. These states united in a confederacy under the leadership of Benhadad, assisted by Ahab of Israel, to resist the advance of Assyria under Shalmaneser. Although the Ninevite king claims to have been victorious at Qarqar he retreated to Nineveh and had to resume his attempts again and again, only succeeding after the fall of the dynasties alike of Benhadad and of Omri had rendered confederacy impossible. The whole of Syria and Pal. was held by the Sargonids as part of their empire. On the fall of Nineveh, after a momentary subjection to Egypt, S. fell under the rule of Babylon, and then under that of Persia. After the battle of Issus, wh. gave Alexander the Great the western portion of the Persian empire, he proceeded to Egypt through S., enforcing his authority as he went. After the death of Alexander, when Antigonus and his son Demetrius Poliorcetes strove to gain the whole Macedonian empire to themselves, much of the fighting took place in S. After their final defeat at Ipsus, while Pal. remained in the hands of Ptolemæus Lagi, Seleucus Nicator secured possession of all Alexander's Asiatic dominions N. and E. of Pal. The Seleucids, weakened with their conflict with the Lagids for the possession of Cœle-Syria, lost their more eastern dominions; the Bactrians and the Parthians set up independent monarchies. Intent on their struggle with Egypt, the Seleucids fixed their capital at Antioch on the Orontes. The Seleucids were further weakened by internal dissension when Antiochus Hierax attempted to wrest Asia Minor fm. his brother, Seleucus Callinicus. Under Antiochus the Great S. assumed once more almost the dimensions wh. it had under Seleucus Nicator. He carried the arms of S. into India; if he did not bring Bactria and Parthia again under his authority he at all events compelled their respect. Antiochus had Pal. and the greater part of Asia Minor; indeed for a little while he had dominions in Greece. This, however, brought him into conflict with the Romans, by whom he was signally defeated at the battle of Magnesia. Asia Minor was taken fm. S., and Seleucus Philopator, the son of Antiochus, had to be merely a "raiser of taxes," as he is described in Daniel (11.[20]). His brother Epiphanes, who succeeded him, aspired to glories like those of his father, Antiochus the Great. He invaded Egypt and overran the whole country. When he was besieging Alexandria his career of conquest was stopped by the Romans, and he was compelled to return to S. He wreaked the vengeance of his disappointment on the Jews, whom he endeavoured to force into heathenism. He died in an expedition to plunder a temple fm. the treasures of wh. he hoped to be able to satisfy the exactions of the Romans and maintain his conflict against the Maccabees. After him monarchs rapidly followed each other on the throne of Syria: Demetrius, Alexander Balas, Antiochus Sidetes, and others. At length, in B.C. 65, S. was reduced by Pompey to the position of a Roman province. In the first Triumvirate Crassus took S. and fought disastrously against the Parthians at Carrhæ. When the second Triumvirate divided the dominions of Rome, S. fell to the lot of Antony. He had to fight for its possession with the Parthians, not always fortunately; his general Ventidius, however, drove them out. When Antony was overthrown at the battle of Actium, S. with the rest of the Roman empire became the prize of Augustus. Under him the Roman empire came under a more systematised form of administration. The seat of the government of S. was placed at Antioch, where stayed the Roman governor, legatus pro prætore, who had three legions under his control to maintain his authority. The Roman policy in S. was, as in most of their dominions, to retain existing powers so far as possible. Under the Macedonian rule a number of cities had been founded with quasi-Greek constitutions; these were confirmed in their privileges, were allowed even to form leagues like that of the Decapolis, and coined money. There were besides dynasties of monarchs. We have mentioned the dynasty of Commagene, ruled over by a family that claimed connection with the Seleucids. There were native dynasties also in Emesa, Chalcis, and Abilene. The Herodians in Judæa are examples of this policy; they had a certain amount of administrative authority but no right to make war. Dominions were taken fm. one and given to another, as we saw in the history of the HERODIAN FAMILY. Occasionally even free cities were assigned to monarchs, as Damascus was handed over by Caligula to Aretas. These two, the free cities and the native dynasties, kept each other in check. After the death of Nero, followed by those of Galba and Otho, S. came into prominence. Vespasian, who was carrying on the Jewish war, became, with the support of Mucianus, governor of S., a candidate for the empire. With the fall of Jrs. before the arms of Titus, the son of Vespasian, Syria passes out of Biblical history. It shared in all the vicissitudes of the Roman empire, till it was conquered by the Mohammadans in the seventh cent. A.D. Save for the irruption of the Crusaders, and the tottering kingdoms set up by them, S. has remained under the power of Islām.

SYRIAC LANGUAGE (Heb. 'Arāmīth). In Dn. 2.[4] we are told "then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriack" (AV.), "in the Syrian language" (RV.); thereafter follow six chapters in another language than Heb., cognate, but distinct fm. it. So in Ezra 4.[7] we have the statement, "the letter was written in the Syrian tongue and interpreted in the Syrian tongue" (AV.), "written in Syrian character and set forth in the Syrian tongue" (RV.); then follow in this language the rest of the chapter and the two that follow; in the 8th chap. the first ten vv. are in Heb., then the Syriac is reverted to for the rest of the chap. In the NT. our Lord's exclamation on the cross is a quotation in Palestinian Syriac of Ps. 22.[1] (Mw. 27.[46]); the same language is employed in His address to Jairus' daughter (Mk. 5.[41]); and in that to the deaf mute in Decapolis (Mk. 7.[34]). St. Paul introduces two words written usually as one (1 Cor. 16.[22]). In Jr. 10.[11] we have a single verse in Syriac, and in Gn. 31.[47] two words. Misled by statements wh. Jerome makes in his preface to Daniel, scholars, as e.g. Luther, became accustomed to call this tongue "Chaldee," although in Dn. 2.[4] he trs. Responderuntque Chaldæi regi Syriace; so also in Ez. 4.[7]. The Genevan version has (Dn. 2.[4]) "in Aramites language"; in Ez 4.[7] the Genevan reads, "And the writing of the letter was the Aramites writing, and the thing declared was in the language of the Aramites." At the same time one of the earliest translations of the NT., the Peshiṭtā, was made into a dialect of this same language, wh. was called in this connection "Syriac": along with this was also a tr. of the OT. nearly, if not quite contemporary. Very little later the Targums, traditional interpretations of the OT. in Western Aramaic, began to be committed to writing. When we compare the Syriac of these two, putting aside for the time the Biblical, we find the principal grammatical difference to be that while the preformative of the third mas. impf. is "n" (nun) in Eastern Syriac, it is "i" (yud) in Western. While Biblical Syriac displays many features of the Palestinian dialect a case may be made out for maintaining these to be due to a great extent to scribes who assimilated what they wrote to the language they were in the habit of hearing (see DANIEL).

Like Hebrew, Syriac is a Semitic tongue. Its roots consist by a vast majority of three consonants, varied by the use of different vowels; its verb has only two tenses, "preterite," wh. has to act as "perfect" and "pluperfect," and an "imperfect," wh. acts also as a "future": it is not fertile in modal forms. The main development of the Syriac verb, as in other Semitic languages, is in derivative forms, of wh. there are six in ordinary use; the simple verb, the frequentative or intensive, and the causative, each with its appropriate passive. The intensive or frequentative is formed fm. the simple verb by doubling the middle radical, and the causative by prefixing the syllable 'a (in Biblical S. ha), the passives by prefixing the syllable ith, except in the case of the causative, where it is itta, and the 'a is absorbed. The pl. of nouns is in n, with a different vowel for the different genders. The pronouns are practically the same as those in Heb., and as in other Semitic tongues in the oblique cases they are suffixes. The most marked peculiarity, wh. distinguishes S. from other Semitic tongues, is the use of the status emphaticus instead of the article; it may be regarded as turned fm. being a prefix, as the article is in Heb. and Arb., to being a suffix, as in use it follows the same syntactical laws. As compared with Heb., S. has a tendency to shorten vowels, and to change the s sounds into those connected with t. On the whole it is a simple language with few irregularities. The characters in wh. it is written are modified fm. Heb. in such a way that they may be more rapidly written; each separate letter is simplified, and those in a word are joined together. It is not so long since it was thought that S. was a modification of Heb., and consequently was later; hence the presence of Aramaisms, as they were called, in a document was regarded as proof of lateness. The question has now assumed a different aspect, since by the discovery of the inscriptions at Sinjirli it is found that S. was a fully developed tongue in the days of Tiglath-pileser. On the other hand, Mesha's inscription on the Moabite stone had linguistic characters that certainly wd. have been reckoned Aramaisms had they occurred in a book of the Bible. Syriac is found to have been the language of business and diplomacy fm. before the time of the Sargonids. When Rabshakeh presents Sennacherib's ultimatum to the representatives of Hezekiah, they say to him, "Speak, I pray thee, to thy servants in the Syrian language" (2 K. 18.[26]). In the palace of Sargon were found a number of weights wh. had on one side the name of the sovereign with his titles, and the designation of the weight in Assyrian, and on the other the name of the weight alone in Syriac—as if that were for use and the other for dignity. More striking is the fact that in many cases the contract tablets, wh. were themselves written in the official language of Assyria, and in cuneiform characters, had on the clay envelope, inscribed by way of docket, the summary of the enclosed deed in Aramaic—as if that were the language more generally understood even by those who wd. be searching for legal documents. It was a question for a time whether the Sinjirli inscription shd. be described as written in Heb. or in Aramaic; the balance of characteristics is, however, in favour of Syriac. When we think of the Aramaisms of the Moabite inscription along with the Hebraisms of those of Sinjirli, we may doubt if at that early date the tongues were so perfectly differentiated as they were later: tho' perhaps the geographical situation of Sinjirli—or, to call it by its ancient name, J'adi—might explain the Western tinge in the language, and Moab's proximity to the trade routes with its Syriac-speaking merchants mt. explain the Moabite Aramaisms. The recent extensive discovery of Aramaic papyri in the vicinity of Assouān is an important addition to our knowledge of the geographical extent of the use of "the Syrian language." In the Mandæan writings and in some passages in the Babylonian Talmud we have a southern variety of Eastern Aramaic, some of the peculiarities of wh. appear in Biblical Aramaic. In the Samaritan Targum we have a somewhat corrupt dialect of Palestinian Syriac. Fm. early in the second cent. there was an extensive Christian literature in Eastern S., though, as the Gospels discovered by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson prove, not restricted to that. The Western became very much the vehicle for Jewish thought. Josephus wrote his history of "the Wars of the Jews" in Aramaic wh. he calls Hebrew, and then translated it into Greek, subject to the correction of friends. According to the tradition preserved by Papias, Matthew wrote his Gospel first in this language. When Paul spoke to his countrymen in "the Hebrew tongue" (Ac. 21.[40]) it was Aramaic that he used.

SYROPHŒNICIAN. The woman whose daughter Jesus cured, who dwelt "in the parts of Tyre and Sidon" (Mw. 15.[21f.]), is so described (Mk. 7.[26]). "Greek," in this passage, may mean "Greek-speaking." She was evidently of Phœnician descent. "Syrophœnicia" designated the Phœnician district belonging to the Rm. province of Syria, distinguishing it fm. "Lybophœnicia" in N. Africa (Strabo, xvii. 3).

T

TAANACH. A royal Can. city whose king was conquered by Joshua (12.[21]) It was in the portion of Issachar, but allotted to Manasseh (17.[11]). The Canaanites were not driven out (v. 12), but when Isr. waxed strong they were reduced to slavery. T. was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (21.[25]). In the plain hard by the battle with Sisera was fought (Jg. 5.[19]). It is named in one of Solomon's commissariat districts, as under Baana, s. of Ahilud (1 K. 4.[12]). It is described as on the border of Manasseh. Without doubt it is to be identified with Tell Ta'anek, a mound on the S. edge of the great plain of Esdraelon, five miles SE. of Tell el-Mutesellim, the site of ancient Megiddo, with wh. it is almost invariably named. Excavations have been carried out in recent years by Prof. Sellin of Vienna. A brief and luminous account of his discoveries and their significance is given by Dr. Driver in his Schweich Lectures (1908), Modern Research as illustrating the Bible, pp. 80ff. Many articles of great interest were found, shedding light upon its history from as far back as B.C. 2000, and illustrating the social and religious life of the inhabitants in successive centuries.

TAANATH-SHILOH, a city on the NE. boundary of Ephraim (Jo. 16.[6]). OEJ. places it (s.v. Thena) ten Roman miles E. of Nāblus. It may be identical with Ta'nā, c. seven miles SE. of Nāblus and two miles N. of Yānūn, the ancient Janoah. There are remains of walls, cisterns, and rock sepulchres.

TABBAOTH, ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[43]; Ne. 7.[46]), called "Tabaoth" in 1 Es. 5.[29].

TABBATH, a place, probably in the Jordan valley E. of Bethshan, named in connection with the Midianite flight (Jg. 7.[22]), unidentd.

TABEEL. (1) Father of the man whom Rezin and Pekah proposed to make king in Jerusalem instead of Ahaz (Is. 7.[6], AV. "Tabeal"). (2) A Persian officer in Samaria (Ez. 4.[7]), called "Tabellius" in 1 Es. 2.[16].*

TABERAH, "burning," a station of the wanderings in the wilderness of Paran, so called because the people were punished there by the "fire of the Lord" (Nu. 11.[3]; Dt. 9.[22]).

TABERING. The verb here (Na. 2.[7]) trd. "to taber" (tāphaph) appears in Ps. 68.[25], where it is rendered "to play with timbrels." It means lit. "to beat," or "to strike," as one beats a drum. The "taber" is a small drum. The reference in the text is to the custom among women in the East of beating their breasts as an expression of grief.

TABERNACLE. (1) Names.—"Tabernacle" (from the Latin word tabernaculum) has been regularly used in the English versions since Wyclif to denote the portable tent-like structure that accompanied the Israelites in their wanderings in the desert, and during the early years of the settlement in Canaan, and served the purposes of a sanctuary. The English word, like the tabernaculum of the Latin versions, has unfortunately been used to render indiscriminately the "tent" (Heb. 'ōhel), the "booth" (prop. of interwoven boughs: Heb. sukkā), and the "dwelling" (Heb. mishkān) of the Hebrew texts. More consistently the three terms may be rendered "tent," "booth," and "tabernacle" respectively. The last of these terms, i.e. "tabernacle" proper (mishkān), is characteristic of the priestly writers (see (3) below), and designates essentially the place where Jahveh dwells. Other important names employed are: "tent of meeting" (Heb. 'ōhel mô'ēd, AV. "tabernacle of the congregation")—this occurs in both the oldest and latest sources (E. and P.); and the "tent of the testimony" (RV., but AV. "tabernacle of witness," Heb. 'ohel hā-'ēdūth), peculiar to the priestly writers.

(2) The "Tabernacle" (Tent) of the Earliest Source.—A remarkable section, which is evidently a fragment, regarding the "tent of meeting," has been preserved from the Elohistic source in Exod. 33.[7-11] (beginning, "Now Moses used to take the tent and to pitch it without the camp, afar off from the camp; and he called it, The tent of meeting"). The abrupt mention of "the tent" here implies that in another part of the source (not now extant) some account had been given of its construction for the reception of the ark. Its situation ("without the camp, afar off from the camp") is also to be noted; cp. the similar situation of shrines and holy places outside the villages of Canaan. The frequentative tenses of the description also show that it was regularly pitched in this situation ("Moses used to take . . . and pitch it," &c.; so RV.), and, apparently (so light and portable was the structure), by Moses himself. The special purpose it subserved is also clearly stated. It was the "tent of meeting," not for the whole congregation—a hall of assembly—but where Jahveh, descending in the theophanic cloud, which "stood at the door of the tent, spake unto Moses face to face as a man speaketh unto his friend," and made him the recipient of the revelations which were afterwards communicated (by Moses) to the people. Further, we are informed that all who "sought the Lord (Jahveh) went out unto the tent of meeting," i.e. probably to secure an expression of the Divine will (an oracle) in regard to affairs of difficulty or danger (cp. Dt. 31.[14f.]—the only place in Dt. where the tent is mentioned; here Moses is bidden to repair with Joshua to the tent in order to receive a Divine revelation). Finally the tent is in the charge of a single attendant—the young Ephraimite, Joshua, the son of Nun, who "departed not out of the tent." *

The original tent was thus essentially a tent-shrine, in which the sacred ark—the symbol and pledge of Jahveh's presence—was housed, and in which Divine communications were regularly made in the theophanic cloud to Moses. And such it continued, presumably, to be during the subsequent period of the conquest and settlement in Canaan, until it was superseded by the larger and more elaborate "temple" (Heb. hêkāl) at Shiloh (1 S. 1.[9], 3.[15], 2.[22b] is a late gloss—see the commentaries).† Later we find that a "tent" to shelter the ark was pitched by David on Mount Zion (2 S. 6.[17]; cp. 1 Ch. 16.[1]), and the author of 2 S. 7.[6] evidently thought of the ark as having been preserved continuously from the first in a "tent." ‡

(3) The Tabernacle (Tent) of the Priestly Writers.—In marked contrast with the simple portable tent which Moses (perhaps with Joshua's assistance) could carry, and which he habitually pitched outside the camp, which, moreover, had but one attendant, and that not a Levite but a young Ephraimite, viz. Joshua, we are confronted in the narrative of P. with an elaborate structure, surrounded by pillars and hangings which formed a large court, furnished with an equipment which

* Rashi observes that by Albam, a mode of Gematria, Tābeal becomes Remaliah (father of Pekah), wh. is not strictly accurate, as the yodh in the latter name is redundant.

* The same representation of the tent recurs in the episode of the seventy elders (Nu. 11.[16f., 24-30]), and in the account of Miriam's leprosy (Nu. 12., esp. v. 4f.), both from E.

† Ps. 78.[60], however, refers to the sanctuary at Shiloh as a "tabernacle" and "tent."

In any case it is a probable inference from Jer. 7.[14] that the "temple" at Shiloh was early destroyed by the Philistines.

‡ The text of 2 Sam. 7.[6], as corrected by Budde and others, runs: I (i.e. Jahveh) have not dwelt in an house since the day that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt even to this day, but have walked from tent to tent and from tabernacle to tabernacle.

required several wagons to transport it, attended by a large body of Levites, and pitched in the centre of the camp. How this priestly conception of the Mosaic Tabernacle arose will be discussed below. One point, however, needs to be insisted upon at the outset—the whole conception is dominated by a sublime religious ideal, the attempt, viz., to realise the idea of a sanctuary wh. should be a fit dwelling-place for Jahveh, the holy covenant-God of the sanctified community of Israel: the holy God of Israel dwelling in a holy habitation, served by holy ministers, in the midst of a holy land inhabited by a holy people. This conception which, apparently, started with (or, at any rate, first assumed articulate expression in) Ezekiel (cp. Ek. 40ff., 37.[27]), was developed by the later priestly writers with elaborate detail. It is expressed with emphatic clearness at the beginning of one of the priestly sections concerned with the Tabernacle: Let them make Me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them (Ex. 25.[8]).

The general scheme of the ideal Tabernacle sketched by P. is dominated by the conception that all phases of the community's life should share in varying degrees in the desiderated standard of holiness. The different classes and localities exhibit by ascending stages higher degrees of sanctity, wh. are reflected in their arrangement. Grouped around the sanctuary are (1) in an outermost square the tents of the Hebrew tribes, three tribes on each side (cp. Nu. 2.[1f.], 10.[13f.]); (2) contained within this is another square, the four sides of which are occupied by priests and Levites; (3) within this, again, and forming the heart of the whole, is the sacred enclosure (the "court of the Tabernacle") containing the Tabernacle proper, which itself is divided into two parts, viz., holy place and holy of holies.

(a) The Court of the Tabernacle (Ex. 27.[9-19]; cp. 38.[9-20]). Coming to the Tabernacle enclosure viewed from without, we encounter an enclosed oblong space lying east and west, 100 cubits in length (east and west) by 50 in breadth (north and south); i.e. it consists of two squares of 50 cubits.* This is the "court of the Tabernacle" (Ex. 27.[9]), and contained within it are the Tabernacle proper and all that appertains to it (altar of burnt offering, holy place, holy of holies, &c.). The screen which shuts off this sacred enclosure from the surrounding camp is formed by five curtains or "hangings" of plain white, two (each 100 cubits long) on the north and south sides, one of 50 cubits on the west side, and on the east side two of 15 cubits each flanking the entrance to the court, which entrance was itself 20 cubits in width, and was closed by an embroidered portière of white (Ex. 27.[9f.]). All six hangings were 5 cubits high, and were suspended from wooden pillars of the same height, standing in sockets of bronze, and held in place by cords fastened to "pins" of bronze in the ground (cp. 35.[18]). In all, the pillars required for the "hangings" are stated to be 60, ranged in groups of 20 and 10 (viz. 20+20+10+10, 20 each long side, 10 each short, 5 cubits of curtain being suspended from pillar to pillar).

* The cubit, for convenience of reckoning, may be assumed to be 18 inches; the exact measurement of P.'s cubit is uncertain.

(b) Furniture of the Court.—In the centre of the court stood "the altar" (Ex. 27.[1-8]), called also "the altar of burnt-offering" and "the brazen altar." It is described as a hollow box of acacia* (=AV. "shittim") wood, 5 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 cubits in height, and overlaid with bronze. There is nothing in the text to suggest that the hollow part was filled with earth, as has been supposed. It was to be thus lightly built to facilitate transport, and, like many other articles in connection with the Tabernacle, was fitted with rings and staves of acacia wood overlaid with brass. From the four corners, "of one piece with it," issued the four "horns" or "projections at the four corners, probably of a conventional shape, a few inches in height," † the origin and purpose of which are obscure. Probably, however, the term "horn" in this connection is metaphorical, and does not point to any ultimate connection with bull-worship. Round the altar, midway between top and bottom, ran a projecting "ledge" (Heb. karkōbh), probably to enable the officiating priest to perform the sacrificial rites.‡ To this was attached a "grating of network of brass," which supported the ledge and made it possible for the blood to be dashed (through the grating) on the base of the altar. Possibly both the ledge and grating were designed to prevent the ashes from the altar falling on and defiling the sacred sacrificial blood (Kennedy). Near the altar the Laver of bronze was, according to Ex. 30.[17-21], to be placed. This was to serve for the ablutions of the priests. No details are given as to its design and workmanship in detail. It is not improbable, however, that the section of P. which makes mention of this, and of the golden incense-altar (Ex. 30.–31.), is a later addition to the body of P., and that these items had no place in the original description.

(c) The Tabernacle Proper and its Coverings (Ex. 26.[1-14] = 36.[8-19]).—Many difficult problems of interpretation emerge in P.'s description of the actual Tabernacle, which cannot be fully discussed here. It cannot be claimed that any of the many proposed solutions has removed all the difficulties; but a great step towards the final solution has been taken by Prof. A. R. S. Kennedy in his elaborate article on the Tabernacle in Hastings' DB., vol. iv.*

* All the wood to be used in the construction of the Tabernacle was to be of this kind.

† McNeile on Ex. 27.[2].

‡ Cp. Lev. 9.[22], where Aaron is said to "come down" from "offering the sin-offering and the burnt-offering and the peace-offerings."

It must be remembered that the structure that is being described throughout is essentially a tent, not a solid building. This is clearly stated at the beginning of the description in ch. 26.: Thou shalt make the Tabernacle of ten curtains. The curtains, in fact, constitute the Dwelling or Tabernacle in which Jahveh's presence resides. At the same time, though structurally it is tent-like, it is in form, as will be seen, a temple. The ten curtains which make up the Tabernacle proper measure each 28 × 4 cubits. These are to be sewed together into two sets of five, each set of five forming a continuous fabric of 28 × 20 cubits; and the two fabrics are to be fastened together by fifty gold hooks, which link into fifty loops of velvet, along the edge of each set: so "the Tabernacle shall be one."

It remains to describe how these curtains were to be arranged and suspended. Of course they would have to be supported on a wooden framework; and the elucidation of P.'s description of this forms one of the most difficult of the problems of interpretation attaching to the subject. The framework which supports the curtains is described in Ex. 26.[15-30]. Here the "boards for the Tabernacle" (Heb. qerāshîm) are stated to be of acacia wood, 10 cubits in height and 1½ cubits in width (no thickness is mentioned). It was formerly invariably assumed that solid beams of wood were meant. But such a view is beset with the gravest difficulties—such heavy beams would clearly be unsuitable for transport, and it is doubtful whether acacia wood of the requisite size could ever be obtained.† To solve these and other difficulties Kennedy has put forward a view which is very attractive and has won many adherents. He regards the so-called "boards" as really frames of wood lightly constructed of two "arms" (Heb. yādôth, RV. "tenons"), i.e. long pieces of wood which formed the sides of the frame, and were joined by cross-rails ("joined one to another," 26.[17]) like the rungs of a ladder. The frames were to be sunk in sockets of silver, two sockets for each "frame" (Ex. 26.[19]). On Kennedy's view it is at once apparent why there are two sockets for each "frame"—it is because each frame consists of two uprights which, projecting at the base, require two sockets in order to fix them. In accordance with this interpretation the crucial verses (Ex. 26.[15ff.]) should now be rendered: And thou shalt make the frames for the Tabernacle of acacia wood, standing up—ten cubits the height, and a cubit and a half the breadth of a single frame—two uprights for each frame, joined to each other by cross-rails.

A single frame, then, measures 10 cubits high, and 1½ cubits broad. The open space between each of the two uprights was divided by the cross-bars into (probably) two panels (a cross-bar joining top, middle, and bottom). The frames * thus constructed were to be "reared up" (v. 30), side by side, along three sides of a rectangular space 30 cubits long by 10 broad—twenty frames along each side (20 × 1½ cubits = 30 cubits), and six frames at the western end (6 × 1½ = 9 cubits; the remaining cubit at this end would be made up by the thickness of the frames and bars which terminated the sides at the western end). Along the three sides bars were run through rings attached to the woodwork—one long central bar in each case, with two sets of half-length bars, i.e. five bars on each of the three sides, forming (with the cross-bars of the frames) double panels.† This arrangement would secure rigidity to the framework as a whole. The east front was left open.‡

Such was the framework, and on it the curtains which formed the Tabernacle proper, and the coverings which enveloped these, were stretched.

We have already seen that the Tabernacle proper consisted essentially in the ten curtains (26.[1]) which, in two sets of five curtains sewn together, were to be spread over the framework. These curtains were of the finest linen, figured with inwoven tapestry figures of cherubim in violet, purple, and scarlet. When looped together the two sets of curtains would form one large surface 28 cubits by 40 (4 × 10). Together they are "designed to form the earthly and, with the aid of the attendant cherubim, to symbolise the heavenly dwelling-place of the God of Israel" (Kennedy). It will be evident that this combined curtain, when spread over the framework in such a way that the 28-cubit width fell from side to side, since the height of each side of the framework is 10 cubits and the width 10 cubits (total, 30 cubits), the 28-cubit width of curtain would cover the roof-surface and hang down within 1 cubit of the ground on each side. The curtain is also directed to hang down over the western end, so as to form a back to the holy of holies. Allowing for this (10 cubits), the remaining length of 30 cubits will exactly cover the roof-space of the Tabernacle

* Kennedy's results have been adopted in recent discussions of the subject by McNeile and Bennett (in commentaries on Exodus).

† Other difficulties are enumerated by McNeile, op. cit., p. 74.

* According to the present text (v. 29) the frames were to be overlaid with gold. This feature is probably a later addition to the text.

† Arranged thus:

the bars probably traversed (and coincided with) the cross-bars of the frames.

‡ Two extra frames (a seventh and eighth) are assigned to the western side. Kennedy supposes that these were added to strengthen the corners.

(leaving the eastern end open), and the juncture of the two sets of curtains (made by the gold hooks and loops of velvet) would coincide with the division of the holy place from the holy of holies (10 cubits from the western end). Stretched in this way over the open framework, the beautifully figured tapestry would be visible within the Tabernacle through a series of panels each 5 cubits high by 1½ broad. On the other hand, if the "boards" (frames) were solid, as was formerly supposed, the figured work would have been completely hidden from view by a wooden wall. In order to protect this delicate fabric a series of three outer coverings is enjoined to be made (Ex. 26.[7-13]). The first of these consists of eleven curtains of goats' hair, in two sets of six and five, linked together by a hundred loops and fifty bronze hooks. The whole would yield a surface of 30 × 44 cubits. When stretched over the tapestry this would just reach the ground at the sides (falling 1 cubit lower each side than the tapestry). The extra 4 cubits of length was intended, apparently, to be "doubled over against the front," so as to allow 2 cubits' length to overhang the edge of the roof at the eastern end. This would be useful in excluding light and rain. Somewhat confusingly the goats' hair covering is called the "tent" (in v. 7 of chap. 26.). Two other coverings, one "of rams' skins dyed red," and the other of skins of an animal which is probably the dugong (EV. "sealskins": Heb. taḥash), are provided for. The dimensions of these last are not given; but they must, at least, have completely enveloped the goats' hair "tent."

In what has been described we have the Tabernacle, consisting of the figured hangings, suspended on a light, open framework of wood, with a covering of goats' hair and two outer envelopes of skins. This forms a rectangular structure 30 cubits long, 9 broad (inside measurement), and 10 high (open at the eastern side). The structure was completed by a division into two parts, in the proportion of two to one, which was effected by means of a "veil" (Heb. pārōketh) of the same materials, colours, and design as the figured tapestry. The veil was to be suspended from four pillars of acacia wood overlaid with gold, fitted at their bases into sockets of silver, and placed 20 cubits from the entrance and 10 from the western end. The outer compartment forms the holy place, and the inner (a cube of exactly 10 cubits) the holy of holies (26.[31ff.]).

One further structural feature remains to be described. No directions have been given, so far, for closing the eastern end, which forms the entrance into the holy place. Provision for this is made in Ex. 26.[36f.]: And thou shalt make a screen for the door of the tent. The screen was of less elaborate workmanship than the figured tapestry (it had no cherubim worked upon it), and the five acacia pillars from which it was to be suspended, though overlaid with gold, were to be sunk in sockets of bronze (not of silver), it being thus clearly indicated that the screen as such formed no part of the real Tabernacle.

(d) The Furniture of the Tabernacle. (i.) In the Holy Place.—Here are three articles of furniture, viz. the table of shewbread, the golden candlestick, and the altar of incense. The table of shewbread (Ex. 25.[23-30], 30.[10-16]) was a low, wooden stand 1½ cubits in height, with a surface measuring 2 cubits by 1 cubit. It was overlaid with pure gold, and provided with golden rings for transport purposes. For the service of the table a number of utensils, all of pure gold, are also provided (25.[29]). The "golden candlestick," or rather lampstand, with seven stems, is described in Ex. 25.[31-40], 37.[17-24]. It was constructed of "beaten work" of pure gold, to hold seven golden lamps. Its position was on the south side of the holy place, facing the table of shewbread on the north side. It also was provided with various utensils in gold. The altar of incense is mentioned in the late appendix (Ex. 30.[1-7]) which probably formed no original part of P. It is described as having a surface 1 cubit square, and as 2 cubits high, and provided with horns. It was, of course, made of acacia wood overlaid with gold.

Golden Candlestick

(ii.) In the Holy of Holies.—In the most holy place are to be deposited the ark and the "mercy seat" (Ex. 25.[10-23], 37.[1-9]), the two most sacred objects and emblems which the Tabernacle contained. The ark, according to P.'s description, is an oblong chest of acacia wood, overlaid "within and without" with pure gold, 2½ cubits long by 1½ in height and 1½ in width. It was also to be furnished with rings for transport purposes, and was to contain "the testimony," i.e. the two stone "tables of the law" containing the Decalogue (cp. Dt. 10.[16]). "The ark of the testimony" is, in fact, P.'s characteristic descriptive term, with which compare the "tabernacle of the testimony" and the "tent of the testimony" (Ex. 38.[21]; Nu. 9.[15], &c.); so called because it sheltered the sacred stone tablets. Here also, resting upon the ark, is the mercy seat or propitiatory (Heb. kappōreth), which consists of a solid slab of pure gold. It is of the same superficial dimensions as the top of the ark, viz. 2½ by 1½ cubits (Ex. 25.17f.). At the two ends were placed "two cherubim of gold," "of one piece with the mercy seat," and with spreading wings. Doubtless the ark and "the propitiatory" were placed in the centre of the holy of holies, which itself occupied the exact centre of the Tabernacle enclosure, and so of the entire camp. Here, then, was Jahveh's throne. "The golden kappōreth was to the Jew the most sacred spot on earth; Jahveh appeared there, attended by adoring cherubim; and there the High Priest on the Day of Atonement presented the blood by which the sins of the nation were 'covered up' or 'wiped away'" (McNeile).

(e) The Theological and Historical Significance of P.'s Description of the Tabernacle.—In reading the minute and elaborate descriptions of P., when describing the wilderness sanctuary and all that appertains to it, with the mathematical symmetry of its arrangements, its carefully defined gradations of sanctity, it is impossible not to recognise how profoundly the picture has been influenced by certain dominant religious ideas. The unapproachable majesty of Jahveh's holiness, His uniqueness, oneness, the exquisite harmony and beauty of His attributes, are reflected in the arrangements of His earthly sanctuary. By ascending stages of sanctity—through court, holy place, and holy of holies, corresponding to laymen, priests, and High Priest—the central shrine of holiness is reached. All this would naturally lend itself to an elaborate development of religious symbolism, and, in fact, has done so from early to modern times. The Tabernacle has always proved a fruitful theme for the ingenuity of pious devotion. P.'s description, too, exercised a profound influence on the religious symbolism of certain parts of the New Testament, which, of course, has a certain theological importance.*

These considerations will also help to explain the relation of P.'s gorgeous sanctuary to historical fact. "The priestly writers," says McNeile, "did not make it their aim to present history as it was, but to systematise traditions and often to supplement them under the dominance of religious ideas." † P., in fact, presents to us an ideal Tabernacle, in which the developed institutions of a later age are reflected in a Mosaic environment with the necessary modifications. This was done in all good faith. History has constantly been so re-written. To judge the authors of such writings by the canons of modern historical science is foolish and unjust. They were concerned mainly not to teach the facts of history, but to use the historical form for the conveyance of religious ideas; and nowhere is this more strikingly exemplified than in P.'s description of the Mosaic Tabernacle. G. H. Box.

* Cf. on this point the essay on "The General Significance of the Tabernacle" in Westcott's Hebrews, pp. 233f.

† Exodus, p. 79.

TABERNACLES, THE FEAST OF, or FEAST OF BOOTHS (the Heb. word is the same in both cases, sukkoth, Lv. 23.34, 39, &c.), is definitely associated with the completion of gathering in the fruits of the earth in Ex. 23.16 (where it is called the Feast of Ingathering), &c. Its celebration began on the 15th day of the seventh month, and marked the end of the vintage. It may be described as a national "Harvest Home," and it was one of the three feasts involving a pilgrimage to Jrs. (Ex. 23.17, &c.). That it was for Isr. what similar festivals were for the nations around them, an occasion to express gratitude and joy that the annual produce of the earth was safely gathered, is practically certain. Jeroboam ordained a feast to take its place, in the month following, evidently to coincide with the later date of concluding the year's work in the north (1 K. 12.32). At the same time it was designed for remembrance of the deliverance wrought by God, when He caused their fathers to dwell in tabernacles (Lv. 23.43, &c.).

The first day of the feast was "a solemn rest," and the seven days during wh. it lasted were succeeded by another day of "solemn rest" (Lv. 23.39ff.). The people left their houses to dwell in shelters made of the branches of trees, like the "booths" to be seen in the vineyards. Only in Lv. 23.40 is there mention of fruit (RV.) in connection with the celebration. Green boughs were carried in the hands. An "offering made by fire, of a sweet savour," was offered. On the first day thirteen young bullocks, two rams, fourteen he-lambs of the first year, and meal-offerings, fine flour mingled with oil, three-tenth parts for each bullock, two-tenths for each ram, and a tenth part for each lamb. A he-goat was offered as a sin-offering, besides the continual burnt-offering, and the meal and drink offering. Each day the number of bullocks was reduced by one, till, on the seventh day, seven bullocks were offered; and on the eighth day one bullock, one ram, and seven he-lambs, with the appropriate meal and drink offerings. Besides these were the vows, and the freewill-offerings (Nu. 29.12ff.). Dt. 31.10 prescribes the reading of the law in the hearing of the people at the Feast of Tabernacles in the seventh year, the year of release. The dedication of Solomon's Temple fell at "the feast," in the seventh month, when sacrifices on an exceptional scale were offered (1 K. 8.2ff., &c.). The celebration of the feast is recorded in Ez. 3.4ff., when offerings were made "as the duty of every day required." By Ezra's direction the ancient custom of dwelling in booths during the feast, long in abeyance, was revived (Ne. 8.^{17}), and he also " read in the bk. of the law of God " (v. 18). The booths are described as erected on the roofs, in the courts of the houses, and in the open spaces of the city, as one may see them in season in the Jewish quarters of Oriental cities still. The feast was a joyful festival, a time of merry-making, and exchange of tokens of goodwill. When the day of the Lord shall come, Zechariah pictures all nations as going up to Jrs. for this feast, and plagues as befalling those who refuse (14.$^{16ff.}$).

The celebration was greatly elaborated in later times. The extraordinary festivities gave rise to the saying that " he who has not witnessed it has not seen what real joy is." An interesting discussion will be found in Hochman's Jerusalem Temple Festivities, pp. 54ff., " the Water Feast." At nightfall on the first day of the feast the court of the women was illuminated by four golden lamps set on lofty golden candlesticks. The women were on the balconies and the men below. Grave and pious men joined in processions and dances led by flute-players. " It is related of R. Simon b. Gamaliel, the grandson of Hillel, that on the occasion of this festival he performed a dance with eight lighted torches, throwing them into the air and catching them again without one touching another or falling to the ground, and that he was the only person of his time who could perform the קידה, wh. consisted in bending over to kiss the ground while standing on the great toes, and assuming the upright position without using one's hands." The " Songs of Degrees " (Pss. 120.–134.) were chanted towards morning. Two priests greeted the dawn with trumpets. Poplar twigs were brought from a distance and set round the altar so that their ends overhung it. Water for a libation was brought in procession from Siloam in a golden vessel. The libation of water and wine at the altar ended with the exclamation " Beauty is thine, O altar ! " There may be references to the " lights " and to the " water " in the sayings of Jesus (Jn. 8.^{12}, 7.^{37}).

TABITHA. See Dorcas.

TABLE. The word is used in Scrip. in ways analogous to our own. It may be of wood (Ex.

Assyrian Tables

25.^{23}), of gold (1 K. 7.^{48}), of stone (Ek. 40.^{42}), &c. Tables for various purposes formed part of the Tabernacle and Temple furniture. To prepare a table for one (Ps. 23.^{5}) is to set food before him. So " table " stands for the pleasures of eating and drinking (Ps. 69.^{22}). In 1 Cor. 10.^{21} " the Lord's table " indicates the holy Supper. The law is said to have been written on " tables " of stone. These were stone slabs on wh. the writing was engraved (Ex. 24.^{12}, &c.) ; and so, figuratively, " table of thine heart " (Pr. 3.^{3}, &c.). In Lk. 1.^{63} we shd. read with RV. " Tablet."

TABLET. The Heb. word lūăḥ, used of the stone slabs on wh. the law was written (see Table), applies also to boards of wood (Ex. 27.^{8}, &c.), and to tablets of other material wh. might be written on (Hb. 2.^{2}). The great libraries of the ancient world that have been preserved to us, consist of clay tablets on wh. the writing has been impressed (see Writing). The waxed tablet on wh. was scratched with a stylus the required writing, was in common use in the time of Christ (Lk. 1.^{63}). Gillāyōn is trd. " roll " by AV. in Is. 8.^{1} (RV. " tablet "). What the material was cannot be determined. On the prepared surface one might write with a stylus. In Is. 3.^{23}, RV. renders this word " hand mirror "—poss. polished metal. Some article of female adornment is denoted by kūmāz (Ex. 35.^{22} ; Nu. 31.^{50}). Bottē hannephesh (Is. 3.^{20}), lit. " houses of the soul," RV. renders " perfume boxes." They prob. contained some peculiarly reviving and refreshing perfume.

TABOR. (1) A mountain on the N. boundary of Issachar (Jo. 19.^{22}), prob. ident. with " the mountain " of Dt. 33.^{19}. The attraction to the mountain wd. most likely be a sanctuary, or high place, and as Zebulun and Issachar were both alike to profit, it may be sought on the march between them. It can be no other than the mod. Jebel eṭ-Ṭūr, at the NE. corner of the great plain of Esdraelon. Such a prominent height was certain to have its sanctuary, and in providing supplies for the worshippers resorting thither, the tribes would find their advantage. To T. Deborah and Barak gathered their forces, and thence they swept down to the conflict with Sisera in the plain. It may have been the scene of the slaughter of Gideon's brothers (Jg. 8.^{18}). The mountain lent itself naturally to fortification. Antiochus the Gt. in B.C. 218 took by stratagem the town of Atabyrion on Mt. Tabor. Later it was again held by the Jews (Ant. XIII. xv. 4). It fell to the Romans under Pompey, and in the neighbourhood Gabinius defeated Alexander, son of Aristobulus II. (Ant. XIV. vi. 3 ; BJ. I. viii. 7). Josephus fortified the mountain, and after Jotapata was taken its garrison was drawn out and defeated by Placidus, whereupon it surrendered to him.

An ancient tradition connected the mountain with the Transfiguration. This led to the erection of churches and monasteries on the summit. After the disastrous defeat of the Crusaders at the Horns of Haṭṭin, Saladin wrought havoc on the mountain. One church survived the stormy years that followed, but in 1263 was destroyed by Sultan Bibars. Annual pilgrimages were still made to Tabor, by both Latins and Greeks, to celebrate the Feast of the Transfiguration. In 1862 the Greeks restored and reoccupied their buildings, and were soon followed by the Franciscans. The monastery of the latter stands hard by the ruins of the old Crusaders' church. These have been largely excavated. Remains of fortifications of different periods have been uncovered, and many ancient tombs brought to light.

Tabor is one of the most striking features of the landscape. It lifts its rounded form 1843 feet above the sea. It stands almost apart from the hills of Lower Galilee, and is separated fm. Little Hermon by a deep and fertile vale. The sides are covered with oak and terebinth. A winding, rocky path ascends from the NW. On the western slope stands the vill. of Debûriyeh, a name wh. perhaps enshrines that of Deborah. The summit commands a most comprehensive and interesting view. Southward over Little Hermon, with Endor and Nain on its side, and Shunem at its western base, we catch a glimpse of Mt. Gilboa. Away across the plain, the eye runs along the hills on the N. boundary of Samaria, past TAANACH and MEGIDDO to Mt. Carmel by the sea, and the oak forest that runs northward from the gorge of the Kishon. A little to the N. of W., over five miles of broken upland, we can see the higher houses of NAZARETH gleaming white in the sun. Eastward lies the gorge of the Jordan, and beyond it the wall of Gilead, and the steep cliffs E. of the Sea of Galilee, broken by glens and water-courses, and especially by the great chasm of the Yarmuk. The mountains of Zebulun and Naphtali seem to culminate in the shining mass of Gt. Hermon, rising far in the northern sky. Standing here one realises how aptly the two mountains may be associated in the Psalmist's thought, altho' Hermon be mighty, and Tabor humble (Ps. 89.[12]). It is referred to by Jeremiah (46.[18]), and Hosea alludes to some ensnaring worship practised on the mountain (5.[1]).

It seems entirely improbable that the Transfiguration cd. have taken place on Mt. Tabor. The evidence seems to point to the summit being at that time occupied and fortified, wh. wd. make it most unsuitable as the scene of such an event. See TRANSFIGURATION.

(2) A town in Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (1 Ch. 6.[77]) wh. may be ident. with the town on the mountain top; or perhaps with CHISLOTH-TABOR (Jo. 19.[12]). (3) The plain (RV. "oak") of T., apparently not far fm. Gibeah, passed by Saul as he went home after Samuel had anointed him (1 S. 10.[3]): unidentd.

TABRET. See MUSIC.

TABRIMMON, father of Benhadad I. (1 K. 15.[18]).

TACHES. So AV. renders qĕrāṣīm (RV. "clasps"). They furnished the means for joining or "coupling" the curtains in the Tabernacle to each other (Ex. 26.[6], &c.), the "taches" on the edge of the one corresponding to and fitting into the "loops" on the edge of the other. The qereṣ ("tache") was prob. some kind of hook.

TACKLING, cords (Is. 33.[23]), ship furniture (Ac. 27.[19]).

TADMOR, a city named as having been "built," i.e. fortified, by Solomon "in the wilderness, in the land" (1 K. 9.[18], RV. Tamar). In 2 Ch. 8.[4] it is mentioned in connection with HAMATH ZOBAH and HAMATH, showing that the chronicler thought of it as in the Syrian desert. By the time he wrote Tadmor had become a great and splendid city. It seemed not incongruous that its history shd. be linked with the name of Solomon. In 1 K. 9.[18] the kĕthībh has "Tamar"; the qĕrī "Tadmor," suggests the emendation of a later hand to bring it into harmony with 2 Ch. 8.[4]. The city was prob. ident. with that mentioned in Ek. 47.[19], 48.[28], not yet identified, wh. must be sought in the wilderness of Judah, not far fm. the Dead Sea. The reading "Tamar" in 1 K. 9.[18] is certainly correct. It is equally certain that the chronicler thought of Tadmor, the Palmyra of later days, wh. in its desolation is again known by its ancient name, Tudmur. It lay on the great caravan route thro' the desert, wh. connected Damascus with the Euphrates valley. Wherever there is water in the desert settled life is possible. Here a supply, not abundant but sufficient, was furnished by springs. At a later time this was supplemented by an aqueduct. The date and author of its foundation are quite unknown. When or for what reason the name was changed to Palmyra is equally dark; but the identity of the city is unquestioned. As a port of call in the midst of the sea of sand, it rose to importance and flourished greatly. In c. B.C. 37 its conspicuous wealth tempted the avarice of Antony. Hadrian showed favour to the city (A.D. 130), calling it by his name, Adrianopolis. The name was short-lived. The city was made a Roman colony, and the people were associated with the Romans during the Persian wars. It reached the height of its glory in the third cent., under Odenatus, and Zenobia, his heroic widow and successor. Into the details of the history we need not enter here. The death-blow was dealt by Aurelian (A.D. 273). After long centuries of decay, during which it was lost to the kge. of western nations, it was at length rediscovered in 1678 by members of the English merchant colony in Aleppo. The ruins are still beautiful and impressive, the remains of the great temple of Baal and the graceful columns being specially noteworthy. A handful of Arabs now live in their wretched huts among the ruins. For recent descriptions see Wright, Palmyra and Zenobia; and Kelman, From Damascus to Palmyra.

TAHAN, a descendant of Ephraim (Nu. 26.[35]; 1 Ch. 7.[25]), ancestor of the Tahanites (Nu. 26.[35]).

TAHAPANES (Heb. written taḥpanēṣ, but read taḥpanḥeṣ, Jr. 2.[16]), TAHPANHES (Heb. taḥpanḥeṣ, Jr. 43.[7], 44.[1], 46.[14]), TEHAPHNEHES (Heb. tĕḥaphnĕḥēṣ, Ek. 30.[18]), a city on the frontier of Egypt, near the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, called by Herodotus Daphnæ (ii. 30, 107), where the Persians had a garrison. Though probably built before—Herodotus tells a story wh. represents T. as extant in the days of Sesostris—it became important when Psammetichus I. placed there the Greek and Carian mercenaries through whose help he had gained his kingdom (Herod. ii. 154). It is represented now by Tel Defneh; a mound, in investigating wh. Prof. Petrie found many traces of Greek occupation mingled with Egyptian antiquities. It was here that the Jewish refugees under Johanan the son of Kareah took up their abode when they fled fm. Canaan after the murder of Gedaliah. They had brought Jeremiah the prophet into Egypt with them, despite his denunciation of the emigration. He prophesied that Nebuchadnezzar shd. conquer Egp., and placed stones underground in the court of the palace (Jr. 43.[9]), and declared that there wd. Nebuchadnezzar set his throne. There has not as yet been found any evidence distinctly confirmatory of this prophesied invasion of Egypt. From the traces of conflagration in the ruins it wd. seem probable that T. had been taken by assault and plundered; but there is no evidence to fix the date at wh. this occurred.

TAHASH, AV. THAHASH, a son of Nahor (Gn. 22.[24]).

TAHATH. (1) A Levite, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Ch. 6.[24, 37]). (2) and (3) Two descendants of Ephraim (1 Ch. 7.[20]). (4) A station in the wanderings (Nu. 33.[26f.]): not identd.

TAHPENES (Heb. taḥpĕnēṣ, Gr. thekemeina), the wife of the Pharaoh who was contemporary with the end of Solomon's reign, probably one of the last monarchs of the XXI. (Tanite) dynasty. The sister of Queen T. was given as wife to Hadad, the Edomite who escaped the massacre of the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which Joab appears to have carried out with systematic ruthlessness during his six months' residence in the land (1 K. 11.[19f.]). The queen brought up his son Genubath in the palace with the sons of Pharaoh. There are signs of confusion in the LXX; it wd. seem as if there had been an attempt made to combine two narratives relating to different persons and events. The name T. has not been identified on the monuments.

TAHREA, grandson of Mephibosheth (1 Ch. 9.[41]), called "Tarea" in 1 Ch. 8.[35].

TAHTIM HODSHI, one of the places mentioned as the limits of Joab's census (2 S. 24.[6]). The text is to all appearance corrupt; the LXX (B) reads, "And they came to Galaad and to the land Thabasōn wh. is Adasai." Lucian's recension has in the critical words eis gēn Chitteim, Kadēs, "to the land of the Hittites, Kadesh"; Sym., "to the lower road"; Tg. Jn. trs. "to the land of the S. to Hodshi"; a land wh. David Kimchi confesses he doesn't know. The Psh. omits the verse. Following Lucian's reading, it is proposed by Dr. Driver and some others to amend the Heb. so as to read "to the land of the Hittites towards Kadesh," an emendation wh. seems to us improbable, as the blunders presumed to be made in MT. are hardly possible either to ear or eye, except in the square character, wh. wd. make the blunder very late indeed, too late to explain the fact that Sym. read the MT. Much better is the explanation of Thenius based on LXX, "the land of Bashan wh. is Edrei." It is certainly in the natural geographical succession to Gilead and before Dan-Iyun (Danjaan), wh. again is on the way to Sidon. Kadesh on the Orontes is too far north. The object of the census was to get the number of the fighting men of Israel, but this was beyond the bounds of Israel altogether.

TALENT (Heb. kikkār), originating in Babylon: it was divided, according to the sexagintal system, into 60 minas and 3600 shekels. In Pal. the number of shekels in the mina became 50, so the Heb. T. was equal to 3000 shekels in weight. By careful investigation, examination of weights that have been preserved, and consideration of statements with regard to the comparative values of the different standards, it has been found that the silver shekel was about a ninth less than the gold. Fm. this it follows that the talent of gold weighed nearly a hundredweight, while that of silver was about six-sevenths of that amount. The T. as money was of necessity never other than a money of account; the value of the T. of gold was on the above basis slightly over £6000, whereas that of silver was about £400. During our Lord's life on earth the Attic T. was that in use; its money value in silver wd. be slightly over £240. See Money, Weights and Measures.

TALITHA CUMI (Arm. ṭalītha qūmī; WH. give taleitha koum), prob. the ordinary words with wh. the little girl was awakened every morning (Mk. 5.[41]). The first word occurs in the Tg. Jrs. It is used of Miriam sent to watch over Moses in the ark of bulrushes. The TR. gives the correct grammatical fem. imp., but fm. passages in the Tlm. it wd. seem that in common speech there was a tendency, as in mod. Arabic, to neglect distinctions of gender in verbal form. The text in WH. may therefore represent the actual words spoken. This cannot be taken as proving that our Lord ordinarily spoke Aramaic; it only shows that He used the language of the nursery to a little girl not yet out of it.

TALMAI. (1) A clan of the sons of Anak, driven out of Hebron by Caleb (Nu. 13.[22]; Jo. 15.[14]; Jg. 1.[10]). (2) Son of Ammihud, king of Geshur, whose daughter, Maacah, was a wife of David, and mother of Absalom (2 S. 3.[3], 13.[37]; 1 Ch. 3.[2]).

TALMON, head of a family of gatekeepers in the Temple (1 Ch. 9.[17]; Ez. 2.[42]; Ne. 7.[45], 11.[19], 12.[25]), called "Tolman" in 1 Es. 5.[28] (RV.).

TAMAR, named by Ezekiel (47.[19], 48.[28]) as marking the S. boundary of Israel. It has not been identd., but must prob. be sought in the S. of Judah, near the Dead Sea. It may be the same as Tadmor (RV. "Tamar") in 1 K. 9.[18].

TAMAR. (1) The daughter-in-law of Judah, whose story is told in Gn. 38. (2) The sister of Absalom, who shared with him the distinction of being of royal parentage on both sides, their mother being the princess of Geshur. That Absalom, her uterine br., avenges the disgrace wrought by Amnon, a duty we wd. naturally associate with the father, may be due to the persistence of sentiments begotten under the matriarchate, when relationship was counted through the mother (2 S. 13.). (3) Absalom's dr. who became the w. of Rehoboam (2 S. 14.[27]; cp. LXX), poss. ident. with Maacah (1 K. 15.[2]; 2 Ch. 11.[20]). The name in Heb. signifies "palm tree." Suggesting beauty and gracefulness, it has from of old been a favourite female name in the East.

TAMARISK (RV. Heb. 'ēshel, Gn. 21.[33]; AV. "grove"; 1 S. 22.[6], AV. "tree"; 31.[13], AV. "tree"). The Heb. corresponds to the Arb. 'āthl, "tamarisk." (For "tamarisk" in Jr. 17.[6] RVm. see Heath.) Of the species of T. found in Pal. most are little more than bushes. Some, however, attain a considerable size, in the shadow of wh. one may sit. "The tamarisk" (1 S. 22.[6]) "on the height" (RVm.), was evidently a noted tree, prob. with some religious association.

TAMMUZ. When he is brought in vision to Jrs. Ezekiel sees beside the north gate of the house of the Lord "women weeping for Tammuz." The name is derived fm. the Babylonian (Sumerian) Dumuzi, the child of the goddess of fertility. This worship was imported into Phœnicia, and had its principal seat there in Gebal. In the legendary poems of Babylon T. is represented as a youthful shepherd who was beloved by Istar, but slain in his bloom by the tusk of a wild boar; she descended to Hades to secure his restoration to life. In Phœnicia he was addressed as "Adonai," fm. which the Greeks formed the name "Adonis." In Greek hands arose the myth of Aphrodite (Venus) and Adonis. The death of T. was lamented yearly in the fourth month, wh. was named fm. him. It coincided most nearly with our July. It is connected with the Osiris myth of Egypt; indeed the myth in some of its forms contained the feature that Isis found the remains of her husband Osiris at Byblus (Gebal). Some have maintained that Adonis is a sun-god; but there is a difficulty in holding this when it is remembered that the celebration took place precisely when the sun was at its strongest. This part of the myth is essential; the young Adonis is in the bloom of his early manhood when he is slain by the boar. Had there been a change in the tilt of the moon's orbit, so that formerely an eclipse of the sun occurred always in the month of July, it cd. have been understood how this might be reckoned a solar myth. Another idea is that T. is the god of vegetation, wh. the hot sun destroys. This is better, but still there is the want of any parallel to the emphasis laid in the myth on the youth of Adonis. It is true that the green herbage is all dead in Pal. and the nearer Orient by the beginning of July, indeed before that date; but the grain, the grasses, and the rest of the herbage have reached and passed maturity. It is the chosen symbol for a ripe and seasonable death, like a sheaf of corn fully ripe, "as a shock of corn cometh in in his season." Prof. Robertson Smith thought that the weeping referred to the mourning over the victim; an offshoot fm. his idea as to the origin of sacrifice. But there is no hint of sacrifice in the myth. The idea that the boar is winter, advocated by Dr. Sayce, wd. have considerable plausibility if the celebration had been held nearer that season, and if it had originated, not in Babylonia, but near the Arctic circle, where the sun is for three or four days buried beneath the horizon. It is really one of the large number of myths where a youthful god is represented as dying and being raised again. In Scandinavian mythology we have not only the death of Balder the beautiful, but also the suffering of Woden himself. The fact that the river Adonis (Nahr Ibrahīm) ran red during this particular month, fm. the marl over wh. it flowed, gave the excuse for the time of the celebration.

Tammuz (Adonis)

TANHUMETH, the father of Seraiah, who joined Gedaliah at Mizpeh (2 K. 25.[23]; Jr. 40.[8]).

TANNER. The tradesman is not mentioned by name in the OT., but that the calling was followed from early times is evident fm. such passages as Ex. 25.[5], &c. Only the tanner with whom Peter lodged at Joppa appears in the NT. (Ac. 9.[43], &c.). The work was held to be necessary, but ignoble. "A trade that had to do with unclean things, the fetor of wh. clung to the workman, was ranked very low. The tanning of skins for leather, and mining, were considered such dirty trades that a woman was allowed to divorce, not only a collector of dogs' dung who supplied the tanner with this tan, but even a tanner or miner, whether he had become what was so intolerably repulsive to her before or after their marriage, thus putting them on a level with lepers. . . . 'The world cannot exist,' says a common proverb, 'without perfumers or tanners. Well for you if you are a perfumer, woe to you if you are a tanner'! Tanyards, like middens and graves, must be at least 50 cubits without the town walls" (Delitzsch, Artisan Life in the Time of Christ, pp. 29f.). With this agrees the fact that Simon's house was on the sea-shore (Ac. 10.[6]). The higher offices in State and Temple were closed to men who followed degrading occupations. That Peter entered the house of a tanner shows that old ideas were losing their grip upon him.

TAPHATH, daughter of Solomon, and wife of Ben-Abinadab, one of the commissariat officers (1 K. 4.[11]).

TAPPUAH (Heb. tappūaḥ, "apple"). (1) An unidentd. town in the Shephelah, named with ZORAH, ZANOAH, &c. (Jo. 15.[34]). It is prob. = T. in 12.[17], wh. is named between BETHEL and HEPHER. (2) A city of Ephraim, the land belonging to wh. was assigned to Manasseh (Jo. 16.[8], 17.[8]). En Tappuah (17.[7]) was doubtless the spring near the city. It lay to the S. of MICHMETHAH. The original text in 2 K. 15.[16] (TIPHSAH) prob. referred to this district. It may be the town Taphon, fortified by Bacchides (1 M. 9.[50]). No certain identification is poss. Tristram suggests 'Atūf, N. of Wādy el-Ferrah.

TARALAH, a town in the territory of Benjamin named between Irpeel and Zelah (Jo. 18.[27]): unidentd.

TARES. The zizania of the Gr. mentioned in Mw. 13.[25], &c., corresponded with the Arb. ziwān. The plant intended is the bearded darnel, Lolium temulentum. In the earlier stages of growth it closely resembles the wheat and barley, and it reaches an equal height. Only when harvest is approaching is it easily distinguished. The pulling up is also difficult, as the roots are often entwined with those of the grain. The seeds it bears are poisonous. The peasants think that the tares are degenerate wheat.

TARPELITES, colonists placed in the cities of Samaria after the captivity of the Northern Kingdom (Ez. 4.[9]).

TARSHISH, a name personal and geographical. (1) Personal.—(a) Second son of JAVAN (Gn. 10.[4]; 1 Ch. 1.[7]). If Kittim is here taken as the eponymic ancestor of Cyprus, and if for Dodanim we shd. read Rodanim (Rhodes), then Elishah will be the personal representative of continental Greece, and T. will stand for some race further west, probably Italy. (b) Son of Bilhan and great-grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch. 7.[10]). (c) One of the seven princes of Persia (Est. 1.[14]). Cassel (Com. on Est., ad loc.) thinks the name as it now stands may be due to the tendency to assimilate the little-known to the well-known, and suggests the reading "Barshish," from wh., he says, "the Gr. name Prexaspes easily appears." Prexaspes was one of Xerxes' admirals when he invaded Greece (Herod. vii. 97). Rawlinson thinks he was son of one of the conspirators against the usurper Smerdis (Rawlinson, Herod. iv. p. 70, note 1).

(2) Geographical.—Tarshish is the name of a country or city far from Palestine. Some think that several places were so named. Bochart identd. T. with Tartessus in Spain, and mod. commentators, until recently, have generally approved. In favour of this identification is the fact that, where "Tarshish" is used to qualify "ships," LXX translates it "Carthaginian," calling the place itself "Carthage." This points distinctly to the far West. It is objected that Tartessus was not known till after the foundation of Carthage, i.e. about a century after Solomon. But surely the Phœnician emigrants would choose the site of their colony in the light of knowledge gained in commercial intercourse with the western shores of the Mediterranean. Sir W. M. Ramsay would identify T. with TARSUS, in this agreeing with the Jewish commentators. The "ships of Tarshish" might have been named from their place of origin, and not from their destination. The forests clothing the Taurus range would afford abundant material for shipbuilding. "Ships of Tarshish" might then be = "ships of Tarsus." On the other hand the commerce of Tarsus does not seem to have required, as did that of Phœnicia, large sea-going craft. Dr. W. Max Müller would identify T. with Etruria. So far as Heb. views of geography are concerned this is plausible enough. Ceylon and Southern Africa have also had their advocates. If we consider the port of starting, and the ancient method of voyaging along the coast, neither can be called impossible.

The most important passage is the first chapter of Jonah. The prophet embarked at Joppa: his destination, therefore, was on the Mediterranean coast; but clearly no point from which Nineveh was as easily accessible as it was fm. Pal. This rules out Tarsus, and all places to the south or east. It might, however, have been either Tartessus or the Tyrrhenian coast.

Solomon's navy, manned by Tyrian seamen, is said to have consisted of "ships of Tarshish" (1 K. 10.[22]), as also that of Jehoshaphat (22.[48]). Their destination was Ophir (1 K. 9.[28], 10.[11]; 1 Ch. 8.[13]; cp. 1 K. 22.[48]). In 2 Ch. 9.[21] only it is said that the ships went to Tarshish. This might easily be an error made by a scribe. If it denoted either a city in the district of Ophir, or the district in which Ophir lay, no trace of the name has been discovered, nor of any name for which it might be mistaken.

In Ps. 72.[10] "T. and the isles" evidently stands for the West, and "Sheba and Seba" for the East. Is. 23.[10f.] shows that T. was far away across the sea. Jeremiah speaks of plates of silver brought from T. Polybius (quoted by Strabo) tells of silver mines near Carthagena, furnishing employment for 40,000 workmen. We hear of no extensive silver mines near Tarsus. A southern site for T. might in some respects agree with Ek. 38.[13]; but as T. there contemplates the raid of Gog, a northern site might suit better.

No certain decision is possible. The balance of evidence favours a western T. with which trade was conducted in large ships. These may have been called "ships of T." in distinction from the smaller vessels engaged in the coasting trade. The name may then have been applied to any large ships employed in distant commerce. There is also the possibility that some place in the East, reached by vessels sailing from Ezion-Geber, bore this, or a similar name. On the other hand, with their dim and confused notions of maritime affairs, Tarshish to the Jews may have signified in some vague way the destination of all large vessels going on distant voyages.

TARSUS. The best and fullest account of Tarsus is found in Sir William M. Ramsay's The Cities of St. Paul, pp. 85ff., to wh. the present writer is mainly indebted for the material used in this article. Tarsus, represented to-day by the mod. Tersûs, lay on the river Cydnus in the Cilician plain, 70 to 80 feet above sea level, and ten miles from the coast. The summits of the Tarsus range throw themselves into the sky some thirty miles away, but their lower slopes touch the plain only about two miles N. of the city. At a distance of about ten miles the Tarsians built a second city in these uplands. It stood upon the great road leading to the Cilician Gates. It was strongly fortified, and occupied by a garrison. The city in the plain can never have been salubrious. From the heat and moisture a welcome retreat was furnished by the city in the hills, wh., serving as a sanatorium and pleasant resort, preserved the health and energies of the Tarsians. No doubt in Roman times the flat country was well drained and cultivated, and healthier than it is in its present neglected condition. Including the inhabitants of the city in the hills, the Tarsians may then have numbered about 500,000.

ANCIENT GATEWAY BETWEEN ANTIOCH AND TARSUS

In ancient times the three main centres of population and influence in the Cilician plain were Mallos, Adana, and Tarsus. Mallos lay on the river Pyramus, a short distance from its mouth, and was alone on the coast of Cilicia in possessing an excellent harbour with easy access fm. the sea. Its one means of communication with the interior was the road leading through Adana. Adana, while kept in easy contact with inland markets by means of the great road, had no outlet to the sea save by the harbour of Mallos, the river Sarus, on wh. it stood, being navigable only in the reaches near the city. Her river furnished Tarsus with a highway for her maritime trade, her distance from the river's mouth making for security in the days of peril from pirates. The excellent waggon road to the interior through the Cilician Gates, gave her a great advantage over those using the ancient track running northward by way of Adana. This helps to explain how Tarsus came to outdistance her rivals.

The glory of Tarsus was the river, wh. originally flowed thro' the centre of the city. Owing to floods wh. did great damage to the city the emperor Justinian had a connection made between the river and a watercourse that ran past the city on the east. Gradually all the water flowed in this direction, and the ancient bed through the town has long been dry. In former times the river flowed into a lake five or six miles below Tarsus, wh., as the name "Rhegma" shows, must once have been a lagoon. A belt of sand dunes protected it from the sea. The lake was formed into a splendid harbour, and by deepening the river it was made possible for ships of lighter draught to go all the way to the city. This great engineering feat was accomplished at some unknown time in the past. The like is true of the astonishing enterprise by wh. a way was cut with chisel and hammer through the rocks of the Taurus mountains —the famous pass of the Cilician Gates. These achievements cast light on the spirit and energy of the inhabitants, which gave Tarsus a position to justify St. Paul's patriotic pride in it as "no mean city" (Ac. 21.[39]).

Sir Wm. Ramsay (Cities of St. Paul, pp. 116ff.) argues for the identification of Tarsus with TARSHISH. The name occurs in Gn. 10.[4f.] along with KITTIM and DODANIM as "sons of Javan," i.e. "Ionians." The former is Cyprus, and the latter, wh. we shd. read Rodanim, stands for Rhodes. One naturally looks for Tarshish nearer to these than Spain. The change in the name by transliteration is easily explained. The absence of tin, however, in Asia Minor, wh. was one of the staple exports of Tarshish (Ek. 27.[12]; Jr. 10.[9]), is a difficulty. If the identification is accepted it shows that Tarsus has retained its name, practically unaltered, for about 6000 years. Of the earliest history of Tarsus practically nothing is known. It was prob. a city of some importance before the coming of the Ionians. The Greeks, according to their wont, would mingle with the native Oriental population, and strengthen their position by friendly trade relationships. The dominance of the Greeks was succeeded by a period of greater Oriental influence. This was inaugurated by Shalmaneser's capture of the city about the middle of the ninth century B.C., referred to on the Black Obelisk (see illustration to JEHU). Native kings ruled in Cilicia under the suzerainty of Persia until B.C. 401, when Xenophon found one Syennesis reigning in Tarsus. In B.C. 334 Alexander the Great found a Persian officer in direct control. Alexander's advent marked the beginning of a new Greek ascendency. Tarsus was evidently regarded as more Oriental than Greek, and was not granted autonomy. It remained for a time under the Greek Seleucid kings of Syria. Prob. under Antiochus IV., Epiphanes (B.C. 175–164), it was reorganised as an autonomous city, with the name Antiocheia-on-the-Cydnus. This name disappeared with the death of Antiochus. Under the new arrangement Tarsus received more honourable treatment than any other city in Cilicia. "The Tarsus of St. Paul dates in a very real sense from the re-foundation by Antiochus Epiphanes." It was a Greek city-state, managing its own internal affairs, but in other respects, such as its foreign relations, subject to the government of the Seleucid empire. According to Dion Chrysostom, Strabo, and Stephanus, the Greek settlers in Tarsus were "colonists of the Argives." The title demiourgos, applied to their chief magistrate, shows that the population was mainly Dorian. To flatter their pride of antiquity they claimed to be the children of the Argives who went with Triptolemus in search of Io, who, by the jealous anger of Hera, had been turned into a cow. They also, however, declared "that Tarsus was the foundation of Sardanapalos, and an old Oriental city." This may be a reference to the reconstitution by Shalmaneser.

There was a considerable Jewish population in Tarsus. It appears certain that as a whole they enjoyed the rights of citizenship. St. Paul claims to be a citizen (Ac. 21.[39]). This he could be only if enrolled in one of the tribes into which the community was organised. For religious reasons he could not be a member of a Greek or heathen tribe. There was, therefore, a Jewish tribe to which his family belonged; the rights of citizenship passing from father to son. It is prob. that they were introduced by Antiochus Epiphanes at the time of the re-foundation. The presence of Jews was held to make for prosperity, because of their skill in trade and commerce.

COIN OF TARSUS (HADRIAN)

With the decline of the Seleucid empire came a revival of Oriental influence in Cilicia, a leading part being played by Mithridates, king of Pontus. About A.D. 83 the hordes of Tigranes, king of Armenia, swept over the country, and it seems certain that Tarsus fell into his hands. Experience of this barbarian's power was bound to provoke a reaction favourable to the western spirit, and to Hellenism, which it was the wise policy of Rome to promote.

The Cilician plain was not included in the province of Cilicia, wh., when first instituted (B.C. 104), was designed to check the pirates of Cilicia Tracheia. Pompey (B.C. 65–4) freed the country from Oriental dominance and reorganised it. In B.C. 47 it was visited by Julius Cæsar, who won the affection and trust of the Tarsians. They called their city Juliopolis, and afterwards favoured his nephew Augustus for his sake. The Triumvir Antony came to Tarsus in B.C. 42, and here took place his meeting with Cleopatra, who sailed up the Cydnus to the city in her magnificent galley. The privileges bestowed on the city by Antony were afterwards confirmed by Augustus. Under Antony the municipal government had become utterly corrupt, being manipulated in his own interest by one Boethos, described by Strabo as "bad poet, bad citizen." To Athenodorus, a citizen of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, teacher of the youthful Augustus at Apollonia, who retained much influence with his pupil after he assumed the imperial purple, the emperor entrusted the duty of reform. He banished Boethos and his corrupt gang, and revolutionised the constitution of the city. Under his influence also the university of Tarsus became an important centre of learning and philosophy. Close as the relations were between the municipality and the university, the citizens were proud of its high repute. Athenodorus was still alive in A.D. 7. Among the younger generation wholesome interest in athletics was stimulated by the public games.

Probably the Romans leaned more upon the Jewish than the Greek element in the population. Subjection to authority is more natural to the Oriental mind; and the Jews knew that their safety and prosperity depended on the good will of their benefactors. On the other hand, the importance attached by the Greeks to individual rights and liberties was not favourable to settled and steady government. It is to be observed, however, that in Tarsus, more than in any other Asiatic city, there was preserved a fairly harmonious balance between the Hellenistic and Asiatic elements.

The religion of Tarsus bore traces of Ionian, Assyrian, and Persian influences, the foundation of the Hellenic Tarsus (c. B.C. 170) tending to change the aspect rather than the nature of the state worship. The Greeks readily identified their gods with those of the Tarsians, and fell in with their religious practices. The religion of the Jews kept them apart; but upon a certain circle it exercised a wholesome influence. The supreme deity is represented as sitting like the Greek Zeus, an upright sceptre in his left hand, and in his right, objects wh. vary at different times, e.g. an ear of corn, a bunch of grapes, or a figure of Victory. He was connected with the old Anatolian peasant-god, whose gifts to mankind are the fruits of the year. Subordinate to him was a young and active deity, the "working-god," who is figured on the coins as standing on a winged and horned lion, fully armed, with a branch or flower in his right hand. He was identified with Heracles by the Greeks. He represents the youthful deity of ancient Anatolia, who is figured on a rock wall at Bogaz-Keui. The old Ionian Apollo also seems to be brought into relation with the native god Perseus.

Our interest in Tarsus centres in the fact that it was the native city of St. Paul, the greatest personality of the Christian centuries. Its influence in moulding and training the future apostle of the Gentiles was manifold. To interpret with sympathetic comprehension the perfected faith of Israel he must indeed be a son of Abraham. In Tarsus he was brought into vital contact with the Western as well as the Oriental spirit and ideas. The city stimulated his love of learning, and furnished opportunities for its pursuit. Its easy communication with the great world gave breadth to his outlook. His citizenship of Tarsus and of Rome help to explain the imperial range of his thought and plans. His intimate acquaintance with the religion of Tarsus enabled him to distinguish the elements of good to be found in even the most degraded forms of religion. That this Jew was able effectively to present the Gospel to Asiatic and European alike, to learned and simple, to the proud Romans and the humblest of subject peoples, was due, in the providence of God, to his birth and training as a citizen of Tarsus.

TARTAK, a deity that, along with NIBHAZ, was "made" (i.e. the idol was "made") to be worshipped by the Avites (2 K. 17.[31]). It is impossible to identify the deity intended. We cannot be sure what race is meant by the Avites, or where their original seats were; consequently we have no knowledge of their worship. We cannot be sure that we have the correct form of the name, as the Jews had such a mania for distorting the designations of heathen deities. The assertion that T. was worshipped under the form of an ass is to be dismissed as fabulous.

TARTAN (2 K. 18.[17]; Is. 20.[1]), an Assyrian official, next in dignity to the king, apparently nearly equivalent to our commander-in-chief. There were at least two of these. They were sometimes distinguished as Tartannu rabu, "the great T.," and Tartannu sanu, "the second T.," and sometimes Tartannu imni, "the T. of the right hand," and Tartannu sumeli, "the T. of the left hand." It is thought that the two Tartans mentioned in Scripture can be identified. The T. sent by Sargon to conquer Ashdod (Is. 20.[1]) was probably Asshur-iska-udannin; and the T. who accompanied Rabshakeh to Jrs. was called Bel-emuranni (2 K. 18.[17]). It is to be observed that, though in the negotiations the Rabshakeh is the chief speaker, the Tartan is the first-named of the officials sent, this indicating his superior rank.

TATNAI, RV. TATTENAI, satrap of the province W. of the Euphrates, under the Persian Darias Hystaspis (Ez. 5.[3], &c.). He prob. corresponds to the Ushtanni of the cuneiform inscription, satrap of Ebir Nāri, evidently = Heb. 'abar naharā, rendered " beyond the river." It included Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia.

TAVERNS, THE THREE, the second station on the Appian Way, at wh. St. Paul was met by believers fm. Rome while journeying thither fm. Puteoli (Ac. 28.[15]). Cicero, in a letter to Atticus (ii. 12), mentions that when he had emerged fm. the road fm. Antium into the Appian Way he met Curio at the Three Taverns. According to the Antonine Itinerary it was 33 miles fm. Rome; it most nearly coincides with the modern village of Cisterna.

TAXES. The law of Israel sanctioned certain payments in money and in kind to be made by the people for support of religious ordinances, and maintenance of the priests (see FIRST-FRUITS, TITHES, &c.), but not taxes in our sense, to furnish revenue for the government. A direct tax was levied by Menahem that he might with the proceeds purchase the friendship and support of Pul, king of Assyria (2 K. 15.[20]). Jehoiakim also taxed Judah that he might meet the demands of Pharaoh-necoh (23.[35]); see TRIBUTE. The taxing of Lk. 2.[1], &c., and Ac. 5.[37] was an " enrolment " (RV.) or " registration." As a subject people the Jews paid taxes to the Persian kings after the Exile (Ez. 4.[13], &c.). For a time, under the Maccabæan régime, they were delivered from the humiliation of paying taxes to a foreign power. But with the advent of the Romans the burden was once more fixed upon their necks. For the taxes levied by the Romans and their method of collecting them see PUBLICAN.

TEACHER. For education see SCHOOL, SCHOOLMASTER. In its original sense tōrāh, the name applied to the Pentateuch, and commonly taken as equivalent to " law," means " instruction " or " direction." It was the utterance of one who gave counsel, or " taught " (yārāh) the people the mind and will of God. Under this higher sense of " teacher " falls the prophet in OT. times (Ex. 24.[12], &c.). Thus the strangers settled by the Assyrians in Samaria required one to teach them how they should fear the Lord (2 K. 17.[27f.]). In Israel it was the duty of the Levites to give instruction as to the requirements of the Divine law (Dt. 17.[11], 24.[8]; 2 Ch. 15.[3]). The duty was one for wh. it was a disgrace to accept payment (Mi. 3.[11]). After the Exile the function of the teacher was more definitely to read and explain to the people the written law. The Hebrew of the Scriptures was no longer the spoken language, and in reading it was necessary to render it into Aramaic; or at least to give the sense in that tongue. The teacher was therefore now not one who brought a message he himself had received direct from God, but a student and exponent of what had been given by others fixed and written. He had care of the written law, of which he made copies; hence perhaps the name " scribe," by wh. he came to be known (see SCRIBES). Men of other than Levitical descent could undertake this work, and it gradually passed into the hands of a class distinct from the priests, whose influence and authority became less in proportion as the people were instructed in the mysteries of the faith. The scribes became the true leaders of the people, and the synagogues became the centres of the popular religion: the priests being limited more and more to the Temple services, and the management of the great national feasts. These " teachers " bore the honourable title of Rabbi (Mw. 23.[7]). It is significant of their position and power that Jesus calls Nicodemus " the teacher (ὁ διδάσκαλος) of Isr." (Jn. 3.[10] RV.).

In the NT. there is a sense in wh. the missionaries of the new faith are all " teachers." They are to " teach all nations," to " make disciples " of them (Mw. 28.[19]), making known to them the good news of the Gospel, following the example of the great Teacher. With the growth of the Church, however, we find that the " teacher " is distinguished from the apostle, prophet, pastor, and evangelist (1 Cor. 12.[28]; Eph. 4.[11]). The apostles, indeed, exercised all the functions indicated by these names. The prophet may be distinguished as one who preaches for edification; the pastor as one who " shepherds " the flock; the evangelist as the agent specially in presenting the Gospel to the unconverted; and the teacher as the instructor of converts. The titles were prob. never intended to indicate entirely distinct persons, as if one could not at different times exercise different functions. Thus we find that the " bishop," or " elder," must be " apt to teach " (1 Tm. 3.[2]). Elders who rule well, and " labour in the word and in teaching " (1 Tm. 5.[17]), are " worthy of double honour." Teachers who pandered to the depraved tastes of their hearers were in ill repute (2 Tm. 4.[3]). It is poss. that the Didache, The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, was intended for the use of teachers in sub-apostolic times.

TEBAH, a son of Nahor the br. of Abraham (Gn. 22.[24]).

TEBALIAH, son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite, one of the gatekeepers of the Tabernacle in David's time (1 Ch. 26.[11]).

TEBETH (Est. 2.[16]), the tenth Babylonian month, nearly equivalent to our January (see YEAR). Esther was taken into the harem of Ahasuerus on the 10th of this month.

TEHAPHNEHES, a variant of TAHPANHES (Ek. 30.[18]).

TEHINNAH, the founder of the city of Nahash ('īr nāḥāsh, 1 Ch. 4.[12]).

TEIL TREE (Heb. 'ēlāh) is correctly given as "terebinth" in RV. It is one of the trees from the roots of which, even when the stem is cut down, new shoots will spring (Is. 6.[13]).

TEKEL. See UPHARSIN.

TEKOA, TEKOAH, a town in the territory of Judah, represented by the mod. Khirbet Teqū'a. The ruins are extensive, and crown a hill about five miles to the S. of Bethlehem, commanding a wide view of the uplands. It stands on the edge of the wilderness which stretches eastward to the Dead Sea, called "the wilderness of Tekoa" (2 Ch. 20.[20]). The LXX, but not the Hebrew, of Jo. 15.[59] gives Tekoah as one of the cities of Judah. In 1 Ch. 2.[24], 4.[5], Ashur, half-brother of Caleb, is called the "father of T.," by wh. we may understand that he founded the city. From T. came certain of David's heroes (2 S. 23.[26]; 1 Ch. 11.[28], 27.[9]). It was one of the cities fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[6]). Its position on the border of the desert lent it considerable importance, and its defences were evidently long maintained (Jr. 6.[1]). Tekoa was the home of the wise woman, whom Joab used to persuade the king that Absalom shd. be recalled from his banishment (2 S. 14.[2], &c.). Here also dwelt the prophet AMOS, who was one of the herdsmen tending the flocks of the town in the wilderness pastures. In the wilderness of Tekoa Jehoshaphat inflicted crushing defeat upon the Ammonites and their allies (2 Ch. 20.[20ff.]). The "nobles" or chiefs of Tekoa proudly refused to assist in repairing the defences of Jrs., but the humbler people did their share (Ne. 3.[5, 27]). From Bacchides the Maccabees, Jonathan and Simon, took refuge in the wilderness of Tekoa, pitching their tents at the pool of Asphar (1 M. 9.[33]). An old story tells that Nathaniel was born in Bethlehem. He was saved from Herod's slaughter by his mother hiding him under a fig tree —a reminiscence of Jn. 1.[48]—after wh. he escaped to Tekoa. In the twelfth cent. the tomb of Amos was shown in a cave. In 1138 T. was raided and sacked by a band of Turks, the inhabitants finding asylum in the cave of Khareitūn.

The ruins include the remains of a square tower strongly situated, and the remains of a Greek church, with baptismal font of rose-coloured limestone. Numerous cisterns are found cut in the rock. The caves in the neighbourhood are used as shelters for sheep.

TEL-ABIB. A place on the Chebar where Ezekiel (3.[15]) visited the captives and stayed with them a week. The name in Heb. signifies "hill of corn." It probably corresponds to the Asyr. til abubi, a mound thrown up by a flood, of which many examples are found in Babylonia. The site is unidentd.

TELAH, an Ephraimite, ancestor of Joshua (1 Ch. 7.[25]).

TELAIM, named only in 1 S. 15.[4] as the place of assembling and numbering of Saul's troops preparatory to his attack on Amalek. Both LXX and Jos. (Ant. VI. vii. 2) give Gilgal, instead of Telaim. It would not be inappropriate that he should set out from that ancient sanctuary on his enterprise; but its position in the Jordan valley certainly made it inconvenient. Perhaps, with Sir Charles Wilson (HDB.), we should identify T. with TELEM (Jo. 15.[24]), in the S. of Judah, a convenient point of departure.

TELASSAR (Is. 37.[12]), THELASAR (2 K. 19.[12]; Heb. tĕla'ssār, and tĕlassār). A city claimed by SENNACHERIB in his letters to HEZEKIAH to have been conquered by his predecessors despite the aid of the gods of its inhabitants. There is a peculiarity in the statement in regard to T. wh. has to be noted; in the other cases the city alone is named, as if the inhabitants naturally were implied in their abode; but here the inhabitants are mentioned separately, as if the city were not their first or natural dwelling-place. These inhabitants are called "the children of EREK." They have been identified by Schrader (COT. ii. p. 11, Eng. tr.) with the Bīt Adini of the inscriptions, a nation inhabiting the region S. of Orfa (Edessa), in Northern Mesopotamia, and occupying a tract of territory to the W. of the Euphrates as well; this race was only subdued after a severe and prolonged conflict by Asshur-nazir-pal. The probable history of subsequent events wd. seem to be that the leaders of the resistance to the Assyrian domination wd. be removed to some place at such a distance fm. their original seats as seemed to preclude the possibility of interference with the process of pacification. T. has been identified with Til-Asshuri, a place referred to in the monuments as in the neighbourhood of Babylon. It was conquered by Tiglath-pileser; thus if transferred thither "the children of Eden" wd. be distant 700 miles fm. their former homes. These colonists fm. Northern Mesopotamia appear to have revolted, and trusted in their gods that they wd. be delivered fm. the power of Assyria, but trusted in vain. The struggle must have been one of some severity or it wd. not have been singled out for record by Sennacherib on this occasion.

TELEM. (1) A city of Judah named with Ziph and Bealoth (Jo. 15.[24]), poss. ident. with TELAIM. According to LXX (2 S. 3.[12]), Abner sent his messengers to David at "Thelam," poss. the same place. Sir C. Wilson (HDB.) finds a trace of the name in that of the Dhallām Arabs, to the S. of Tell el-Milḥ (Moladah), but the site has not been discovered. (2) A Temple gatekeeper who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[24]), called "Tolbanes" in 1 Es. 9.[25]: possibly identical with TALMON (Ne. 12.[25]).

TEL-HARESHA, TEL-HARSA, RV. TEL-

HARSHA, a town in Babylonia, whence after the Captivity certain families of Jews returned to Judæa, who were not able to prove their descent from Israelitish stock, their genealogical registers prob. having been lost during the Exile (Ez. 2.[59]; Ne. 7.[61]) : unidentd.

TEL-MELAH, a Babylonian town whence Jews in the same case with those from TEL-HARSHA went back to Judæa (Ez. 2.[59]; Ne. 7.[61]) : also unidentd.

TEMA, a son of Ishmael (Gn. 25.[15]; 1 Ch. 1.[30]), progenitor of a tribe in N. Arabia bearing his name, wh. is preserved in the mod. Teimā, an oasis c. 40 miles S. of Dumat el-Jandal (Dumah), and c. 200 miles N. of Medina, on an ancient road leading from the Gulf of 'Aqaba to the Persian Gulf. The inhabitants would naturally be engaged in the caravan trade (Jb. 6.[19]). Their command of the oasis wells enabled them to befriend the thirsty travellers from the desert (Is. 21.[14]). The ruins of the ancient city wall, three miles in circuit, are still traced. For description see Doughty, Arabia Deserta, i. 285. An Aramaic stele found recently, dating from the sixth cent. B.C., betrays the influence of Assyrian art; and furnishes evidence of a much older civilisation. The place is also mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions.

TEMAH. See THAMAH.

TEMAN, son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau (Gn. 36.[11, 15]; 1 Ch. 1.[36]), reputed ancestor of a tribe inhabiting a district in Edom (O. [8f.]). It is named by Amos (1.[12]) along with the capital, Bozrah, and in Ek. 25.[13] it is placed over against Dedan, wh. lay to the S. T. is therefore to be sought in the N. of Edom. OEJ. speaks of a vill. with this name, wh. Eusebius places 15, and Jerome 10 Rm. miles from Petra. Unfortunately the direction is not indicated by either. The inhabitants were celebrated for their wisdom (Jr. 49.[7], &c.). Eliphaz, one of Job's friends, was a native of T. (Jb. 2.[11], &c.). Up to the present no trace has been found of this town, wh. was clearly one of some importance.

TEMENI, an Asherite, father of Tekoa (1 Ch. 4.[6]).

TEMPLE. The Heb. word hēkāl, wh. in OT. is rendered "temple" (2 K. 23.[4], &c.), when it refers to the residence of a king, is rightly trd. "palace" (1 K. 21.[1], &c.) The idea of a royal residence is also present in the name as applied to the Temple in Jerusalem, wh. is regarded as the dwelling-place of God, conceived as King (Is. 6.[1], &c.). Sometimes the word denotes only the fore part of the temple building, "the Holy Place" as distinguished from "the Holy of Holies" (1 K. 6.[17]; Ek. 41.[1]). The most common designation of the Temple is "the house" (of the Lord, or of God), which may mean the Temple building alone, as in 1 K. 6.[1, 2]; but it may also denote the whole sanctuary, including the court or courts (2 K. 19.[1, 14], &c.). To go "into the house of the Lord" (2 K. 19.[1]), therefore, does not necessarily mean to enter the Temple building. The word "sanctuary" (Heb. miqdāsh), also meaning the whole sacred place, occurs rarely (1 Ch. 22.[19]; 2 Ch. 36.[17], "house of the sanctuary"). In late Hebrew hēkāl, "palace," was the usual expression for the Temple building; bēt ham-miqdāsh, "house of the sanctuary," for the whole sacred place. In accord with this usage, in NT. ναός always denotes the Temple building, and ἱερόν the whole sanctuary. RV. renders both alike "temple" (Lk. 1.[9] [ναός]; Ac. 2.[27] [ἱερόν]), with "sanctuary" in the margin where ναός is used, altho' this would be the exact rendering of ἱερόν.

There were temples of the Lord before the time of Solomon, e.g. the temple (hēkāl) at Shiloh with doors (1 S. 1.[9], 3.[15]), and an inner recess where Samuel slept near the ark of God (3.[3]). The law also makes mention of the "house of the Lord" (Ex. 23.[19], 34.[26]). David, however, placed the ark of the Lord in a tent (2 S. 6.[17]), and was taught by Nathan the prophet that God did not wish a house to dwell in (2 S. 7.[5-7]). With his new royal residence north of the City of David (see JERUSALEM), Solomon thought it proper to combine a sanctuary equal to it in royal splendour. Mount Zion should be God's fixed and final abode; and there Israel's God and David's dynasty should appear in an indissoluble alliance. The particular site of the sanctuary was the threshing-floor of Ornan (or Araunah) the Jebusite (2 Ch. 3.[1]), which David bought from him in order to build an altar there, according to the directions of the prophet Gad (2 S. 24.[18, 25]). It was not an ancient place of worship, but it was hallowed by the appearance of the angel of the Lord (2 S. 24.[16]), and it was occupied by the Lord when His ark was moved into its "oracle" (1 K. 8.[6, 10, 11]).

(1) The Temple of Solomon (1. K. 6., 7.[13-51]; 2 Ch. 3., 4; cp. 2 K. 25.[13-17]; Jr. 52.[17-23]). The Tyrians who built David's palace on Zion (2 S. 5.[11]) are mentioned only as supplying and preparing materials for the Temple. All work in brass, however, is ascribed to the Tyrian Hiram (1 K. 7.[13ff.]), and skilled artificers' work of every description (2 Ch. 2.[12ff.]). According to 1 Ch. 28.[11-19], the exact plan of the building was drawn by David, guided by a "writing from the hand of the Lord."

In front of the Temple was a porch, 20 cubits in length and 10 in breadth. The entrance was supported by two pillars of brass (see below). The porch could not have been higher, but rather lower than the Temple. 2 Ch. 3.[4] gives its height as 120 cubits, wh. should perhaps be reduced to 20. This led into the fore part of the building, the "palace" (see above), 20 cubits by 40, and this again to the "hindmost chamber" (Heb. debīr; RV. erroneously, "the oracle"), 20 cubits by 20.

The height of the house was 30 cubits; that of the debīr, 20. If this be correct (wh. is doubtful), we must assume that there was an upper room over the debīr. With the exception of the porch, the house was surrounded by an annexe of "side chambers," in three storeys, each of five cubits in height. The breadth of these chambers varied from five to seven cubits. In order that the beams forming the roofs and floors of these chambers might not be let into the Temple wall, a rebatement of a cubit was made in the wall at the height of each storey, and on this the beams rested. Thus the chambers of the first storey were five, those of the second six, and those of the third seven, cubits in breadth. The number of these side rooms, in which were placed the stores and treasures of the sanctuary, is unknown. One door on the south side gave entrance to all. The storeys seem to have been connected only by apertures in the floors (and ladders). Windows, covered by lintels, and filled in with perforated slabs of stone (so we must understand 1 K. 6.[4]), served rather for ventilation than for light. These side chambers were protected by the holiness of the Temple which they surrounded, while they protected the Temple from unholy eyes and rapacious hands. The whole building was covered with cedar beams brought from the Lebanon; the roofs consequently were flat, and had the usual covering of plaster. In the interior the walls of the main building were lined with cedar boards, and the floors were laid with boards of cypress (RV. "fir"). Not to see a stone inside the house was the luxury of a royal palace (2 S. 7.[2]; 1 K. 7.[7f.]). Wood was regarded as a costly substitute for common plaster, making the house warm in winter, and affording easy opportunity to adorn the walls with paintings and carving. Here upon the wood-work, according to 1 K. 6.[18], were carved apples of colocynth, and garlands of flowers. Cherubim also, and figures of palm trees, are mentioned (6.[29]). The statement that all these walls and floors were overlaid with gold (6.[22, 30]) is perhaps a later addition. Afterwards, perhaps by a king before Hezekiah, the doors and door-posts were gilded (2 K. 18.[16], text doubtful). In the debīr was placed the ark of the Lord, over which kept watch two cherubs, made from the wood of the "oil tree" (perhaps "fir"). Their wings, outspread, met in the middle, and touched the wall on either side (6.[27]). Thus they barred the way to the place of the Lord's manifestation on the ark behind them. This does not quite correspond to the description given in chap. 8.[6f.] (cp. Ex. 25.[20]), where the wings seem to cover the ark from above. The staves, memorials of the ark's times of wandering, remained in their places (8.[8]; cp. Ex. 25.[15]). The ark stood with its broad side towards the front, so that the ends of the staves could be seen only by one standing at the door of the debīr. The entrance to the debīr was pentagonal in form; i.e. it was topped by a gable (EV. wrongly "a fifth part of the wall," 6.[31]). The two doors were of wood of the oil tree. A veil is mentioned only in 2 Ch. 3.[14]; it may belong to the post-exilic Temple. The golden chains drawn "before the debīr" may have served for the more secure closing of the doors. The wall between the debīr and the "palace" is not mentioned. It may have consisted of cedar leaves; it was therefore unnecessary to speak of door-posts. These are mentioned in connection with the rectangular entrance to the "palace" as being of "oil wood," the doors being made of cypress. Owing to the width of this entrance each of the two doors was divided into two valves, moving on hinges. This made the opening easier, and the doors could be folded against the posts. In chap. 6.[21f.] only one piece of furniture is assigned to the "palace," namely, an altar of cedar wood, which may be the table of bloodless offerings (cp. Ek. 41.[22]). In chap. 7.[48f.] an altar, a table, and ten candlesticks, all of gold, are mentioned.

Works of art were the pillars supporting the porch, cast in brass, 18 cubits high and 12 cubits in circumference, having therefore a diameter of $3\frac{8}{11}$ cubits (cp. 7.[19], "four cubits"). The capitals, five cubits high, were formed like lilies. They were each surrounded by a network of brass (for "seven," which occurs twice in 7.[17], read "one net"), and two rows of pomegranates fixed upon four points. The form reminds us of a capital found at Khorsabad, with two rows of ornamental bows, the lower inverted, surrounding the capital like festoons. The idea of the capital was that of a basket shaped like a lily, with garlands of fruit. Some think that these pillars stood free, but in 7.[15, 19, 21] they appear as part of the porch (cp. Ek. 40.[49]). That on the south was called Boaz (perhaps originally "Baal"), that on the north Jachin (that is, "he establishes"), the names suggesting the Lord's almighty power to sustain His people.

The Temple building was surrounded by the inner court (1 K. 6.[37], 7.[12]), as distinguished from the outer or great court, wh. belonged to the royal residence (see JERUSALEM). The wall of the court was built in layers, each consisting of three rows of stones and one of cedar beams, an ancient method of strengthening walls. Solomon erected in the court an altar of brass (8.[64], 9.[25]; cp. 2 K. 16.[14f.]), the exact measurements of wh. cannot be determined. 2 Ch. 4.[1] gives the breadth as 20 cubits, and the height as 10. To the south of this stood the brazen "sea," a basin of 30 cubits circumference, and 10 cubits in diameter at the brim, and 5 cubits deep. It was adorned by two belts of colocynths running round it, probably under the brim. It stood on twelve oxen of brass. It was said to contain about 2000 baths (about 16,000 gallons). If the sides were perpendicular its capacity could have been only about 1000 baths. But it probably bulged out considerably. The "sea" was for the priests to wash their hands and feet (2 Ch. 4.[6]; cp. Ex. 30.[19]). According to Eastern custom the washing could not be done in it. The water for this purpose must have been drawn off by means of spouts such as are mentioned in connection with the laver in the second Temple. While the "sea" was fixed in its position, ten movable basins on wheels were placed, five on each side of the altar, and in them were washed such things as belonged to the burnt-offering (2 Ch. 4.[6]; cp. Lv. 1.[9, 13]; Ek. 40.[38]; Tam. iv. 2; Midd. v.). Each basin was set upon a base four cubits in length and breadth, and three in height, with four wheels $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits in diameter, and a ring of half a cubit high on the top to support the basin. The basin was four cubits in diameter, with a capacity of forty baths. Four shoulder-pieces (EV. "undersetters") at the four corners kept the basin in position. The whole was made of brass. The borders and ledges of the base, which was a frame rather than a box, were adorned with lions, oxen, and festoons, perhaps also with cherubs and palmetti. The weight of a basin filled with water, together with its base, has been estimated at about 68 hundredweights. This would mean that the basins were practically immovable, and were only intended to symbolise the rain-clouds, as the "sea" symbolised the ocean. But the presence of water in the sanctuary, at the place where the sacrifices were prepared, was indispensable. Here also the water must have been drawn off by spouts. The great weight suggests that the measurements given may be exaggerated. It is difficult also to understand how the "sea," a single casting, weighing about 15 tons, could have been transported to Jerusalem, from the place of founding in the Jordan valley.

The position of the Temple building was certainly never changed till its final destruction; and on the whole, the inner court of the last Temple must have corresponded to the court of the time of Solomon, since it was important to know exactly how far the full holiness of the Sanctuary extended (cp. Zeb. v. 3, 5; Eduj. viii. 6). It was known that certain buildings wh. opened upon this court only partially belonged to holy ground (Maas. shani, iii. 8; Tos. Maas. sh. ii. 13, 15; Midd. i. 6; Bab. Zeb. 56a; Bab. Jom. 25a). In the Temple building the exact boundary was assumed to be the interior side of the wall enclosing the court (Eduj. viii. 6). The sacred rock of the present Ḥaram, as the highest point of the area, may represent the site of the altar, that is, the centre of Solomon's inner court. Then the western and southern edges of the present higher platform of the Ḥaram may approximately correspond to the boundaries of Solomon's sanctuary. Towards the east and north, however, the present area is probably considerably wider. The north end may rather mark the northern boundary of Solomon's great court. We do not know when the part of the great court in front of the Sanctuary was added to its precincts. Two courts are mentioned in the time of Manasseh (2 K. 21.[5]; cp. 23.[12]). The second is called the "new court" (2 Ch. 20.[5]), the "outer court" (Ek. 10.[5]), the "great court" (2 Ch 4.[9]). The first is the "inner court" (1 K. 6.[36], 7.[12]; Ek. 8.[16]), the "upper court" (Jr. 36.[10]), the "court of the priests" (2 Ch. 4.[9]). From the inner court a gate led to the king's palace, the gate of the runners (2 K. 11.[19], EV. "guard"), or behind the runners (2 K. 11.[6]); perhaps also the entrance of the adjutants (Jr. 38.[14], read shelīshīm), the upper gate of 2 Ch. 23.[20]. Another gate led to the east, the east gate (Ek. 10.[19], 11.[1]), the royal gate (1 Ch. 9.[18]). In the north a gate was built by Jotham (2 K. 15.[35]; 2 Ch. 27.[3]), called the new gate (Jr. 26.[10], 36.[10]), the upper gate of Benjamin (Jr. 20.[2]), the northern upper gate (Ek. 9.[2]), the northern gate of the inner court (Ek. 8.[3]), or the gate of the altar (8.[5]). This gate was important for the country people coming from the north; but also for the town people approaching from the west, as in the south the royal residence bordered on the Sanctuary (cp. Ek. 43.[8]). It was therefore the right place for public proceedings (Jr. 26.[10], 36.[10]). An outer north gate corresponded to this (Ek. 8.[14]). The Temple of Solomon was burned by command of Nebuchadnezzar on the 9th or 10th day of the fifth month of his nineteenth year, B.C. 586 (2 K. 25.[8]; Jr. 52.[12f.]).

PEF. Photo

Temple Area, Jerusalem: Jāmi' el-'Aqṣā

(2) The Temple of Ezekiel.—The prophet Ezekiel had a vision of a new Temple, on the tenth day of the first month in the fourteenth year after the destruction, B.C. 573 (Ek. 40.–42., 43.[13-17], 46.[19]–47.[12]). The leading idea of the plan drawn up by Ezekiel after the vision was, more thoroughly than had been done in the former Sanctuary, to protect that of the future from defilement. This was accomplished in various ways. The Sanctuary was completely separated from Jerusalem, and placed in the middle of the land marked off for the priests (Ek. 48.[8-10]). An outer court of 500 cubits square was assigned to the worshippers, who only at the feasts were allowed to enter the inner court, and this in a prescribed order (Ek. 46.[9]). Ezekiel takes great pains to show how strongly the three gates of this court, towards the east, the south, and the north, were built, each being 25 cubits broad and 50 long. There were six recesses within, evidently for the watchmen, whose duty it was rigidly to exclude every unclean thing. The east gate was to be entered only by the Lord; then it was to be closed for ever. Thirty cells in the wall, open at the front and provided with columns, were probably designed for the sacrificial meals of the people; and four courts, 40 by 30 cubits, at the corners, for the boiling of their sacrifices. The inner court, with its surroundings, rightly called the priests' court, was a space of 200 by 350 cubits; but the central part, the court itself, was only 100 cubits square. It was approached by three strong gates, 25 by 50 cubits, like the gates of the outer court. These gates, however, had their porches on the outside, and stood without the court, while those of the outer court had their porches inside, and all their building within the court. There the doors closed from without, here from within; which shows that the inner court was to be still better protected than the outer. In the porch at the east gate four tables were placed, for the slaying and cutting of the sin-offering and the guilt-offering (40.[39]; delete "the burnt-offering"). There was also provision made for washing the burnt-offering. But for the slaying of the burnt-offering and the sacrifice four other tables were placed outside, in front of the gate (40.[40-43]). Thus the whole work of preparing the sacrifices was excluded from the inner court, and a difference was made with the various kinds of sacrifice according to their degrees of holiness. No lavers are now found in the inner court. All purifications must be done without. Only the altar is here. It is 18 cubits broad at the base, and 12 cubits at the top. It stands 12 cubits high, including the base, and the horns rising over the top, wh. received the blood of the sacrifices. There are two breaks with ledges in the height, which means that the top, the most holy part, is guarded to the utmost against defilement. The altar was approached by a staircase on the side towards the gate where the sacrifices were prepared. Somewhere near the gates were two cells, one for the priests who served at the altar, and one for the priests who served in the Temple. Two large buildings, 100 cubits long, in three storeys, rising with offsets (Heb. attīq = 'attīq) at each storey, were erected on either side of the Temple, and two other buildings of 50 cubits in length, between them and the outer court. In these latter probably the priests put on and off the holy garments, while in the former, connected with wh. were kitchens where the food was prepared, they ate the most holy things, i.e. their portions of the offerings.

In arrangement the Temple house was not different from that of Solomon. It consisted of Porch, Palace, Holy of Holies, and the appendix in three storeys of thirty cells each. The whole length, with porch and appendix, was 100 cubits; the breadth 50. But the house was isolated by a base 6 cubits high, and by an enclosure 20 cubits wide on all sides except in front of the porch. The only piece of furniture was a wooden table or altar in the "palace." Palms and cherubs adorned the wooden lining of the walls. Gold and precious metals were intentionally excluded from the whole Sanctuary. A building 100 cubits by 80, behind the enclosure of the Temple, protected it on that side. What special purpose this building served is unknown. The supposition that the privies of the Sanctuary were here, so close to the Temple, is not in harmony with Ezekiel's way of thinking. He would rather seek to make impossible everything in the nature of a nuisance behind the Temple; and for this reason the building may have had no entrance. Ezekiel is very exact in his description of the Sanctuary, although the present text is very often sadly corrupt. It is all the more remarkable that he never gives the height of the buildings. His interest did not lie in a direction whence no defilement was to be expected.

(3) The Post-exilic Temple.—Ezekiel's Temple was never built. In B.C. 537, under Cyrus, the altar of the Temple was restored (Ez. 3.[1f.]). In B.C. 536 the rebuilding of the Temple began, but was soon interrupted (Ez. 3.[8]). The Sanctuary was in fact restored under Darius from B.C. 520–516 (Hg. 1.[15]; Ez. 5., 6.[15]). An edict of Cyrus (Ez. 6.[3f.]) gives the height of the house of God at Jrs. as 60 cubits, the breadth being the same, with three rows of great stones, and one row of timber (cp. 1 K. 6.[36], 7.[12]). According to Jos. these were the dimensions of the Temple building proper, without the upper room. The first post-exilic building may actually have been of this size. The veil referred to in 2 Ch. 3.[14] (cp. 1 M. 4.[51]) may have divided the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place. Ezekiel's plans were never carried out, but the institution of the Court of the Women, and the exclusion of the Gentiles from both inner courts, were steps in the direction indicated by him.

For a short time the Temple was transformed into a heathen sanctuary. No idol was erected, but a new altar was placed on the old one in December B.C. 168, and on the 25th of Kislew in that year the first sacrifice was offered to the Lord of Heaven (1 M. 1.[54-59]; cp. Dn. 11.[31], 12.[11]: shiqqûtz meshōmēm = ba'al shāmayim), who was identified with Israel's God. In B.C. 165 the heathen altar was destroyed, the old altar replaced by a new one, and on the 25th of Kislew the Temple was restored to its legitimate service (1 M. 4.[42-53]; 2 M. 10.[3-5]). The High Priest Alcimos, in B.C. 160, had the intention at least to open the inner courts to foreigners, and began to pull down the walls, a work wh. was arrested by his sudden death (1 M. 9.[54f.]). In accordance, probably, with Sadducean wishes, Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 103–76) drew a wooden railing round the Temple building and the altar, to exclude the people from this part. The railing is mentioned by Josephus as still existing; but its removal, probably during the Jewish insurrection, is presupposed in the scroll of the fasts (see Dalman, Aramäische Dialektproben, pp. 2, 33).

(4) The Temple of Herod.—The last and most brilliant period of the Temple was inaugurated by Herod I. He began the work of restoration probably in the year B.C. 20 (Ant. XV. xi. 1; but cp. BJ. I. xxi. 1). The courts were finished in eight years, and the Temple building in 1½ years, about B.C. 11. But Herod's work was continued after his death. About A.D. 28 (Jn. 2.[20]) forty-six years' building are spoken of. The restoration was not completed until the time of the governor Albinos, A.D. 62–64 (Ant. XX. ix. 7). All parts of the Sanctuary were renewed, with the sole exception of the eastern substruction, which was believed to be the work of Solomon (Ant. XX. ix. 7; cp. XV. xi. 3; BJ. V. v. 1; Ac. 3.[11], 5.[12]; Jn. 10.[23]). The restoration meant an adaptation of the Sanctuary to Hellenistic (not Greek) taste. The eagle, the symbol of the God of Heaven, was placed on the front of the Temple building (Ant. XVII. vi. 2; BJ. I. xxxiii. 2); and there seems to have been an inscription announcing the date of the restoration (BJ. I. xxi. 8).

The Temple of Herod is described by Josephus in BJ. V. 5; Ant. XV. xi. 3–7; and by the Mishna in tract Middoth. The description of Josephus has in view Roman readers, and inclines to exaggeration, in order to make the Temple appear magnificent in their eyes. The Mishna is liable to reflect rather the Pharasaic ideal of a Temple than historical reality. According to Josephus the Sanctuary was originally a square of one stadium, to the length of which Herod added half a stadium. The present Ḥaram area corresponds to this in shape; but it measures 1½ by 2½ stadia, not 1 by 1½. The Mishna gives 500 cubits square, wh. measurement corresponds with that of Ezekiel. If the cubit be taken as = 55 centimetres, this would make 275 metres, while the shortest breadth of the Ḥaram area is 283 metres. The excavations of Warren have made it certain that the present substructions of the Ḥaram represent the time of Herod; only the north side has been changed by the demolition of the castle Antonia (see JERUSALEM), which occupied the north-western corner of the present area. The west side of this area is 486 metres in length, the east side 474; in breadth the north side is 317 metres, and the south 283. Cp. Dalman, "Der Zweite Tempel," in Palästina jahrbuch, 1909.

The "outer," or "lower sanctuary" (Jos.), or "the Mount of the House" (Mishna), the circumference of which corresponds to that of the present area, was surrounded by cloisters with two rows of columns. On the south was the "royal cloister," a closed hall, with four rows of Corinthian columns. Four gates led into this court from the west: one from the Lower City (known now as Barclay's Gate); one from the Upper City with a bridge (at Wilson's Arch), probably the gate of Kipponos (Coponius), in the Mishna; two from the suburb (one of them Warren's Gate). Two gates called the gates of Hulda (Mishna) were in the south (the present double and triple gate); one, the gate of Taddi (Mishna), in the north. According to Josephus there were no gates in the east, where the Mishna places one, perhaps only of a private character, possibly on the site of the present Golden Gate. Remains of arches for bridges or stairs may be traced both east and west of the site of the Royal Cloister. They may have afforded facilities for transport to the interior of building materials. Stairs, mentioned in Ac. 21.$^{35, 40}$, led to the main entrance of the Castle Antonia.

The "interior sanctuary," or "Holy Place" (Jos.), was first surrounded by a low balustrade of 3 cubits (Jos.), or ten handbreadths (Mishna), in which Greek and Latin inscriptions prohibited all aliens on pain of death from going further in. On the east, north, and south there were fourteen steps leading up to a platform 10 cubits in breadth. Finally it was surrounded by a wall 25 cubits high on the inside (Jos.). The interior was divided into a lower part towards the east, the Court of the Women, and a higher part towards the west, the "innermost court" (Jos.), or

ΜΗΘΕΝΑΑΛΛΟΓΕΝΗΕΙΣΠΟ
ΡΕΥΕΣΘΑΙΕΝΤΟΣΤΟΥΠΕ
ΡΙΤΟΙΕΡΟΝΤΡΥΦΑΚΤΟΥΚΑΙ
ΠΕΡΙΒΟΛΟΥΟΣΔΑΝΛΗ
ΦΘΗΕΑΥΤΩΙΑΙΤΙΟΣΕΣ
ΤΑΙΔΙΑΤΟΕΞΑΚΟΛΟΥ
ΘΕΙΝΘΑΝΑΤΟΝ

Greek Inscription on Stone in Balustrade: Herod's Temple

Translation: "No stranger is to enter within the balustrade round the Temple and enclosure. Whoever is caught will be responsible to himself for his death, which will ensue."

"the enclosure" proper (Mishna), containing the Temple building and the altar. The Mishna makes the Court of the Women 135 cubits square, and the "enclosure" 135 cubits in breadth by 187 in length. These measurements, however, refer only to the free space of the courts, and do not take into account the surrounding buildings. By adding 30 cubits, given by Jos. as the length of the gates, on three sides, we get for the innermost court 195 cubits by 217, for the Court of the Women 195 cubits by 165, and a total length of 382 cubits. This agrees with the nature of the ground towards east and west. It thus appears that the higher platform in the present Ḥaram in the south and west corresponds to the innermost court of Herod's Temple; while it is considerably larger towards the north and the east. The eastern boundary of the Court of the Women may thus have been only 50 metres distant from the east wall of the present Ḥaram.

The Court of the Women was surrounded by a cloister with one row of columns. In each corner there was a small court, 40 cubits square; that to the NE. for the wood, that to the SE. for the Nazirites, that to the SW. for the oil and wine, and that on the NW. for the lepers. Some believed that the ark of the covenant was hidden in the Court of the Wood (Schek. vi. 1, 2), but in the course of digging here only bones were found (Tos. Eduj. iii. 3). From the north, east, and south this court was entered by one gate, with a door 15 cubits by 30 (Jos.), or 10 cubits by 20 (Mishna). The east gate, called by Jos. the Corinthian gate, by the Mishna (wh. does not mention the north and south gates) the lower (east) gate, according to Jos. was distinguished by doors of Corinthian brass; while the Mishna gives this distinction to a fourth, the upper (east) gate, or gate of Nicanor, between the Court of the Women and the innermost court, which had an entrance 40 cubits by 50 (Jos.), and two small side gates (Mishna). All the doors, with the exception of the Corinthian gate, were overlaid with gold. Fifteen semicircular steps led from the Court of the Women to the entrance of the innermost court named above. In two cells at the side of these steps the Levitical musicians kept their instruments. In the innermost court only a strip from north to south, 11 cubits broad (Mishna), was free to Israelite men—or a strip going round the altar and the Temple building (Jos.). A railing one cubit high (Jos.), or perhaps later on (see above), a line marked in the pavement (Mishna), or a step (Mishna), fenced off the priests' part of the court. Three gates gave entrance to this court from the north and from the south. The southern gates, from west to east, were the gate of the fire, of the offering, and of the water; and the northern, the gate of the spark, of the offering, and of the warming-house (Mishna; where, however, there is also an enumeration of eight gates on the north and south, and two in the west). To the east of this court the Mishna places the cells of the bakers of the High Priests' pancakes (cp. Lv. 6.$^{20ff.}$), and of Pinehas, the keeper of the priests' garments; on the north side, the cell of the salt for salting the sacrifices, of Parva, for salting the hides (over it was a bath for the High Priest, used on the Day of Atonement), and the cell of the washers for washing the intestines, with stairs to the bath (the reading in certain texts places these three cells on the south; but they belong of necessity to the north, where the sacrifices were slain). Here was also the warming-house of the priests, where a fire was always burning, special cells for the lambs and for preparing the showbread, and the entrance to a subterranean bath and privy. On this side was probably also the cell in which veils were kept. On the south side were the cell of the wood, supposed to be the residence of the High Priest before the Day of Atonement; the cell of the basin, with the principal cistern of the Sanctuary; and the cell of the hewn stones, the meeting-place of the Sanhedrin, and at the same time the Synagogue of the priests. The first bath of the High Priest on the Day of Atonement was here, over the Water Gate: probably here, also, was the upper room of Abtinas, the incense-maker. The exact position of the cell where the four or five kinds of tickets for the offerings were issued, of the thirteen boxes for offerings (Schek. vi. 5; Mk. 12.[41]; Lk. 21.[1]), the cell of alms (Tam. v. 6), and of the cell of the implements for repairing the house (Tam. iii. 4; v. 6), cannot now be ascertained. The holiness of the cells and their roofs in the surroundings of the innermost court was determined on a principle given in Maas. sh. iii. 8. Within the area of the Sanctuary there were five degrees of holiness. (1) The outer court, from which were excluded persons with an issue, menstruous women, and mothers after child-birth. (2) The "rampart" (Heb. khēl) within the balustrade, whence aliens, and persons unclean from contact with a corpse, were barred. (3) The Court of the Women, which was forbidden to unclean persons, who had not fulfilled the time of their uncleanness (cp. Lv. 15.[51]), although they had taken their bath of purification. (4) The Court of the Israelites, where no one was admitted who had finished his purification but had not yet offered the sacrifice due in his case. (5) The Court of the Priests, which laymen entered only to perform their sacrifices (Kel. i. 8). According to Pharisaic tradition, Jerusalem corresponded legally to the camp of Israel in the wilderness, the outer court and the Court of the Women to the camp of the Levites, and only the innermost court to the Court of the Tabernacle (Tos. Kal. Bab. k. i. 9, 12; Bab. Zeb. 116b). These distinctions, however, were known to be largely innovations of the scribes (Bab. Pes. 92a; Bab. Zeb. 32b; cp. Jrs. Erub. 22c). The exclusion of women from the innermost court was a Sadducean regulation, not accepted by rabbinical law. The same is true regarding the penalty of death threatened against the alien intruder into the Sanctuary (see above; cp. Ac. 21.[28]).

In front of the Temple building was the altar, 32 cubits in breadth at the base, and 30 at the top, rising with two breaks to a height of 10 cubits, including the horns (Mishna), or 50 cubits broad, and 15 high (Jos.). On the north and west sides of the base was a gutter for the blood (Midd. iii. 2; Tos. Zeb. vi. 11). From the south the ascent, 16 cubits in breadth and 30 cubits in length, led up to the altar. A niche on the west side of this ascent (Midd. iii. 3), or an aperture between it and the altar (Bab. Pes. 34a), was used as a receptacle for birds found unfit to be presented as sin-offerings. An opening in the ground west of the ascent gave access to a subterranean channel which carried off the blood. Near it stood two tables; one of marble for the parts of the sacrifice, and one of silver for the utensils required at the altar (Shek. vi. 4). Here also was the great laver with twelve spouts (Jom. iii. 10; Tos. Jom. ii. 2; Bab. Jom. 25b). Every night it was plunged into a cistern, in order to preserve its Levitical purity (Jom. iii. 10; Tam. iii. 8; Bab. Jom. 37a; Bab. Zeb. 20a). To the north of the altar four rows of rings, six in each, were fixed in the ground; and to these the victims were bound. On eight tables of marble their intestines were washed. Eight small columns with iron hooks, three on each side, arranged one above the other, were used in skinning the animals.

The Temple building was approached by a stair of twelve steps. An opening, 20 by 40 cubits (Mishna), or 25 by 70 cubits (Jos.), admitted to the porch. This was 22 cubits deep, and 100 cubits in breadth and in height. A stone lintel to fit a door of this size was out of the question. A series of four beams built into the wall over the doorway served to relieve the wooden lintel (Mishna). Just inside were placed a table of silver and one of gold, on which the showbread was provisionally laid. The body of the porch formed a hall, 50 cubits in length, 20 in breadth, and 90 in height (Jos.). The northern and southern ends of the porch were used as stores for sacred knives (Mishna). An opening, 10 by 20 cubits (Mishna), or 16 by 55 cubits (Jos.), led into the "palace," or Holy Place. This opening was closed by double doors, or by one door which folded in two (Mishna). There was also a wonderful veil which concealed the interior when the door was open (cp. Jom. v. 2; Tos. Shek. iv. 13–15; Bab. Keth. 106a). A golden vine and crowns of gold adorned the wall over the entrance. According to Jos., this entire wall, with the door, was gilded, as well as the front of the porch. Perhaps, however, only the door was overlaid with gold (Mishna). The Holy Place measured 20 by 40 cubits, and the Holy of Holies 20 by 20; the height of both being 40 cubits (Mishna), or 60 cubits (Jos.). Over both an upper room was built, 40 cubits in height. To make up the 100 cubits in height the Mishna reckons the base 6 cubits, the lower storey 40 cubits, the roof 5 cubits, the upper storey 40 cubits, the flat roof 5 cubits, the balustrade 3 cubits, and the scare-crows (consisting of golden spears, Jos.) 1 cubit. There stood in the Holy Place a candlestick (with stone staircase, Mishna), a table for the showbread, and an altar for the burning of incense, all of gold. The interior walls of the entire house were gilded (Mishna, cp. Mw. 23.[16, 17]). There were windows only in the front wall (Midd. iii. 8). The Holy Place was separated from the Holy of Holies, not by a wall with a door, but by a veil (Jos.), or two veils (Mishna). This, or that mentioned above, may be the veil referred to in Mw. 27.[51]; Mk. 15.[38]; Lk. 23.[45]). In the Holy of Holies only a flat stone three finger-breadths in height was to be seen (Jom. v. 2). The building was surrounded on three sides by an annexe of three storeys, reaching a height of 40 cubits, plus 11 cubits for base and roof (Mishna), or 60 cubits (Jos.). The two lower storeys contained 13, the upper storey 12 cells, all connected by doors, while access from one storey to another was obtained by means of apertures in roof and ceiling (Mishna). Two doors in the Temple porch led to the first cells on either side. Another small door on the west is mentioned by Josephus. Jewish tradition speaks of small symbolical doors on the north and south of the porch, and on the rear of the annexe (Bab. Zeb. 55b), or on the projection of the porch to the west (Tos. Zeb. vii. 1). It may have been by one of these doors, which Jewish traditionalism demanded to make the court in these directions a fit place for slaying the sacred victims, and for eating the most holy things, that the Temple was set on fire (BJ. VI. iv. 5). According to the Mishna, the annexe was surrounded by an ascent leading to the roof. Here a door furnished access to the upper room over the Temple, the roof of which was reached with the assistance of pulleys. The ascent (11 cubits) and the annexe together were 19 cubits broad. The total breadth of the buildings was therefore 70 cubits. Josephus states the breadth at 60 cubits; but he does not mention the ascent, and probably allows 12 cubits on each side for the annexe. The Temple building thus retained its old Oriental style. It was raised, however, to an imposing height, over-topping all its surroundings. A plan to restore 20 cubits to the height in accordance with the supposed original design (Ant. XV. xi. 3; cp. 2 Ch. 3.[4]), although materials were collected for the purpose, was never executed (BJ. V. i. 5).

When Titus took the Sanctuary on the 17th of Tammuz A.D. 70, the daily sacrifice was suspended. On the 9th or 10th (Jos.) of Ab, this same year, the Temple was burned. There is no record of any attempt to restore the Temple during the insurrection of A.D. 132–135. The work was actually begun in A.D. 363, at the command of the emperor Julian, but was interrupted by his sudden death. Through a strange leading of Providence the necessary preparation for this work did much to remove the last visible remains of the Temple building (see Couret, La Palestine sous les Empereurs Grecs, p. 69), and so to the fulfilment of Christ's prediction: "There shall not be left here one stone upon another" (Mw. 24.[2]). G. H. DALMAN.

TEMPLES, HEATHEN. Although perhaps, when Jerusalem fell, the Holy Temple there was, as Merivale contends, the most spacious sacred edifice in the world, and the most splendid, yet still there were others that extorted the admiration of the beholder and impressed themselves upon his thoughts. The apostle Paul, Jew as he was, when he wrote to the Ephesians of believers "growing unto an holy temple in the Lord," probably considered the associations of his audience as much as his own memories, and therefore had in his mind as much the Temple of Diana in Ephesus as that of Jehovah in Jerusalem. To understand the references of Christian apostles it may be desirable to know something of those heathen structures with wh. they came in contact. Yet as the human mind grows by what it sees, and the human imagination is educated by the achievements of the past, the Temple of Jerusalem itself must have owed something to the more ancient heathen temples that were around, as well as to the Tabernacle that Moses had made in the wilderness. For that reason also we ought to devote a little time to the structure and arrangements of these fanes of heathendom. Some of the events in Old Testament history are connected with such temples, and can be understood only through knowledge of them. If we wd. study the Temple truly we must do so in its evolution.

Whatever origin we assume for the idea of God and of worship, we must hold that the simpler preceded the more complex. The idea of God implied the need of propitiating Him; that is to say, it implied its contrast, the idea of sin, and the recognition by man of himself as a sinner. His ordinary affairs were so low and mean, and so polluted, that he must separate everything connected with his approach to Deity fm. his usual avocations. If in any way Deity had been manifest in a particular place; if a man had or imagined he had a communication fm. Deity there; if lightning, the arrows of the Almighty, struck the ground; that spot at once became sacred, a place set apart fm. the common earth around. The next stage was to mark this off with some object; either a stone was set upright, or a tree was planted. The latter became at length the sacred grove. In the former case the stone had offerings of oil or of the blood of victims poured upon it. The form was then modified to greater suitability for this purpose, the altar being thus evolved; and, further, it was guarded by a fence built round it. There was a sacred temenos, or domain, thus marked off. Still further, to dignify this place and indicate its sacred character more clearly, the altar was covered over; this formed a dwelling in wh. the Deity was supposed to reside. The simple memorial stone was now carved into some likeness of the being worshipped; not infrequently the human form was combined with the head or limbs of some of the lower animals, implying by symbol that the Deity was endowed with the attributes so indicated; thus the wings of the eagle indicated swiftness, practical ubiquity; and the paws of the lion, or the body of the bull, signified strength. With greater artistic knowledge the arbitrary symbols were displaced; the human form and the expression of the human face became natural symbols. This image of Deity, this idol, was relegated to an inner shrine, where he sat in dignity and darkness, separated fm. his votaries, visited only at intervals by one of his priests. The priest, the consecrated person, necessarily followed the consecrated place; then there came consecrated actions, ritual; and consecrated language and tones, wh. became poetry and music.

There were round Palestine, near enough to influence it at the time of Solomon, three different forms of temple. In the flat plains of Babylonia the sacred place was marked off fm. the flat land around by being raised on stage after stage of brickwork, so as to form a suggestion of a mountain. In that way the special shrine in wh. was the abode of the god was at once remote fm. the worshipper, yet glorified by being made conspicuous. In the monuments of Babylon and Nineveh we have several delineations of the ziggurat or staged temple. First a great platform of solid brick was reared; on this was raised, sometimes in the centre of the foundation platform, sometimes nearer to one end, another smaller platform, also solid; on this a third; on it a fourth, and so on possibly to a seventh, and on the top of this was the shrine proper. Access from the one storey to the other was by stairs, outside generally, though sometimes, if we may trust the restorations of M. Chipiez, let into the mound of brick. The outer wall of each platform was covered with decorations, wh. increased in splendour of decoration as one ascended; sometimes the casing was of encaustic bricks, on wh. were portrayed men and animals in resplendent colours. In Herodotus (i. 181–183) we have a description of the Temple of Bel in Babylon, fm. wh. we may extract the following: "The sacred precinct of Zeus Belus was square, of two furlongs each way. In the centre of this sacred enclosure was a tower built solid, a furlong in length and breadth: upon this tower another tower was raised, and another again upon this, until there were eight towers. The ascent to these is made by an outside stairway round about all the towers. In the middle of this ascent is a resting-place with benches for reclining, on wh. those going up may rest. In the topmost tower is a great shrine; and in the shrine a large couch is placed, beautifully upholstered, and a golden table placed beside it. There is no statue of any kind set up there. The Chaldæans, the priests of the god, declare that the god himself comes down to the shrine and reclines upon the couch." (Rawlinson thinks Herodotus has mixed up the temple at Birs Nimroud, which he takes to be Borsippa, with that at Babylon. For section see Rawlinson, Herodotus, ii. 483.) The temple at Mugheir (Ur of the Chaldees), of wh. many bricks are to be found in Europe, and wh. was in its splendour in the youth of Abraham, before he left the city of his nativity, was probably of a similar but simpler structure. (For the different forms of Babylonian and Assyrian temples see Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Chaldæa and Assyria, i., plates ii., iii., iv., figs. 169–190.) In Nineveh the palace of the monarch very frequently contained a temple (Restoration of the Palace of Sargon—Perot and Chipiez, op. cit., ii., plate v.). Perhaps the element of a built platform may have suggested the extension of the area by under-building for Solomon's Temple. Though the influence of Babylonia in general matters had been very great in Palestine, as evidenced by the Tell Amarna tablets, in the period just before the entrance of the Israelites into it, and although the race had originally come fm. Babylonia, yet the mountainous character of the country was so different fm. the flat plain of Lower Mesopotamia that Babylonian architecture cd. be but little followed in Palestine.

As Solomon cd. get few lessons fm. the temple-builders of the east and north, fm. Babylon and Assyria, the possibility at once presents itself that he may have learned from the Egyptians to the south and west. The fact that he had married a daughter of the reigning Pharaoh renders this more probable. In Egypt there was nothing resembling the Babylonian ziggurat. There are mountains in Egypt wh., though not high as compared with mountains elsewhere, wd. dwarf any human structure into insignificance. Hence, starting fm. the tent, the Egyptians made the pillar an important part of their structures. In Babylonia, while there was abundant opportunity of making bricks, stones could be obtained with difficulty. In Egp., on the other hand, there were convenient quarries fm. wh. porphyry monoliths cd. be brought for obelisks, or granite lintels to span the space between great columns. The tent and tent-poles of primitive times were followed by the wooden hut, and that by the building of stone. The architecture of the lintel has always many characteristics of carpentry; indeed their domestic architecture seems largely to have been of wood all through their history. In the Temple of the Sphinx, with its accurately squared, monolithic columns, we seem to see proof of this. The temple we have mentioned has certainly many very enigmatic features: the immensely thick walls, the narrowness of the passage by wh. the pillared halls were approached, the darkness wh. must have enveloped the worshipper unless artificial light were resorted to, if there was any roof, all make it difficult to comprehend the structure or its purpose. The more magnificent Temples of Karnak and Luxor are probably more immediately to be considered, as even the latest of the great temples was old when Solomon built the Temple at Jerusalem. The evolution of any of the greater temples was a process similar to that fm. wh. our great cathedrals resulted. Successive bishops added towers, aisles, or transepts to the original structure, or modified and replaced earlier portions by features more in accordance with the taste of the period. In like manner the Pharaohs added courts and porticoes to more ancient shrines. Everything of this kind tended to seclude more and more the immediate abode of the Deity. We may take the great Temple at Karnak as a specimen of an Egyptian temple. In the days of what is called the Middle Dynasty a temple was erected to Amen. During the rule of the Hyksos kings this shrine fell into ruins. By the XVIII. Dynasty that replaced them a portico was added, flanked by two great pylons—masses of masonry in the form of gigantic trapezoids—the sloping sides of wh. were covered with sculptures and hieroglyphs; within that another smaller portico flanked by smaller pylons, and within that a third yet smaller; colonnades filled up the interspaces. One of the later monarchs of this dynasty erected two yet more gigantic pylons in front of the portico of Thothmes I. In front of this again the XIX. Dynasty formed a large court, crowded it with huge and splendid pillars, and in front placed two other pylons that dwarfed all those within; and in front of this long avenues of sphinxes. Such was the great Temple of Luxor as it was left by the dynasty which, according to most archæologists, saw the Exodus. This form of temple was very frequently adopted all over Egypt, down to the times of the Ptolemies. Few features in the Egyptian temple directly influenced the Temple of Solomon. The principal element was the use of the portico to add dignity to the inner oracle. The differences, however are greater than the resemblances; there is nothing corresponding to the huge pylons wh. are so marked a feature of Egyptian temples; something, perhaps, of their æsthetic effect was attained by the pillars Jachin and Boaz at the door of the Holy Place; only these were distinctly pillars, not pylons.

The remaining source of artistic influence is Phœnicia. There is a strong probability that the æsthetic ideas of the Jews were affected by Phœnician influences, especially in the days of Solomon. The Tyrians were the near neighbours of Israel. Their city afforded a market for the Hebrews of Palestine, where they cd. dispose of their own products and purchase those of other countries. Further, they spoke the same language. In such circumstances intercourse cd. not fail to be extensive, and its effect very marked in every direction. Hiram the king was closely consulted by Solomon, and from Tyre came Hiram, the artificer in brass. Probably, therefore, Phœnician models were before the minds of the builders and architects of the Temple in Jerusalem. There is, however, great difficulty in verifying this. There remain no extensive ruins of Phœnician temples of the primitive type, such as are found of the Egyptian. The Egyptian civilisation, art, and religion offered more resistance to Hellenism, even when supported by the military power of Rome. Although the Greek language was largely spoken, Greek city life appears to have taken little hold of Egypt; Alexandria seems to have been the only city in Egypt in wh. the Hellenic model was followed with any closeness. The Ptolemies declared themselves "sons of Ra," and built shrines to Amen in wh. the pylons and pillars of the old architecture ruled. In Syria it was very different; cities after the Greek model abounded; old temples were replaced by new, old deities received attributes wh. assimilated them to the denizens of Olympus. Any one who rides fm. Tyre to Sidon will find everywhere drums of columns and fragments of decorative detail, but these are all Roman. Even in Baalbek all that is left of the ancient structures are the massive stones forming the stylobate of the great columns wh. remain fm. the Temple of the Sun. There are the remains of small shrines, there are descriptions, and figures on coins; that is all we have to guide us as to the architecture of Tyre and Sidon. The small shrines probably give us some idea of what the inner holy place of the larger temples continued to be. These indicate that the form of the "cromlech" dominated the minds of the Phœnician architects. [Cp. the Ma'abed (temple) at Amrith (Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Phœnicia, i., figs. 185–187), and 'Ain-el-Hayat (idem, fig. 188).] Instead of being in rough stones like their prototypes, the stones are carefully squared, and the front is dignified with ornament. It wd. seem that all over Pal. the same form of temple prevailed. From coins and models that have come down to us the arrangement seems to have been a small central shrine with a large courtyard surrounded by a colonnade. The shrine in the Temple of Dagon must have been small for his image to fall on the threshold and be broken (1 S. 5.[4]). Even if the shrine in question were twice as large in every dimension as that at Amrith, the statue wd. not need to be more than heroic size, or to be raised on more than a moderately elevated pedestal, for its fall to bring it to the threshold of the inner shrine. The Temple of Venus in Cyprus, as seen on the coin figured in Lewin (St. Paul, i. 224), and as restored by Münter and Hetsch (idem, i. 222), shows the arrangement suggested. The "Temple" of Golgos, the plan of wh. is figured by di Cesnola, represents a totally different structure; it had been a rectangular building, the roof of wh. was supported by fifteen pillars, presumed to have been of wood; the walls are thought to have been of sun-dried bricks. M. Chipiez brings forward strong reasons for maintaining that it was not a temple, but only an annexe to one, in wh. possibly votive offerings were kept. Neglecting this aberrant specimen, the shrine seems to have been a cubical structure. Round this was a large court, as we have said above; in di Cesnola's Cyprus (p. 212) there is a plan of the Temple at Paphos, wh. exhibits such a disposition of parts as that of wh. we have spoken. The Temple in Gaza, in wh. SAMSON wrought such havoc on the Philistines, must have had a similar arrangement; on the roof of the colonnade and under its shade were the spectators gathered; to pull down the central pillars wd. precipitate to the ground all who were on the roof, and precipitate the roof and them on those beneath; panic wd. set in, and the carnage narrated in Scripture mt. easily result. The Temple of Baal, in wh. JEHU massacred the Baal-worshippers, must have had something of the same arrangement of parts: a huge court with chambers round it, in wh. were kept the priestly robes; a central shrine, in wh. was the image of Baal. Probably there were places in wh. wooden statues as votive offerings were kept. It is possible that the matztzēbōth, the burning of wh. formed a feature in the desecration of the Temple of Baal, may have been the tall posts or pillars, wh. seem fm. coins and other delineations to have been common features of Phœnician temples; they may well have been of wood, like the huge masts that illustrate the square of St. Mark's. These appear to have been the prototypes of Jachin and Boaz in the Temple of Solomon. Their presence forms the principal resemblance between Phœnician temples and that in Jrs. There certainly was the great courtyard, but there does not seem to have been anything equivalent to the hēkal (Holy Place) as distinct fm. the debīr (Most Holy). Further, the Solomonic bldg. was predominantly wood and metal; the "Oracle" especially was plated with gold inside. Boards of cedar everywhere encased the walls: on these was the mass of the carving that formed the ornamentation. In material the two pillars, being wholly brass, or rather bronze, differed fm. the wooden matztzēbōth of the Phœnician temples; no one cd. have burned Jachin and Boaz. Although the Phœnician temple more resembles that of Solomon than either the Assyrian or Egyptian, yet still differences predominate. The model of the Tabernacle, wh., some critics declare, never existed, appears really to have had most to do with the Temple of Solomon.

Little as we know of the real form and structure of the Temple of Solomon, still less do we know of that of Zerubbabel. It is to be presumed that the returning captives wd. endeavour to rebuild the Temple as nearly in its original form as their means made possible. It is conceivable that not a few features wd. be added to compensate, in some measure, for the want of the splendour of the gold and brass of the "former house." These wd. be drawn fm. the ideas represented in the architecture of Persia. In digging foundations in Sidon there were found marble fragments of the capitals of huge columns of the Persepolitan type. If the Sidonians departed fm. their traditional forms to adopt those of the dominant Persians, the Jews may well have done the same. Ezekiel's Temple mt. to a certain extent be a guide; but it showed merely his idea of the first Temple as he wished it reconstructed. The dimensions given by Cyrus of the Temple wh. he permits the Jews to build do not coincide either with those of the Solomonic Temple or of those of Ezekiel's Temple. The terms were probably given according to the dimensions of some known building in his neighbourhood. This makes the presence of Persian elements the more probable.

The Herodian Temple would of necessity be modelled on the classic temples of Greece and Rome, especially the latter, so far as the religious ideas of Herod's subjects wd. permit. A Greek temple was a building rectangular in shape, rather more than twice as long as it was broad, surrounded by a colonnade. The columns that composed the colonnade were, with the Greeks, usually Doric, or Ionic. The Romans preferred the more gorgeous Corinthian column to the severer Doric. In the account Josephus gives of Herod's Temple he mentions pillars; these wd. almost certainly be Corinthian, and not fluted, as are the columns of Jerash. The greatest temple at that time was probably that of Diana of the Ephesians. Its columns were of the Ionic order, and were gorgeously enriched with bas-reliefs not merely in the base but also in the pedestal; and, what was more singular, in the first drum of the column. Dominating as it did the thoughts of those to whom he was writing, it is hardly possible that S. Paul had not in his mind the Temple of Diana when he wrote to the Ephesian believers of the whole Church "growing together to an holy temple in the Lord"—a text we have already referred to; the notice of the corner-stone may refer to the difficulties experienced in laying the foundations of this vast structure on the marshy ground on the banks of the Cayster. The temples of Athens, of Corinth, and above all of Rome, cd. not fail to influence the apostles, though we cannot put our finger on evidences of this influence. The grandeur of these temples wd. necessarily have seductive power over those who possessed, as so many of the Greeks did, an artistic nature, and thus tend to deafen their ears to the message of the apostles.

TEN COMMANDMENTS, THE (Heb. 'ăsereth had-debārim, "the decade of the words" (Ex. 34.[28])). There are two recensions of this catalogue of laws, one in Ex. 20.[1-17], E., the other in Dt. 5.[1-22]. While these two are essentially the same, yet there are many, if minor, variants; the most important of these is the reason assigned for the Fourth Commandment. In Exodus it is God's rest after the completion of the work of creation; in Deuteronomy it is God's deliverance of the children of Israel fm. the bondage of Egypt. Proceeding merely by analysis of the variations, it wd. be difficult to decide wh. of the two recensions is the earlier. The insertion in the Deuteronomic version of the words, "nor thine ox nor thine ass," into the Fourth Commandment is pleonastic, and so suggestive of an afterthought. The earlier insertion, "as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee," seems to imply an earlier promulgation of the Sabbatic law. On the other hand, the use of "remember" in regard to the Sabbath in the Exodus account, instead of "keep" as in Deuteronomy, wd. imply the previous publication of the latter. But another question was raised by Goethe and adopted by Wellhausen: Is there in Exodus 34., wh. is J., an earlier decalogue than that in chap. 20., wh. is attributed to E.? This Decalogue is as follows: "(1) Thou shalt worship no other God. (2) Thou shalt make thee no molten gods. (3) The Feast of Unleavened Bread shalt thou keep. (4) All that openeth the matrix is Mine. (5) Thou shalt observe the Feast of Weeks. (6) Thou shalt observe the Feast of Ingathering. (7) Thou shalt not offer the blood of My sacrifice with leaven. (8) Neither shall the sacrifice of the Feast of the Passover be left unto the morning. (9) The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring unto the house of the Lord thy God. (10) Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk." The truth is that these "ten" are really a selection out of fourteen; no principle is laid down why that selection should be made, and not any other of the scores of possible alternatives. The purely ritual character of the precepts, the conspicuous want of logic in the form and of morality in the matter of them, make it incomprehensible how these commandments shd. be marked off as specially sacred. To any one without a theory it wd. be obvious that the "ten words" of 34.[28] refer to "these words" of 20.[1]. A still more amazing thing is the belief some critics have hinted, and others asserted, that the Mosaic code has been borrowed fm. that of Hammurabi. Although so much more ancient than that of Moses, the code of Hammurabi seems much more modern in the complexity of the civil and commercial relations. Above all, there is no attempt to arrange the precepts under ten heads, embracing the essentials of social and religious morality without wh. society wd. be impossible. As to the arrangement of the precepts: the Roman Catholic, and, following them, the Lutheran Church, combine into one what are the First and Second Commandments to the Reformed, the Anglican, and the Presbyterian Churches; to make the number "ten" they split the Tenth into two. This command against the making of idols has been taken to prove that the Decalogue did not originate with Moses, as the Northern Tribes continued to have idols down to the end of the State. The Roman Catholic Church has statues and pictures wh. it uses in worship; yet images are forbidden by what, if not a second and a separate precept, is at least an inspired explanation and amplification of the first. The separation of the precept against coveting the "neighbour's wife" fm. those forbidding the coveting of his property, while supported by the code as given in Deuteronomy, is in antagonism to the arrangement in Exodus. Another question of arrangement is the position of the precepts on the two tables. If we take the Decalogue as it stands, with its expansions, it is very difficult to make a satisfactory division. If the common division is taken, that of "Divine" and "Human," the first four belonging to the former class, and the last six to the latter, then three-quarters of the words in the whole Decalogue are in the first. If we take what is an old Jewish division, and place the first three alone on the first table, then two-fifths of the words are on the first table, and three-fifths on the second. If, however, the expansions are removed, the Decalogue can be divided into two groups of five commandments; in each, then, there is a nearer approach to equality. The first wd. refer to Reverence, and the second to Honesty. The first four commandments are directed to mark off Israel as the nation to whom the Divine Revelation was entrusted. The unity, spirituality, and the awful dignity of God, and the duty of worshipping Him, are implied in the four commandments wh. end with that on the sanctity of the Sabbath. Man can only realise his own reverence and worship by the consecration of something. But the consecration of an object becomes idolatry; the consecration of a place tends to limit the ideas of God; the consecration of a space of time to the service of God harmonises with man's need for consecrating something, and with the spirituality of God. With regard to the human portion of the Decalogue: unless there is obedience to authority, society cannot be organised into a state; unless human life is safe, society in no form is possible; unless the sanctity of the family and of marriage is preserved, the continuance of society is ultimately impossible; unless property is maintained, violence and anarchy will prevail, and society be dissolved; the administration of justice wd. be impossible unless evidence cd. be believed. All these statutes cd. be evaded by chicane if men have the mind to; but they are forbidden to have the mind to, in the command, "Thou shalt not covet." The profundity and comprehensiveness of the Decalogue can scarcely be exaggerated. When we compare its morality with that of the Egyptian Book of the Dead, or of the Code of Hammurabi, it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that it is the product, not of human genius, but of Divine Revelation.

TENT. Tent life is said to have been instituted by Jabal, son of Lamech (Gn. 4.[20]). He is called "the fr. of such as dwell in tents." This was the form of life followed by Abraham and the patriarchs. In the wilderness Israel dwelt in tents, and traces of this ancient custom persisted in the language of the people for long: e.g. to go to one's tent was to go home (2 S. 20.[1, 22], &c.); cp. "To your tents, O Israel" (1 K. 12.[16]). In OT. 'ōhel is the usual word for tent; mishkān, "TABERNACLE" (lit. "habitation"), is once (SS. 1.[8]) trd. "tent." Sukkāh, "booth," is also once (2 S. 11.[11] AV.) trd. "tent." The rabbis held that a "booth"—made of wattled leaves and branches—became a "tent" if a piece of cloth were spread over it. Qubbāh (Nu. 25.[8] AV.) corresponds to the Arb. qubbah, a tent of a more spacious kind. It also denotes "vault" or "dome": hence, by way of the Spanish, we have "alcove."

ARAB TENT, EAST OF JORDAN

The Ark of the Covenant was long sheltered in a tent (see TABERNACLE). In warfare it was customary to carry tents for the protection of the soldiers (2 K. 7.[7], &c.). The tents of Assyrian soldiers, as figured in the sculptures, are bell-shaped, and not unlike those of the Turkish soldiers at the present time. It is prob. that the tribes of Isr., devoted especially to pastoral pursuits, spent at least part of the year in tents, like the Arabs in the borderland between "the desert and the town" to-day. A tent was erected for a newly-married couple, a practice still followed among the Arabs. The name ḥuppāh still attaches to the canopy under wh. Jewish pairs are wedded.

The mod. Arab "house of hair" doubtless retains the main characteristics of the ancient tent. It is of black haircloth, spun and woven for the most part by the women, whose business also it is to pitch and strike the tents, and pack them for removal. The tent is supported on poles, 6 to 7 ft. in height, commonly nine in number, arranged in three rows of three, the middle row being slightly the highest. The poles are held in position by cords fastened to pins driven into the ground (cp. the tent-peg with wh. Jael killed Sisera). The cloth when slightly wet becomes practically waterproof. A curtain of the same material is generally stretched across the tent within, separating the women's apartment from that wh. is more public. The women's part is never entered by strangers, and anything of value is as a rule kept there.

The furniture is as simple as the dwelling. Sometimes cushions and thin mattresses are found, but often only rough straw matting is spread on the floor. The thin loaves baked in the desert are wrapped up in a sheet of leather, wh. is spread out at meal-times. Tin lamps now take the place of the ancient clay vessels. A plate of metal for baking, a few cooking pans, a hand-mill, mortar and pestle, coffee-pot and cups, and bags made of goat-skins for grain, water, milk, &c., are usually present. In a skin swung on a tripod the milk is shaken to make butter. Saddles and saddle-bags are also kept in the tent.

If the tents are few they are generally pitched in a circle. A large encampment is arranged like the streets of a village. The sheikh's tent, larger than the rest, stands where strangers are most likely to approach the camp.

In the figurative lang. of Scrip. the heavens are the blue canopy of God's great tent (Is. 40.[22]). The shepherd's tent is the symbol of man's transient life: here to-day, gone to-morrow (Is. 38.[12]). The tent-cord is a figure of the thread of life (Jb. 4.[21]). Strong cords and firm pegs suggest security (Is. 33.[20]). Enlargement of the tent, making cords longer and pegs stronger, is a picture of prosperous growth.

ST. PAUL, AQUILA AND PRISCILLA followed the trade of tentmakers (Ac. 18.[2f.]).

TERAH, s. of Nahor and fr. of Abraham, Nahor, and Haran (Gn. 11.[24ff.], &c.). A native of UR OF THE CHALDEES, he moved with his family to Haran, his son Haran having died before this migration. Apparently after his father's death in Haran Abram set out on his wanderings (12.[1ff.]). In Jo. 24.[2] he is described as an idolater, having "served other gods," "beyond the river," i.e. the Euphrates. Whether he continued to serve these gods after his migration is unknown.

TERAPHIM. This word occurs in AV. six times thus transliterated, once in Ho. 3.[4], the rest in Jg. 17. and 18.; elsewhere when the word occurs in Heb., seven times out of nine it is tr. "images" (Gn. 31.[19, 34, 35]; 1 S. 19.[13, 16]; 2 K. 23.[24]; Ek. 21.[21]); the other cases are 1 S. 15.[23] "idolatry," and Zc. 10.[2] "idols"; RV. uniformly "teraphim." The LXX have no uniform rendering; in Gn. it is eidōla, in Jg. and in 1 S. 15.[23] it is transliterated theraphin. In 1 S. 19.[13f.] there is the singular rendering kenotaphia, a tr. wh. has given rise to the idea that the Hellenistic Jews regarded the gods of the heathen as men who had died, and therefore that their images were like monuments over an empty tomb. In Ek. 21.[21] the tr. is gluptoi, "graven (images)"; the rendering in Ho. 3.[4], dēla, suggests the interpretation that T. were the Urim of the High Priest's breastplate; apophthegmenoi, the tr. in Zc. 10.[2], suggests that they were images used for incantations. Psh. usually trs. tzelma, "image"; but in Ho. 3.[4] besama, "incense," a rendering wh. suggests another reading, as also does dēla in the LXX. These T. were images occupying the place of the Lares and Penates among the Romans; they were sometimes relatively small, so that they cd. be hid in the "camel's furniture" (probably the palanquin put on a camel for women to travel in); sometimes relatively large, able to be mistaken for a man, as when Michal deceived her father's messengers. They were worshipped; for Laban calls them "my gods" ('elōhāy, Gn. 31.[30]), yet they seem to be different fm. "molten" or "graven" images (Jg. 18.[17]); this mt. suggest that they were like fetishes—not images, but objects that drew attention by their oddness. The frequency of the mention of Ephod along with T. confirms the idea suggested by LXX rendering of Zc. 10.[2], that they were used for divination.

Teraphim

Little information can be obtained fm. the etymology of the word; it seems not improbable that the rabbins have altered it to suit some shameful etymology. Fm. the fact that the Heb. "sibilant" is not infrequently represented in Aram. by the corresponding "dental," it may not be impossible that the initial ש of Seraphim has for a purpose of contempt been changed into ת. The seraphim are associated with the "cherubim" in their function of attendance on Deity, and these again are associated with the composite forms, winged bulls and winged lions, winged figures with eagle heads, &c., of Nineveh and Babylon, wh. seem to be "genii" guarding the house. May not the T. have been like those?

Although when Jacob buried "the strange gods" under the oaks at Shechem (Gn. 35.[4], E.), that implied the abandonment of the worship of T., yet such objects appear to be regarded in the narrative of Michal's device as if they were part of the regular furniture of a house—it is "the teraphim" that Michal takes (1 S. 19.[13]). The Targumic account of how Laban had formed his T. is more curious than instructive. "They had slain a man, a first-born, and cut off his head: they salted it with salt and balsams, and wrote incantations on a plate of gold and put it under the tongue, and set it up in the wall and it spake with them" (Tg. PJ., Gn. 31.[19], Etheridge's trans.).

TEREBINTH (RV.). This tree, where it grows in favourable conditions, forms a striking feature in many Palestinian landscapes. It attains at times a height of over 30 ft., and when its wide-spreading branches are covered with foliage it affords grateful shelter from the heat. Often beside solitary trees are found sacred places, tombs of saints, &c. Here, doubtless, we have an illustration of the persistence of ancient ideas. In olden times we have the "terebinth of the seer" (i.e. of Moreh, Gn. 12.[6]), the "terebinth of the soothsayers" (i.e. of Meonenim, Jg. 9.[37]), &c. It was evidently much associated with the heathen worship of the old Canaanites (Gn. 35.[4]; Jo. 24.[26]; Is. 1.[29], &c., where for "oak," AV., we must read "terebinth"). Pure turpentine may be obtained through incisions made in the bark, in the form of a resinous exudation.

In RV. it stands for Teil Tree (Is. 6.[13]), and for Elm (Ho. 4.[13]). See Oak.

TERESH, one of the officers of Ahasuerus who conspired to assassinate the king, whose plot was discovered by Mordecai (Est. 2.[21]), called "Tharra" in Ad. Est. 12.[1].

TERTIUS, the amanuensis of Paul when he wrote the Epistle to the Romans; in the middle of Paul's salutations he interpolates a salutation fm. himself (Rm. 16.[22]). He appears to have been a Roman resident in Corinth, who expects to be known by those to whom the epistle is addressed. Some have identified T. with Silas, as shālish means "a third" in Heb. as T. does in Latin. Nothing further is known of him.

TERTULLUS, the Roman rhētōr, or advocate, employed by the Jewish High Priest and the members of the Sanhedrin to be their spokesman before the court of Felix (Ac. 24.[1]). The name is a diminutive of Tertius, like Lucullus fm. Lucius, and, like it, used as an agnomen. Cases before the courts of Roman governors were usually conducted in Latin, so it wd. be the custom for those who had causes before the provincial courts to employ pleaders who were acquainted with the language as well as the laws of Rome. As a consequence of this, many pleaders attended the proconsuls and proprætors to their jurisdictions in hope of employment as causidici. We cannot infer that Tertullus was a Jew because he uses in his speech the first personal pronoun, saying, "Whom we wd. have judged accdg. to our law," since advocates then, as now, were prone in speaking to identify themselves with their clients. T. must, however, have been in Jrs., either as resident or on a visit, as he came down to Cæsarea with Ananias. Probably, therefore, he was the son of a Jewish freedman, who had become a pleader and had possibly come to Jrs. to worship. His speech, wh. is condensed by Luke, is skilfully calculated to flatter Felix, laying stress on the few praiseworthy events in his rule, and the clearance of the country fm.

robbers and fanatics. He does not particularise, but implies that all these were too well known to require more than a hint in passing. Possibly also the pompously cadence style was suited to the taste of the procurator. The pleading is specious, making it appear as if they wd. not have troubled the procurator had it not been for the interference of Claudius Lysias.

TESTAMENT. See Covenant.

TESTIMONY (Heb. 'edōth, 'edūth). In the pl. this word stands in the OT., especially in Ps. 119., for the Divine law; possibly the reference in this name is to the evidences God had given of His favour for Isr., and the occasions when He had brought these up before His people (cp. Dt. 8., 9.). T. is frequently joined with "commandments" (2 K. 23.[3]), as if the same, yet under a different aspect. It is used emphatically for the two tables of the law (Ex. 31.[18]), and for the Ark as containing them (Ex. 25.[16]). In the coronation of Jehoash it is said that Jehoiada "put on him the crown and the T." (2 K. 11.[12]; 2 Ch. 23.[11]). Wellhausen thinks that a letter has dropped out, and that it shd. be read "bracelets"; against this is the fact that the reading is the same in both Kings and Chronicles; in K. LXX has marturion, and in Ch. marturia; the Tg. Jn. has sahadutha, "testimony." All the difficulties that Wellhausen sees in the MT. must have been as patent to the ancient scribe who wrote the MS. fm. wh. the chronicler made his extract, and the copyist fm. whose MS. the LXX was trd. Royal bracelets were well enough known. There was no reason either of propriety or story to lead him to drop the letter in question, and so make what was clear difficult to understand. It seems much simpler to supply before the words "the T.," vayitten, fm. the first clause, in its ordinary sense of "gave," as is done in EV. A conjectural change of reading wh. makes the sense easier, ought never to be adopted if it is opposed to the unanimous evidence of the VV., unless a motive, obvious and undoubted, can be assigned for the falsification of the original document.

TETRARCH. The Romans, when they divided among several claimants a kingdom wh. had been ruled over by a subject ally, borrowed this term fm. the Greek. It had also quite another meaning among the Greeks fm. that given to it by the Romans; with the Spartans it meant the commander of four lochoi, or "companies." In the Roman meaning it had been used of the division of Thessaly into four parts, by Philip of Macedon. A classic case was that of Galatia, wh. was formed into no less than twelve tetrarchies; each of the three Galatian tribes being divided into four. At the death of Herod the Great his dominions were divided; Archelaus, with the title Ethnarch, had Judæa and Samaria; Herod Antipas received Galilee with Peræa; and Herod Philip, Ituræa and Trachonitis. Although the T. was inferior in rank to a king, it wd. seem that he was addressed as king by courtesy; e.g. in Mw. 14.[1]. Herod Antipas is called T., yet in v. 9 he is called "king"; and when he makes his promise to Salome he calls his dominion a "kingdom." His great ambition, and also that of his wife Herodias, was to change the courtesy royalty into actual kingship.

THADDÆUS, one of the twelve apostles, named by Matthew (10.[3]) and Mark (3.[18]). In the lists given by Luke his place is taken by Judas son of James (Lk. 6.[16]; Ac. 1.[13]). In Mw. the true reading appears to be "Thaddæus," "Lebbæus, whose surname was," being a gloss. If the scribe connected "Thaddæus" with the Aram. tad (תד), "mamma," taking thought for the dignity of an apostle he may have suggested the name connected with the Heb. lēb, "heart," perhaps as connoting similar qualities. If he is identical with Judas son of James, it was not unnatural that he shd. be distinguished from the other Judas by some epithet. That there was a second Judas among the Twelve is clear from Jn. 14.[22]: "Judas . . . not Iscariot." Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, p. 40) suggests that "Lebbæus" may be derived from the Nabatæan לבאי, and that "Thaddæus" may be equivalent to "Theudas"—not thinking it necessary to find any common significance in the two names. W. C. Allen (EB. s.v.) thinks it more prob. that "by corruption in Greek or Aramaic" Thaddæus represents an original יהו(ו)דה or יהו(ו)דא (i.e. Judas). Of James the father of Judas nothing further is known.

In fulfilment of a promise said to have been made by Jesus Christ before His death to Abgar, king of Edessa, Eusebius (HE. i. 13) reports that Thaddæus was sent by the apostle Thomas to Edessa, to preach the Gospel to the people. There he is described as one of the seventy disciples of Christ. In a later Syriac legend the name Addai replaces that of Thaddæus. Nothing is certain as to the life of Thaddæus; but there are many traditions. According to one, he died a peaceful death at Berytus in Phœnicia. By another he is said to have preached in Edessa; to have suffered crucifixion; and to have been buried in "Ostracine," in Egypt (Const. Apost. ed. Lagarde, p. 283).

THANK-OFFERING, a rendering of Heb. shelem in AVm. instead of "peace-offering" in Ek. 43.[27], 45.[15, 17]; Am. 5.[22]. It is also the tr. of Heb. tōdāh in 2 Ch. 29.[31], 33.[16], instead of the more usual rendering, "thanksgiving." See Sacrifice.

THEATRE. Fm. the position the drama occupied in the civil and religious life of Greece the T. was the most characteristic feature of a Gr. city; built entirely of stone and open to the sky, the T. has survived in many cases the all but total disappearance even of the temples of the city whose meeting-place it was. This is strikingly the case in regard to the T. of EPHESUS, the only T. mentioned in Scripture (Ac. 19.[29, 31]). The marble seats of the T. still remain, while the Temple of Diana has only been revealed by excavation. For a description of the structure and arrangements of the ancient T. see Rich, Comp. to Lat. Dict. and Gr. Lex., and Smith's Dict. of Antiq. The practice of punishing criminals in the T. occasions the use of theatron in 1 Cor. 4.[9], trd. "spectacle"; also a similar use of the verb theatrizein in He. 10.[33]; Christians regarded as criminals were made a theatrical spectacle.

THEBES. See NO-AMMON.

THEBEZ, a strong city in the territory of Ephraim opposed to Abimelech's pretensions, and therefore besieged and taken by him. In attempting then to storm the citadel in which the inhabitants had taken refuge, he was killed by an upper millstone which a woman threw down on his head (Jg. 9.[50ff.]; 2 S. 11.[21]). OEJ. places it 13 Rm. miles from Neapolis (Nāblus), on the way to Scythopolis (Beisān). We may confidently identify it with Ṭūbās, c. 10 miles fm. Nāblus, a considerable village in the midst of a fruitful district, rich in olives and corn. The water-supply is mainly from cisterns cut in the rock. The Samaritans believe that the tomb of Neby Toba, in the vill., is the burying place of Asher the patriarch.

THEFT. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

THEOPHILUS, to whom the third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles are addressed, is distinguished as kratistos, "most excellent," a title like our own "Excellency," applying to certain high officials, e.g. to Felix and Festus (Ac. 23.[26], 24.[3], 26.[25]). The probability is, therefore, that he was a Gentile citizen of Rome, and a member of the equestrian order. The name "Beloved of God," or "Lover of God," points him out as a Christian. It has been taken to be simply a common designation of a Christian; so that the writings would be addressed in effect to the Christian reader. The title "most excellent," however, renders this improbable.

THESSALONIANS, THE EPISTLES TO THE. These epistles were probably written at Corinth, at the time when Silvanus and Timothy were there with Paul. We read (Ac. 18.[5]) that "When Silas and Timothy came down from Macedonia, Paul was constrained by the Word." In 2 Cor. 1.[19] we read of Silvanus and Timothy as fellow-workers with Paul. In both epistles to the Thessalonians the names Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy are conjoined in the opening salutation. The probability is that these epistles were written when these three were working together at Corinth, some time in the years 51-53. In Ac. 17. we find Luke's account of the visit of Paul to Thessalonica, and of his work there. As his custom was, he visited the synagogue, and for three Sabbaths reasoned with them from the Scriptures. We read of the impression made on the devout Greeks and on the honourable women. But the impression made on the Jews was different. They were moved with jealousy, they gathered a crowd, and set the city in an uproar. They brought against Paul and his company the very accusation which was most likely to be listened to by the politarchs: "They all act contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus." It was the kind of accusation which was to be most frequently brought against the Christians in the years to come. For Majestas was precisely the accusation which the Roman Government most readily listened to, and which stirred them to immediate action.

When we read the Epistles to the Thessalonians, we realise how meagre is the account in Acts of Paul's work in Thessalonica. Paul's work must have lasted longer than the "three Sabbath days" there described. For from the epistles we find that his converts were Gentiles (1 Th. 1.[9-10], 2.[14]). It is best, however, to gather from the epistles themselves what was the nature of Paul's work among them, and the character of his teaching. In the synagogue he had reasoned with the Jews from the Scriptures. From the epistles we gather that his reasoning was not from the Scriptures, but from the primal elementary persuasions of the human heart, and from the convictions of the human conscience. As, at a later time, he reasoned of righteousness, and temperance, and judgment to come, until Felix was terrified, so among the Thessalonian Gentiles he reasoned of judgment, and the coming wrath, until they were afraid and eagerly listened to the message of deliverance. The burden of his message was Jesus, "which delivereth us from the wrath to come" (1.[10]). On this theme Paul seems to have dwelt in all his work among them. "The coming wrath," the deliverance therefrom, the suddenness of the coming of the day of the Lord, and its unexpectedness, were the main topics of the preaching of Paul. The impression made on the Thessalonians was very great. For in both epistles the apostle dwells on these topics, explains how they had misunderstood them, and in many ways strives to teach them the truth as he conceives it.

Paul's work among them had been cut short, and he had to be sent away. He had left them before he had grounded them completely in the faith. He was anxious to revisit them: "I would fain have come unto you, I Paul, once and again, and Satan hindered us" (1 Th. 2.[18]). Being hindered himself, he sent Timothy to help them. When Timothy had rejoined him, Paul eagerly listened to his report, and in reply sent them this epistle. He is rejoiced to know how they had so far kept the faith. He rejoiced that through them the word of God had sounded forth through all their neighbourhood. How they had received the apostle, how they had turned from idols to the service of the living God, were known through Macedonia and Achaia, but there were elements in the report of Timothy which were not pleasant or favourable. For one thing, Timothy had reported that insinuations had been made against the character and the motives of the apostle himself. Whether the source of these insinuations was Jewish or Gentile is not said, but it was hinted that Paul was like those wandering Sophists who began to teach without hire in the hope that, when an impression was made upon their hearers, fees would be forthcoming. With some warmth Paul repudiates the insinuation. He reminds them of his treatment at Philippi, of the state in which he was when he arrived at Thessalonica, of how he had laboured with his hands to support himself, of how he was among them as a nurse cherishing her children. He thus defended himself, for the truth of his message was closely bound up with the sincerity of the messenger. They had received his message as the word of God, and they had proven their sincerity in the stress of persecution.

They had indeed suffered at the hands of their own countrymen the same treatment which Jewish Christians had suffered at the hands of the Jews. Then follows the most severe indictment which Paul ever wrote against the Jews. His mind was full of resentment against the virulent opposition of his countrymen to the cause of Jesus, and against his own treatment at their hands, and he writes: "Who both killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets, and drave out us, and please not God, and are contrary to all men: forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they may be saved, to fill up their sins alway: but the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost" (2.[15-16]). Had we space, something might be said on this passage. It has been contrasted with the attitude of Paul in Romans, and stress has been laid on the phrase, "Wrath is come upon them to the uttermost." As regards the first point, account must be taken of the treatment which Paul had received at the hands of the Jews, and of the vehemence of his feeling in remembrance of that treatment. The second point has been used by Baur and many others in order to prove that the epistle must be dated after the destruction of Jerusalem. But even the destruction of Jerusalem, or any one event in history, is insufficient to justify the phrase, "Wrath is come upon them to the uttermost." Judicial blindness is the highest outcome of wrath; inability to recognise truth, or to accept it, is the most severe form of punishment, and this was the fate of the Jews.

Turning back to his personal relationship to them, he reminds them that he had not forgotten them. He had not deserted them. He had striven to return to them, but was hindered. He had sent his companions to their help, and he had remained alone in an unfriendly city. He was left behind in Athens alone. He sent Timothy, and with great feeling he tells of his gladness when Timothy brought good tidings of their faith and love. After thanksgiving and a prayer that they may be unblamable in holiness, he turns to other matters of practical importance. He raises the standard of conduct far above that to which they had been accustomed: "For this is the will of God, even your sanctification." They are, in following out their faith, to sever themselves from many practices which they had regarded as morally indifferent, and they are to study to be quiet, to mind their own business, and to walk honestly, although they did expect the speedy coming of their Lord. Paul had spoken to them, while he was yet with them, of the coming of the Lord. Jesus was the Deliverer from the coming wrath. His coming was to be sudden and unexpected. But this teaching had given rise to many questions, and some of these questions were likely put to Timothy, and he was the bearer of them to the apostle. From the reply of Paul we may gather what questions had perplexed the Thessalonian Christians. What about those who had died? And what about those who were alive at the coming of the Lord? Would those who were asleep be shut out from the glory by which His coming would be attended? These questions were answered by the apostle. Not till the dead in Christ had arisen would the living be caught up along with them to meet the Lord in the air. The main thing was that "we shall ever be with the Lord."

Nor should they be anxious concerning the times and the seasons, for the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night. But that fact need give no concern to the Christian, for they were already in the day, and the night was past. They had no concern with the things of the night: "For God appointed us not to wrath, but unto the obtaining of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with Him." With a reference to some internal difficulties that had arisen in the young community, he gives instructions by the observance of which they might be preserved without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

After the first epistle had been sent to Thessalonica, the bearer of it, or some other friend of Paul and the Thessalonian Church, had returned to Corinth, and had told the apostle of the state of matters there. The news was in some respects encouraging, and in other respects not encouraging. The Church was growing in faith and love, and Paul writes: "We ourselves glory in you in the churches of God for your patience and faith in all your persecutions, and in the afflictions which ye endure" (2 Th. 1.[4]). But the reading of the first epistle had not allayed the excitement caused by their expectation of the coming of the Lord. That excitement had been deepened by influences described by the apostle as "by spirit, or by word, or by epistle as from us," the aim of hich was to establish that "the day of the Lord is now present." He recalls the fact that while he was yet with them he had told them that the coming of the day would be heralded in by certain definite signs, and these signs he now recapitulates. The chief among them was the coming of the man of lawlessness, who for the present was held in check, but who would be fully manifested ere the coming of the end. This striking apocalyptic passage is the theme of a wide literature, and has had many interpretations. Into these we cannot enter within our limits. Nor is it necessary. For the main thing is, not the precise interpretation of the passage, but the fact that it served the purpose of teaching the Thessalonians that, while the day of the Lord would be sudden and unexpected, yet it was not imminent. They must not neglect their work, nor sit idle in the expectation that the day would soon come: rather with quietness they are to work, to eat their own bread, and not to be weary in well-doing.

In some respects these epistles are among the most remarkable of those written by the apostle. They are rich in personal interest; they reveal clearly Paul's relations with his people, his interest in them, and his missionary and pastoral methods. They reveal also the frequent intercourse he had with the churches he had founded. A close study of them makes manifest how rapid was the spread of Christianity in Europe, as the outcome of the apostle's work. If we may date the epistles during Paul's work at Corinth, as is most likely, we get a graphic picture of the spread of the Gospel in Macedonia. Not more than two years elapsed between Paul's arrival at Macedonia and the writing of these epistles. But what a tale of progress these epistles reveal within that brief period. Not to recapitulate, yet it ought to be noted that Paul describes the progress as so great that it has gone forth through Macedonia and Achaia, and also "in every place." The internal progress was also remarkable. These Christians were thinking about their faith, were asking questions, and were striving to reason out the matter. Nor is this unconnected with the burden of the message which Paul delivered. It was salvation from the coming wrath. The Lord Jesus Christ was He who delivereth from the wrath to come. It is a terrible truth. Does the Church of to-day sufficiently realise and preach it?

James Iverach.

Thessalonica from the Sea

THESSALONICA, a Macedonian city which still bears its ancient name, only without the "Thes"—Saloniki. It stood at the NE. corner of the Thermaic Gulf, and was connected with the East and the West by the great overland route, the Via Egnatia. In ancient times the site was occupied by a city called Therme, prob. on account of the hot springs found in the neighbourhood. Here Xerxes halted on his march to Greece (Herod. vii. 121, &c.). T. appears to have been rebuilt c. B.C. 315, by Cassander, and named by him in compliment to his wife, a step-sister of Alexander the Great. It prospered greatly under Roman rule, becoming capital of the province of Macedonia (constituted B.C. 146). Taking advantage of its natural position, docks were built wh. afforded facilities for merchant shipping. The great trade road ran through the city, which thus became an important and flourishing centre of commerce. Cicero here found asylum for seven months, B.C. 58. It favoured the cause of Antony and Octavian, and to this prob. owed the grant of freedom made in B.C. 42. The right of self-government thus conveyed is attested by the reference to "the people" (τὸν δῆμον) in Ac. 17.[5]. St. Luke was also aware of the title, politarch, borne by the magistrates (Ac. 17.[6, 8], EV. "rulers of the city").

There was a strong colony of Jews in the city, whom St. Paul sought to persuade of the truth of the Gospel. Far from being persuaded, they stirred up a popular tumult against him and Silas. The influence of the politarchs quieted the crowd, and the apostles at once departed, security having been given by their friends on their account. Of the Church founded here something may be learned from the EPISTLES TO THE THESSALONIANS, written later by St. Paul.

The houses of the mod. city, built on the slope of the mountain as it curves round the head of the bay, almost suggest the tiers of a gigantic theatre. The place is an important military centre; and it is interesting to note that it was the army of Saloniki wh. restored order only the other day in Constantinople.

COIN OF THESSALONICA

THEUDAS, the leader of a Jewish insurrection mentioned by Gamaliel (Ac. 5.[36]), which ended in miserable failure, himself being slain. His rising was followed by that of Judas of Galilee (v. 37), which was similarly stamped out, Judas also perishing. Of such enterprises under leaders with these names at that time we have no other record. Gamaliel's speech was certainly delivered before A.D. 37. About A.D. 45 or 46 Josephus (Ant. XX. v. 1) tells of one Theudas who, under the procuratorship of Fadus, misled a great multitude, persuading them that by prophetic power he could divide the waters of Jordan. Fadus fell upon him suddenly, and extinguished the movement in blood. In the next paragraph Jos. tells of the death of the sons of Judas of Galilee, who had caused the people to revolt in the time of Quirinius. If the insurrection of this Theudas is intended, clearly the writer of the Acts is guilty of an anachronism.

But these were stormy and unsettled days, when risings on varying scales against the Roman power were common. It need not surprise us if in this verse we have the only notice preserved of one of them. That Theudas in Josephus is a Christian interpolation, as has been suggested, is improbable.

THIEVES, THE TWO. In all the accounts of our Lord's crucifixion it is mentioned that two others were crucified with Him; these in Mw. and Mk. are called lēstai, "robbers" (RV.) or "thieves" (AV.). They probably were sicarii, rebels against the authority of Rome, who supported themselves by robbing their political opponents; not unlikely part of the dispersed band of Barabbas. Since they were hoping for "the kingdom of heaven," the kingdom of the Messiah, they wd. naturally be curious concerning JESUS; hence the penitent T. cd. appeal as to a thing well known that Jesus had "done nothing amiss." Christ's life had prepared the way for the conversion wh. His death effected. In the Apocryphal "Narrative of Joseph" the penitent T. is called Demas and his companion Gestas; in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy they are Titus and Dumachus respectively.

THIGH. The thigh is first mentioned in connection with an oath (Gn. 24.[2]). Placing the hand under the thigh evidently gave an added solemnity to the vow. This may be understood when we remember that a man's descendants are thought to come from his thigh (Gn. 46.[26], &c., Heb.). The act may thus be regarded as an appeal to posterity to avenge any failure in fulfilment of the oath.

The shrinking of the sinew in Jacob's thigh, at the touch of his mysterious antagonist, is given as the reason why the Jews abstain from eating the sinew of the hip (Gn. 32.[25, 32]). The sword was girt upon the thigh (Ex. 32.[27] RV.; Jg. 3.[16]). In the latter case a left-handed man girds the sword on his right thigh. In the jealousy trial by bitter water the woman's guilt was proclaimed by the falling away of her thigh (Nu. 5.[21], &c.). To smite upon the thigh is a sign of confusion, shame, and distress (Jr. 31.[19]; Ek. 21.[12]). The thigh is one of the choice pieces of a carcase (Ek. 24.[4]). The phrase "hip and thigh" is lit. "leg upon thigh," denoting the confusion of severed limbs (Jg. 15.[8]).

In Rv. 19.[16], "On His garment and on His thigh a name written," prob. means that the name was seen on the garment where it folded over the thigh.

THIMNATHAH, RV. TIMNAH, which see (Jo. 19.[43]).

THISTLES, THORNS, &c. Of Pal. it must be said that it brings forth thorny plants in great abundance and in almost bewildering variety. They are hardy, surviving privations from drought which are fatal to other vegetation, and during weary months they furnish partial food for camels, goats, &c. The ease and relish with which these animals devour heads and twigs, armed with the most cruel points, is nothing short of astounding. They serve as fuel, for wh. purpose they are cut, gathered into bundles, and carried home, chiefly by the women. Dry thorn bushes, held in position by heavy stones, often enclose plots of garden ground. A frequent hedge in Pal. is the prickly pear, a great shelter for venomous creatures. The horseman sometimes finds it difficult to see over the tall thistles that grow by the highway side. These spread rapidly over fallow land, and have to be burned to make way for tillage. Of certain kinds the seed is sometimes beaten out, and used as food for animals. The conditions are reflected in the language of Scrip. The names used are numerous; but for the most part it is impossible to say which plant is intended by each. No uniform tr. has been attempted in EV.

Dardar is trd. "thistles" in EV. (Gn. 3.[18]; Ho. 10.[8]), and in both cases is associated with gōtz, "thorns," or "thorn bushes." The same word in Arabic stands for "elm," dardār; but in connection with shaukeh—shauket ed-dardār—it indicates generically the thorny Centaureas, or knapweeds. It answers to the Gr. tribolos (Mw. 7.[16]; He. 6.[8]; in the second passage tribolos is rendered "brier"). Prob. the Centaurea calcitrapa, or Verutum, both common in Pal., may be intended. Hōăḥ is trd. "thistle" (2 K. 14.[9], &c.), "bramble" (Is. 34.[13] AV.), "thorn" (2 Ch. 33.[11], &c.), "hook" (Jb. 41.[2] RV.). It was a plant that might be trodden down in passing by "a beast of the field"; therefore prob. some kind of thistle, poss. Notobasis Syriaca. AVm. in Is. 17.[13] gives "thistle down" for gilgal, instead of AV. "rolling thing." In Ps. 83.[13] AV. trs. the same word "wheel." In both cases RV. trs. "the whirling dust." Thomson (LB. ed. 1881, i. 212) suggests that the "vegetable globes" of the 'akkūb, Echinops or globe-thistle, are meant.

"It throws out numerous branches of equal size and length in all directions, forming a sort of sphere or globe, a foot or more in diameter. When ripe and dry in autumn, these branches become rigid and light as a feather, the parent stem breaks off at the ground, and the wind carries these vegetable globes whithersoever it pleaseth. At the proper season thousands of them come scudding over the plain, rolling, leaping, bounding, to the dismay of both the horse and his rider."

'Aṭād is a personal name in Gn. 50.[10f.] It is trd "bramble" in Jg. 9.[14f.] (AVm. "thistle," RVm. "thorn"), and once "thorn" (Ps. 58.[9]). It prob. denotes the Rhamnus Palestina, a small thorny shrub, much used for fuel, and quite general in Pal. Barqānīm, trd. "briers" in Jg. 8.[7, 16], prob. corresponds to the plant called barqān in Egyptian Arabic, the Centaurea scoparia, a composite plant with thorny heads, common in Pal., but the meaning is uncertain. Ḥēdeq, "thorn" (Pr. 15.[19], "an hedge of thorns"); "brier" (Mi. 7.[4]). Ḥadaq in Arabic is "an enclosed garden." Some thorny plant is intended, suitable for a hedge. Na'atzūtz (Is. 7.[19], 55.[13]) is connected with the new Heb. verb nā'ạtz, "to prick," "to thrust in," &c., and prob. denotes prickly plants in general. Sīrīm are used as fuel (Ec. 7.[6]); they are a sign of desolation, growing among ruins (Is. 34.[13]); they form a barrier (Ho. 2.[6]). In Na. 1.[10] the text is corrupt. The form ṣīrōth appears in Am. 4.[2], denoting "hooks." No special identification is possible. Ṣillōn (Ek. 28.[24], "brier"), ṣallōnīm (Ek. 2.[6], "thorns"), from an unknown root, prob. denoting "thorn," or "pricking point." Ṣārābīm (Ek. 2.[6], "briers," AVm. "rebels"), prob. participle of the Aram. loan-word ṣārab, "to contradict," "to tell lies." The text is evidently corrupt. The following word shd. prob. be ṣolīm instead of ṣallōnīm. Then the phrase would read, "though they gainsay and contemn thee." Ṣirpad (Is. 55.[13], "brier") is prob. connected with sāraph = ṣāraph, "to burn," and may be a species of nettle. It is a desert plant, contrasted with myrtle. Tzinnīm (Jb. 5.[5]; Pr. 22.[5], "thorns"), tzĕnīnīm (Nu. 33.[55]; Jo. 23.[13], "thorns"), may be taken as indicating thorns generally. Qōtz is the word most frequently used for "thorns," but it also is not specific (Gn. 3.[18], &c.). Qimmōsh (Is. 34.[13]; Ho. 9.[6], "nettles"), qimmāshōn (Pr. 24.[31], "thorns"), prob. a general name for thistles and nettles. Sikkīm (Nu. 33.[55], "pricks"), from sākak, "to pierce" (sing. sēk = Arabic shauk, "thorn"). Shayith (Is. 5.[6], &c., "thorn," always associated with shāmīr, "brier"). Its derivation is unknown; but it evidently denotes thorny bushes. Shāmīr, its constant companion, is equally general in meaning.

In NT. the Gr. akanthai is the usual word for thorns (Mw. 7.[16], &c.). It is used for the thorns of wh. the soldiers made the crown (Mw. 27.[29]). Batos is the BRAMBLE (Lk. 6.[44]). Skolops is used only of the apostle's "thorn," or "stake" in the flesh (2 Cor. 12.[7]).

Tribolos, as we have seen, answers to dardar.

THOMAS. This name appears in all the lists of the Twelve Apostles. John (11.[16]) adds the note that he was "called Didymus"—i.e. "Twin." "Thomas" is simply a Greek transliteration of the Heb. tĕ'om (Gn. 25.[24], &c.), of wh. Didymus is a Greek translation. If the fourth Gospel were written for Christians who were Greek-speaking, "Didymus" would have a meaning for them, but "Thomas" would be unintelligible. It is hardly possible that "Twin" should be the personal name of the apostle. More likely it was given to distinguish him from another, or others, who bore the same name, and thus came to be ordinarily used. His own name may have been Judas, always a popular name among Jews. He is called "Judas Thomas" in the apocryphal book, Acta Thomæ. This name is also preserved by Eusebius in the story wh. says that he sent THADDÆUS to Edessa (HE. i. 13).

The information regarding Thomas preserved to us is meagre, and confined to the fourth Gospel. It presents a perfectly self-consistent picture. He was a man inclined to dark views, prone to hopelessness, with strong elements of love and courage in him. We need not suppose any unwillingness on the part of the others to share the Master's perils, although they would have Him keep out of danger's way. But it is Thomas, who, foreseeing certain disaster, prefers death with Christ to life without Him (Jn. 11.[7, 16]). Yet, mysteriously unmanned in the Garden, Thomas, like the rest, "forsook Him and fled" (Mk. 14.[50]). At the table he almost seems to resent Christ's assumption that they knew where He was going, as if their love and sorrow were not being treated quite seriously (Jn. 14.[5]). Thomas' refusal to credit the news of the resurrection was only the disbelief of a broken heart, and a withered-hope. It was "too good news to be true." Yet how ready he was to acknowledge his error, and how sublime his confession, "My Lord and my God." He was one of the company who with Peter went fishing in the Sea of Galilee (Jn. 21.[2]), where they met the risen Lord; and the last glimpse we get of him in Scrip. is in the upper room at Jerusalem (Ac. 1.[13]).

There are many legends regarding his subsequent career wh. need not be dealt with here. The Christians of St. Thomas at Malabar attribute the conversion of their ancestors to the missionary labour of Thomas the apostle in India. He is spoken of as a carpenter. He is also said to have preached in Parthia, and to have been buried in Edessa.

THRESHING. See Agriculture.

THRESHOLD. (1) 'Ăsuppīm (Ne. 12.[25]). Here we must read with RV. "storehouses of the gates." So also RV. renders the word in 1 Ch. 26.[15, 17]. (2) Saph. This is the usual word for T. (Jg. 19.[27]; 1 K. 14.[17]; Ek. 40.[6], &c.). (3) Miphtān, from a root פתן, the exact meaning of wh. is uncertain, prob. with some reference to protection or asylum. It is used only of the threshold of a sanctuary (1 S. 5.[4f.]; Ek. 9.[3], &c.). A certain sacredness attached to the T. as the seat of particular deities. The Moslems still regard it as the haunt of evil spirits. In mod. Pal. a bride is carried over the threshold of her new home, lest she should tread upon it and so entail evil fortune. The word occurs frequently in Heb. where it is not trd. "threshold" in EV. Trumbull (Threshold Covenant) maintains that we shd. read "threshold" instead of "bason" in Ex. 12.[22], i.e. the hyssop was to be dipped in the blood "at the threshold." The Heb. name of the Passover, pesah (from pāsah, "to leap" or "to dance"), may have been given to the feast because, after the sacrificial rites had been performed there, the Israelites "leaped over" the thresholds of their houses. Dagon, the Phil. god, in presence of the Ark, fell down: his head and hands, broken off, lay on the threshold of his sanctuary. The Phil. reverently stepped over the threshold consecrated by contact with these sacred members (1 S. 5.[4f.]). The custom of leaping over the threshold is referred to in Zp. 1.[9]. In ruined Nineveh desolation (perhaps with LXX we shd. read "ravens") is to sit on the thresholds. Those "that kept the door" (2 K. 12.[9], &c.) were lit. those "that guarded the threshold." Owing to the sacredness of the spot this would be an honourable duty. The post is one for wh. the exiled Psalmist longs (Ps. 84.[11]). In Is. 6.[4] we must read with RV. "the foundations of the thresholds were moved." Also with RV. in Am. 9.[1], where the temple at Bethel is referred to, we must read "smite the chapiters [or capitals] that the threshold may shake," i.e. the capitals of the columns that supported the roof.

Arm-chair or Throne (Khorsabad)

Throne: Egyptian

THRONE, the official seat of a king (Gn. 41.[40]; 1 K. 22.[10]). It trs. the Heb. kissē', wh. is used also of the seat of the High Priest (1 S. 1.[9]). It is used as equivalent to kingship, as 1 K. 1.[13f.] Alike fm. the description of Solomon's T. and fm. the representations on Egyptian and Asyr. monuments we gather that thrones were made gorgeous with gold and sculpture. God as King is represented as sitting on a T. (1 K. 22.[19]). In Col. 1.[16] thrones appear to represent some grade in the heavenly hierarchy. A similar representation is found in Rv. 20.[4].

THUMB (Heb. bōhen yad, "thumb," bōhen regel, "great toe"). Thumbs are never mentioned in Scrip. save along with great toes (Ex. 29.[20]; Jg. 1.[6], &c.). In the directions for "hallowing" those who were to minister in the priest's office, we find that the tip of the right ear and the right thumb and great toe of Aaron and his sons were to be touched with the blood of the slain ram (Lv. 8.[23], &c.). This may have signified that all within these extremities was consecrated. In the ritual for the cleansing of the leper, the same parts of him who was to be cleansed were touched with the blood of the guilt-offering, and with oil (Lv. 14.[14, 17]). Adonibezek's thumbs and great toes were cut off. The barbarity did not occasion him any surprise, nor does it appear to have roused his resentment. He had practised it himself on an extensive scale (Jg. 1.[6f.]). This mutilation was probably held to disqualify a man for the royal office, as it certainly unfitted him for military duty.

THUMMIM. See Urim.

THUNDER. The effect of thunder among lofty mountains and deep valleys such as those of Pal. is always awe-inspiring. Thunder-storms with heavy rain are not infrequent in winter; but from the end of March till October, during the cloudless months, they are seldom witnessed. Thunder in the time of the wheat harvest was a portent (1 S. 12.[17f.]). The Heb. word for T. is ra'am, but very frequently it is spoken of as "the voice of the Lord." Thus in 1 S. 7.[10] "the Lord thundered with a great voice" (Heb. qōl). It was a speech that might be understood (Jn. 12.[28f.]; cp. Mw. 3.[17], &c.). The thunder was regarded as being subject to the control and direction of God (Jb. 28.[26], &c.). He used it, accompanied with hail, to terrify and punish the Egyptians (Ex. 9.[23], &c.), and in overwhelming the Philistines (1 S. 7.[10]). The people were awed by the thunders of Sinai (Ex. 19.[16], &c.) Thunders and lightnings are the symbols of God's resistless might (Ps. 18.[13], &c.) and terrific vengeance (Is. 30.[30]). The impression made on the poetic soul by a thunderstorm in Pal. is marvellously portrayed in the 29th Psalm.

THYATIRA. In the district of Northern Lydia, in the mouth of the long vale which connects the valley of the Caicos on the N. with that of the Hermes on the S., lay the city of Thyatira, on the left bank of a stream wh. flows into the Lycus. This vale has always furnished easy means of communication between the two valleys. One of the great trade routes of Asia Minor traversed it in ancient times, as the railway does to-day. It was the main avenue of intercourse between Pergamum in the days of its greatness, and all the regions to the SE.

From its position in the middle of the vale T. could never be a place of great military strength, but it was of high strategic importance. It was built by Seleucus I. (Nicator), king of Syria, at a date not exactly determined, shortly after B.C. 300. The site was previously occupied by a temple, round wh. a few inhabitants had gathered. It marked the boundary of Seleucus' territory in this direction, the Caicos valley being evidently in the hands of Lysimachus, to whom Western Asia Minor then belonged. When the kingdom of Pergamum was founded (B.C. 282), the possession of T. became an object of rivalry between it and Syria, a strong garrison here being able to guard the road in the interests of the dominant power. It was the seat of a "Macedonian colony" (Strabo, 625), consisting mainly, no doubt, of the soldiers of Alexander the Great and their children. The name signifies "village (teira) of Thya." A fanciful derivation was suggested from Thugateira, a name thought to be given because here Seleucus heard of the birth of his daughter (thugatēr).

As might be expected from its position on the great trade route, T. was a considerable centre of trade and commerce. The manufacture of woollen cloth, and especially of dyed fabrics, was a staple industry. In this connection Lydia is mentioned (Ac. 16.[14]). She prob. represented in Philippi a Thyatiran trade guild or company. The "purple" there spoken of was almost certainly the turkey-red dye, extracted from the madder root, wh. is plentiful in that region. The inscriptions also refer to guilds of "linen-workers, makers of outer garments, dyers, leather-workers, tanners, potters, bakers, slave-dealers and bronze-smiths. The dealers in garments and the slave-dealers would have a good market in a road-centre."

It may be taken as certain that there was a settlement of Jews in the city. Their value in promoting the prosperity of trade was generally recognised. Lydia, who is described as "God-fearing," probably came under the influence of the synagogue here. No clear account of the Thyatiran religion is yet possible. The hero-god Tyrimnos, as represented on the coins, with his strange mingling of names, evidently embodied characteristics of both Greek and Anatolian deities. He often appears as "a standing figure, wearing only a cloak (chlamys) fastened with a brooch round his neck, carrying a battle-axe over one shoulder, and holding forth in his right hand a laurel-branch, wh. symbolises his purifying power." Games were celebrated in T., modelled upon the Pythian games of Greece. In the worship connected with them the emperor Elagabalus was associated with Tyrimnos. A coin represents the emperor clasping hands with the god. The popular religion of Asia, and that of Rome, were thus drawn into closer relations.

The letter to the Church at T. (Rv. 1.[11], &c.) is the most difficult of interpretation. Allusions wh.

were quite intelligible to the Thyatirans are to us obscure because of our ignorance of facts and conditions referred to. Some have thought that "the woman Jezebel" who is so sternly denounced may have been the sibyl of some shrine, where elements of Pagan, Hebrew, and Christian worship were combined. Others think that some unworthy development of Christianity in the Church, heretical and impure, is referred to, such as might be typified by the woman who sought of old to lead Israel into evil ways. Sir Wm. Ramsay argues for the view that the woman was a prophetess of broad and liberal sympathies, whose teaching the apostle saw was likely to lead to disastrous issues.

THYINE WOOD

At the time when the Seven Letters were written T. was still a comparatively small city. The opportunities afforded by the Pax Romana were improved, and for a time the city prospered greatly. Soon, however, it is lost sight of, and we know nothing of its subsequent history, although this must have been exciting and varied in a high degree. In the tides of war that have so often swept over the country its rôle must have been for the most part that of sufferer. The irony of its fate is illustrated by the fact that, commanding the approach to a rich country, it could never successfully resist a powerful attack; yet the conqueror, in order to make good his possession, must of necessity at once rear its fortifications afresh. The mod. town, Ak-Hissar, on the old site, has a population of c. 20,000.

Lit.: Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches, 316ff.; artt. HDB. and EB. s.v.

THYINE-WOOD, an article of merchandise in the Apocalyptic Babylon (Rv. 18.[12]), is the θυία of the Greeks, the Lat. citrus. The Gr. name suggests aromatic qualities. The θυία was found in the Atlas region (Pliny, XIII. xv. 29). It is prob. identical with the Thuia articulata, a tree resembling the cypress, and growing to a height of 24 or 25 ft. The brown, hard, durable, and fragrant wood of this tree was greatly prized for finer cabinet work.

TIBERIAS. The city of Tiberias lay on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee, about midway between N. and S.; and nearly opposite the fortress of Gamala. At this point the mountains recede from the beach, leaving a plain of irregular crescent shape, about two miles long. Here, c. A.D. 26, Herod Antipas founded a new city, and in compliment to the emperor Tiberius, his benefactor, called it Tiberias. It covered the southern part of the plain, as is shown by the existing ruins, and so came near to the site of the ancient HAMMATH, represented by el-Ḥammeh, the hot baths, about two miles S. of the mod. town. Prob. it was the tombs in the burying-ground of Ḥammath that had to be removed in preparing part of the foundations (Ant. XVIII. ii. 3). Herod's palace, "the golden house," was built on the crest of a rocky hill, c. 500 ft. high, to the W. A strong wall enclosing the city and the palace ran along the western slope and down to the shore. This may still be traced along most of its course. There are also traces of a sea-wall with formidable towers. Whether or not it covered any part of the site of ancient RAKKATH or CHINNERETH, with both of wh. it is identified in the Talmud (Neubauer, Geog. d. Tlm. 208), must remain an open question. The Jews (Nu. 19.[16]) were naturally averse to entering a city any part of wh. covered an old cemetery. In order to find a population for his new city Antipas had to be content with a mixed multitude, mainly of the poorer people, foreigners, and others who were "not quite freemen." And these he attracted to dwell there by furnishing them with good houses and land. It may be regarded as practically a Greek city at first, with a stadium, a palace which had in it "figures of living creatures," and a senate (BJ. II. xxi. 6; Vit. 12, &c.). There was also a commodious proseuchē, or Jewish place of prayer, within the city (Vit. 54). From the prevailingly Greek character of the city it is not surprising that it appears so little in the Gospel story (Jn. 6.23). It was, however, of sufficient importance to give its name to the sea (Jn. 6.1, 21.1), even as it does to-day. Standing on the white strand, washed by the blue waters of the lake, with its walls and towers, its colonnades, public buildings and open spaces, with marble statues, dominated from the western hill by the splendid palace of the tetrarch, it must have formed a picture of singular beauty.

TIBERIAS: PART OF OLD FORTIFICATION TO SEA

After the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) it became a favourite resort of Jews. The Sanhedrin, wh. had been moved first to Sepphoris, was transferred in the second cent. to Tiberias. Here, some time before A.D. 220, under the supervision of the famous Rabbi Jehudah ha-Nasi, "Judah the prince," or, as he is also called, haq-Qōdesh, "the Holy," the civil and ritual laws, decrees, customs, &c., held to be of binding obligation, handed down by tradition, but not having Scriptural authority, were codified and written down, under the title of Mishna. Here also later was compiled the Jerusalem Talmud (Yerushalmi as distinguished from that compiled in Babylon—Babli). The city thus became a great centre of Jewish learning. The tomb of Maimonides is still shown to the NW. of the present town, and that of Aqība on the slope of the mountain further west.

TIBERIAS

T. became the capital of Galilee, a position hitherto held by Sepphoris. It continued to be the seat of government under Agrippa I. and under the Roman procurators. Its Jewish inhabitants distinguished themselves by their strenuous opposition to the desire of Gaius to have his statue erected in the Temple (Ant. XVIII. viii. 3ff.). It surrendered to Vespasian on his advance agst. it with three legions. T. was gifted by Nero to Agrippa II., who again moved the government to Sepphoris. The part it played during the Jewish rebellion (A.D. 66) shows that the population had become prevailingly Jewish. Their objection to residence there having been got over, it was destined, from being contemned, to become one of their holy cities. On the death of Agrippa II. (A.D. 100) it passed under the direct control of Rome.

T. was the seat of a bishop under Constantine. It was taken by the Arabs in 637. Captured by Tancred, who erected a church in the city, it was lost by the Crusaders after the battle of Ḥaṭṭīn (A.D. 1187). By treaty with the Sultan of Damascus it passed into Christian hands again in A.D. 1240. In 1247 it was taken by the Sultan of Egypt, and has ever since remained under Moslem power.

The mod. town, Ṭabarīyeh, stands at the NE. corner of the plain, some of the front walls actually rising out of the water. The enclosing walls are those of Tancred. They were repaired by Sheikh Ḍāher el-'Omar in 1738. Sad havoc was made of them by the earthquake of 1837, a catastrophe wh. wrought terrible destruction in the city. The ruined castle, wh. must have been a position of considerable strength, stands on rising ground to the NW., and just under it, overlooking the sea, are the premises of the United Free Church of Scotland's Mission, comprising well-equipped hospital, schools, &c. Towers at intervals along the walls, and also along the sea front, strengthened the defences. The inhabitants number between 4000 and 5000, and are mainly Jews. The fishing industry is pursued by Moslems and Christians, who now own a fleet of over twenty boats. The Jews are the chief merchants; but many of them are devoted to the practices of piety, reading, and prayer, and are supported by contributions sent by their fellow-religionists in other lands. Tiberias is the only innabited place of consequence round the lake, and is therefore the market town for a wide district. It has for many years had a governor (qaim-maqām) under the Pasha of Acre. The lake furnishes the main water-supply, but there are cisterns for rain-water under many of the houses, and the water from a spring on the slope to the west is greatly appreciated. Many descriptions of the town are entirely misleading. In matters of cleanliness and sanitation it is quite Oriental; and no worse than many places wh. have less to excuse their conditions. In summer it is very hot, the temperature in sirocco reaching 114° Fah. in the shade. But during the greater part of the year it is fairly healthy. The worst season is at the beginning of the rains, when the impurities gathered on the ground during the dry months are washed into the lake, and the people are not sufficiently careful as to the water they use.

Tomb of Maimonides, Tiberias

The extensive ruins that strew the plain between the mod. city and the hot baths would probably well repay excavation. The Arab name for the ruins of Herod's castle—Qaṣr bint el-Melek, "palace of the king's daughter"—suggests a possible connection with the daughter of Herodias (Mw. 14.[6], &c.).

TIBERIUS, the step-son, son-in-law, and successor of Augustus as Roman emperor. Reckoning fm. the death of Augustus, T. reigned fm. A.D. 14 to 37; but if his rule is to be regarded as counting fm. the date when his step-father associated him in empire, his reign will be two years longer. He was an able general but of a cynical disposition. He assumed as prime favourite Sejanus, who had saved his life, but he proved unworthy of confidence, and the emperor became more and more suspicious of mankind; hence the sting in the retort of the Jews to Pilate, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend" (Jn. 19.[12]). T. has had the misfortune to have his character drawn by Tacitus, who hated him, and by Suetonius, who cared only for scandal; a careful study of these writers enables one to read between the lines, and find a man soured by circumstance, who yet really desired to do his duty.

TIBHATH, a city of Hadarezer, from wh. "David took very much brass" (1 Ch. 18.[8]). The name is given as "Betah" in 2 S. 8.[8], where we ought prob. to read with the Syr. "Tebah," wh. occurs in Gn. 22.[24] as the name of a son of Nahor. The site is unknown; but must possibly be sought to the east of the Anti-Lebanon range.

Mosque of Tiberias

TIBNI, s. of Ginath, who opposed Omri's claim to the throne of Isr., half of the people following him (1 K. 16.[21f.]). On Tibni's death Omri was left in possession. The LXX speaks of a brother of Tibni, called Joram, who died with him.

TIDAL, "king of nations," one of the allies of Chedorlaomer in his campaign against Sodom (Gn. 14.[1f.]). He has been identified with Tudghula, king of Gutium, mentioned in a cuneiform tablet found by Dr. Pinches as contemporary with Eri-aku (Arioch), king of Larsa (Ellasar), and Ḥammurabi (Amraphel). Chedorlaomer has been identified with Kudur-Lagamar, mentioned as a contemporary of these previously named. Dr. Cheyne thinks it hazardous because it involves making g correspond with ע in לָעֹמֶר (-la'omer), as if that correspondence were not made by LXX in this passage when it calls him Χοδολλογομόρ.

Tiberius with Toga

TIGLATH-PILESER (in Asyr. Tugulti-pal-Esarra), the third monarch of that name in Assyria. As there is no mention of his father, it is probable that he was a prominent general under Assurnirari and usurped the throne, possibly putting his predecessor to death. As king of Babylon he is called Pul, wh. may have been his own name; T. was a name he assumed on ascending the throne in April B.C. 745, as it had already been borne by two famous kings in the past. He was a man of great military and administrative ability; he kept the sensitive Babylonians at peace by reigning over them as their own king, and to them using his own name of Pul. His first campaign was to deliver them fm. the Aramæan tribes that were pressing in upon Babylonia, and then he was saluted k. of Sumer and Akkad. He definitely turned his arms to the W. Menahem became one of his tributaries, as also Rezin, k. of Damascus.

It is a question with whom T. has dealings in this expedition, whether the Azrijahu of Jaudi is Azariah (Uzziah), k. of Judah, or a king of Ja'adi; in the Panammu inscription in Sinjirli there is no name given to the king dispossessed by T. in favour of Panammu; it is unscientific to invent a king to suit. The military activity of Azariah was indeed extensive; but it was probably as an ally of T. that he warred against the Philistines, &c. Some previous relation between the kdm. of Judah and Asyr. is implied in Ahaz's appeal to T. (2 K. 16.[7]).

The revolution in the Northern Kdm. of Isr. wh. set Pekah on the throne of Samaria appears to have coincided with a confederacy being formed against Asyr.; the refusal of Ahaz to join it was the occasion of the determined assault made on the kdm. of Judah by Pekah and Rezin wh. led to the appeal to T. by Ahaz already referred to. In this campaign T. besieged Damascus, and, apparently masking it, he proceeded to the conquest of Gilead and Galilee, deporting the inhabitants. At Damascus he held a court, at wh. a number of his subject allies were present, and among them Ahaz of Judah, to celebrate the capture of the city and the death of Rezin. T. may have visited Jerusalem about this time. He certainly carried on campaigns in Philistia and Phœnicia, and so a visit to his ally wd. be quite in course. Hanun of Gaza, who had attended the "durbar" at Damascus, seems to have been dissatisfied in some way, and, becoming suspect by T., he fled into Egypt. After this T. had to march into Babylonia to repress the Chaldæans and Aramæans and arrange matters with deputy-kings he had set up in Babylon. In 728 he received the crown fm. the hands of Bel, and thus was consecrated king of Babylon, a ceremony wh. he does not seem to have performed before. About this time Merodach-Baladan appears as sending an embassy to T. In December of the following year the great conqueror passed away. He was succeeded by Shalmaneser IV., who possibly was his son.

Tiglath-Pileser I. (From rock tablet near Korkhar.)

TIKVAH. (1) Father of Shallum the husband of Huldah (2 K. 22.[14]), called "Tikvath" in 2 Ch. 34.[22] AV. (2) Father of Jahaziah (Ez. 10.[15]), called "Theocanus" in 1 Es. 9.[14].

TILE, TILES. (1) The "tile" of Ek. 4.[1] is a brick, i.e. a soft piece of clay on wh. the diagram is impressed with a stylus or other pointed instrument. The brick is then put into the oven and baked hard. Thus the plan becomes permanent. (2) The "tiles" (RV.) or "tiling" (AV.) of Lk. 5.[19] are the equivalent of "roof" in Mk. 2.[4]. It seems prob. that St. Luke adapted the expression to the understanding of readers familiar with tiled roofs, but not with the methods of roofing practised in Pal.

TILGATH-PILNESER. See TIGLATH-PILESER.

TILON, a Judahite, son of Shimon (1 Ch. 4.[20]).

TIMÆUS, father of the blind man, Bar-Timæus, healed by Jesus (Mk. 10.[46]).

TIMBREL. See MUSIC.

TIME. Questions regarding the Calendar are discussed under YEAR; more limited periods are considered under DAY, HOUR, and MONTH respectively. There are, however, two words, one Aramaic, 'iddan, and the other Heb., mo'ed, and their Greek equivalent, kairos. The first of these naturally is restricted to Daniel, and is used in different senses in different chapters. In 2.[8] it appears to mean an indeterminate "space of time"; this, however, is rendered doubtful since the word "time" is in the emphatic state, that is, it has the definite article; the verb, too, means "to purchase." The word may thus mean "the time when there was a favourable conjunction" in the astrological sense. Nebuchadnezzar accused the astrologers of meaning to buy "the favourable conjunction" for themselves at his expense. This is certainly the meaning of the word in the following v.: "till the time be changed" can only mean "till the favourable conjunction shall have passed away." The natural meaning of the word in v. 21 is the same; God is the source of the apparent movement of the sun through the constellations of the Zodiac, and therefore of the succession of the seasons: "He changeth the times and the seasons." As, however, this is followed by "removeth kings and setteth up kings," it is clear that the astrological aspect bulks most largely in the mind of the writer. With regard to the madness of Nebuchadnezzar, three times is it declared that his madness shall last until "seven times shall pass"; this clearly indicates a space of time without defining it, probably "a month" (see Daniel, Pulpit Commentary, pp. 146–149). The prophetic portion of Daniel gives this term another aspect (Dn. 7.[25]): "until a time, times, and a dividing of times"; evidently this also means a space, not necessarily, though probably, a year. The Heb. phrase occurs in 12.[7], and the same remarks apply. In Revelation (12.[14]) we have the same phrase in Greek with evidently the same force. Students of Apocalyptic on the futurist conception, or as they call themselves "Students of Prophecy," assume that a day in these prophetic numbers stands for a year, a theory certainly in accordance with the "weeks of years" so dominant in Jewish Apocalyptic, yet wh. cannot, we shd. think, be accepted absolutely. It is true that in not a few cases the results of the application have satisfied those that made use of it; but to expect to find an almanac-like accuracy in it seems to us to misconceive totally the nature and purpose of prophecy.

TIMNA. (1) A concubine of Eliphaz the son of Esau, mother of Amalek (Gn. 36.[12]). (2) Dr. of Seir and sister of Lotan (Gn. 36.[22]). (3) A phylarch of Edom (Gn. 36.[40]; 1 Ch. 1.[51] AV. wrongly "Timnah").

TIMNAH. (1) A city on the border of Judah (Jo. 15.[10]), reckoned to Dan (Jo. 19.[43], "THIMNATHAH"). It lay between EKRON and BETH-SHEMESH, and is prob. identical with the mod. Tibneh, wh. stands to the S. of Wādy eṣ-Sarār, c. 18 miles W. of Jerusalem, two miles south-west from BETH-SHEMESH. In the days of Samson it was in the hands of the Phil. (Jg. 14.[1]). Here Samson found and married his Philistine wife. The "vineyards" and olive groves that still cover the slopes N. of Tibneh, doubtless mark the neighbourhood where he met and slew the lion (vv. 5f.). It was probably taken during the victorious campaign of Uzziah (2 Ch. 26.[6ff.]), but in the time of Ahaz the Phil. captured it again (28.[18]). Sennacherib, after the defeat of the Egyptians at Elteke, occupied the town, wh. appears as Tamnā in the inscrips. (2) The town to wh. Judah "went up unto his sheep-shearers" (Gn. 38.[12ff.]). It may be represented by the ruin Tibna, about eight miles to the W. of Bethlehem. It is possible, however, that this may be identical with (1). (3) Timnah appears in AV. of Gn. 36.[40] for Timna, one of the "dukes" of Edom (cp. 1 Ch. 1.[51]).

TIMNATH-HERES, TIMNATH-SERAH. These two names indicate the one place, "Heres" in Jg. 2.[9] simply reversing the letters in "Serah" (Jo. 19.[50], 24.[30]). It was a city in Mount Ephraim assigned to Joshua, described as lying to the N. of the MOUNTAIN OF GAASH. This mountain cannot now be identified. In Timnath-Serah Joshua was buried. It is called Thamna by Josephus, and poss. answers to Thamnatha of 1 M. 9.[50]. This latter, however, is assigned to Judæa. It was reduced to slavery by Cassius (Ant. XIV. xi. 2). Later it became head of a Jewish toparchy (BJ. III. iii. 5; IV. viii. 1). In each case it is named with LYDDA and EMMAUS. OEJ. places it at Tibneh, c. 14 miles NE. of Ludd, and seven miles NW. of Gophna (Jifneh), with wh. it is also named. In Jerome's time the tomb of Joshua was pointed out there. This may be identical with a large tomb, on the S. of the Roman road fm. Jerusalem to Cæsarea, wh. contains fourteen loculi, and a small chamber behind with one loculus. There are no fewer than 200 small niches for lamps round the exterior of the tomb, showing in what high honour it is held.

According to the Samaritans Joshua was buried in Kefr Ḥāris, c. 10 miles S. of Nāblus, in which we may have a survival of only the second element in the name. Of two sanctuaries found here one is sacred to Neby Kifl, "prophet of the portion," a title that might apply to Joshua.

TIMON, one of the seven chosen by the disciples at the request of the apostles, and appointed to supervise the business of the daily distribution (Ac. 6.[5]). Nothing further is heard of him in Scrip. For legends regarding him see Acta Sanctorum, April 19.

TIMOTHEUS, a variant form of Timothy, which see.

TIMOTHY, the young friend and fellow-labourer of St. Paul. He was a native of Lystra, his mother Eunice being a Jewess, and his father a Greek. Of the latter nothing more is known; possibly he was dead before St. Paul and Timothy met. Under the influence of his mother and his grandmother Lois he was trained in the Scriptures from his earliest years (2 Tm. 1.[5], 3.[15]), but, owing to his Greek paternity, he was not circumcised. There is no definite statement as to the time and agent of his conversion. It seems, however, a fair interpretation of 1 Cor. 4.[14-17] that St. Paul claims him as the fruit of his own ministry. He may therefore have been won when the apostle first visited his native city. If this be so, he may have witnessed the deeds of power, the humility, and the sufferings of St. Paul (Ac. 14.[6ff.]), wh. could not fail to make a deep impression (2 Tm. 3.[10f.]). When St. Paul again visited Lystra time enough had elapsed to prove his fidelity. He was a disciple well reported of by the brethren. He so gained the apostle's affection and confidence as to be chosen by him as travelling companion and helper. For this work he seems also to have been pointed out by prophecy (1 Tm. 1.[18]), and he was ordained by laying on of hands by the elders (1 Tm. 4.[14]), St. Paul being associated with them (2 Tm. 1.[6]). At some point in this solemn service Timothy made his confession of faith (1 Tm. 6.[12]). As the son of a Greek father Timothy did not come under the obligation to be circumcised, but by circumcising him St. Paul removed what might have been an obstacle to success in work among the Jews. The apostle had no cause to regret his choice (Php. 2.[22]). Timothy went with St. Paul across to Europe in obedience to the vision seen at Troas, and is next named when the apostles reach Berœa (Ac. 17.[14]), whence he follows St. Paul to Athens. From Athens he was sent to establish and comfort the Thessalonians who were suffering persecution (1 Th. 3.[1ff.]). He brought a favourable report to the apostle at Corinth. Here he took his share in preaching (2 Cor. 1.[19]), and prob. acted as amanuensis in writing the letters to the Thessalonians. He is next mentioned at Ephesus (Ac. 19.[22]), whence he was sent to Corinth (1 Cor. 4.[17]), and in the letter written soon after St. Paul shows some anxiety as to his reception (1 Cor. 16.[10f.]). Timothy and his companion going by way of Macedonia (Ac. 19.[21f.]), if this letter were sent by ship it would reach Corinth before them. He had joined the apostle in Macedonia, where the second letter to the Corinthians was written (2 Cor. 1.[1]), and was a fellow-worker with him in Corinth, when the letter to the Romans was penned (Rm. 16.[21]). He accompanied St. Paul when he set out on his last journey to Jerusalem (Ac. 20.[4f.]). He is found with St. Paul in Rome during his imprisonment (Php. 1.[1]; Col. 1.[1]; Phm.[1]). After St. Paul was set free he and Timothy were together in Ephesus, and there Timothy remained as the apostle's representative, armed with full authority to preserve order and discipline in the Church (1 Tm. 1.[3], &c.). During St. Paul's second imprisonment he sent for Timothy (2 Tm. 4.[9, 21]). This probably led to Timothy's own arrest, as we read at a later time of his being set at liberty (He. 13.[23]). Nothing further is directly said of him in Scrip. Some think he may have been the angel of the Church in Ephesus to whom the message in Rv. 2.[1ff.] is addressed. Eusebius says that he was martyred in Ephesus in a popular riot (HE. iii. 46).

TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO. The Epistles to Timothy and that to Titus are known as the Pastoral Epistles (Lat. pastor = shepherd). They are so called because they consist largely of elaborate instructions for the appointment of officers and the pastoral care of the Christian churches. These epistles form a distinct group among the New Testament epistles, and show many points of contact with one another and with the Pauline epistles, from the latter of which, however, there are numerous departures both in diction and subject-matter. They are private letters of an official stamp, standing half-way between the Pauline epistles to communities (e.g. Romans, Galatians) and the personal note to Philemon. 1 Tm. and Tt. resemble each other more closely in structure and similarity of ideas (e.g., cp. 1 Tm. 1.[1, 2] with Tt. 1.[1-4]; 1 Tm. 3.[1-7] with Tt. 1.[6-9]; 1 Tm. 5.[1-2] with Tt. 2.[2-6], &c.); they are more pastoral, the official element is more pronounced and the personal less, and on the whole they fall behind 2 Tm. in earnestness and grandeur. 2 Tm. is the most personal of the three; it is the grandest and the most Paul-like.

These epistles, because of their near kinship to one another, their striking parallels with, as well as their many points of departure from, the acknowledged Pauline letters, their philological and historical difficulties, have given rise to much discussion, in which the most disputed question is the Authorship.—Are the Pastorals written by Paul himself or by some one else, steeped in his style, impersonating him? For Pauline authorship we have the following considerations: (a) They are professedly written by Paul and bear his name. (b) They are thoroughly Pauline in form and structure, address and greeting, the body of the letter, many personal notes, salutation and benediction. The parallelisms with the Pauline epistles, especially Romans, and 1 and 2 Corinthians, are many and often close (e.g. 1 Tm. 1.[5] with Rm. 13.[10]; 1 Tm. 1.[8] with Rm. 7.[16]; 1 Tm. 4.[4] with 1 Cor. 10.[30]; 2 Tm. 2.[11, 12] with Rm. 6.[8]; Tt. 1.[15] with Rm. 14.[20]; see lists in art. in HBD.). Those who deny Pauline authorship say that these parallelisms are the work of a forger who had a comprehensive knowledge of the Pauline style. (c) The Pastorals are addressed to those whom we know only from the Pauline epistles and the story of Paul in Acts, and who were intimately associated with Paul in the work of founding and organising churches, and the work of organisation in the Pastorals is on the same lines as that touched on in the epistles of Paul; cp. Php. 1.[1]; 1 Th. 5.[12]; Rm. 16.[1]; 1 Cor. 12f.; Ac. 20.[1, 28]. (d) The spirit and much of the theology are Pauline, as the function of law, the doctrine of grace, salvation for all men, necessity of faith, dying with Christ to live a new life. It is true we find in the Pastorals other aspects of truth emphasised, e.g. insistence on good works, but the same holds true of particular Pauline epistles, as the person of Christ in Col. (e) We have early and sufficient attestation, as early as we should expect for private letters. In the Muratorian Fragment (c. A.D. 170) all three are given to Paul (ad Titum unam, et ad Timotheum duas), and in the Peshitta (Syriac version) of the second century. Noteworthy is the fact that we have the belief of the important centres of early Christianity, Tertullian representing North Africa, Clement of Alexandria Egypt, and Irenæus the East with Gaul and Rome, all quoting the Pastorals as Pauline. (f) By no means the least important evidence are the many personal notes and seeming improbabilities where it would be difficult for a forger to be successful. Indeed these trivialities seem to defy explanation on any but authentic Pauline authorship. In 2 Tm. 1.[3] we have a Pauline note. He there thanks God " night and day " on behalf of Timothy, as he does in his epistles (except Gal.), and follows it in verse 8 with an exhortation not to be ashamed of the Gospel. Is it likely that a forger would have hit upon both these characteristics? (Salmon). There is a seeming contradiction between 4.[11] and 4.[21], but the writer means that only Luke remains of his travelling companions. It would be highly improbable that a forger should send Titus to Dalmatia instead of Crete (2 Tm. 4.[10]). Neither would he speak so friendly of Mark (4.[11]), and most unlikely would one represent a man, the time of whose departure is come, sending for a cloak, books, and parchments from Troas. It is true these all occur in 2 Tm., but if 2 Tm. is Pauline, all three are, for it is practically agreed that the Pastorals must stand or fall together.

Agst. Pauline authorship are urged: (a) That the external evidence is unsatisfactory, being too late and the references too uncertain; but this may be due to the fact that the Pastorals are more private and personal, and therefore not likely to be either so universally or so early known. But the external evidence is on the whole quite as good as that for several of the other canonical books. (b) The improbability of Paul writing in such a way to Timothy and Titus. How could Paul use such formal greetings to those who were his fellow-workers, and whom he had seen quite recently and hoped to see again in the near future, while he drops this formality to Philemon? Why should he give an almost scholastic account of his ecclesiastical economy to those who for years must have been familiar with his views on these as on other matters? Had he forgotten to give instructions, if such were necessary, when he left them at their posts? But Paul, nearing the end of life and burdened with toil and cares, may have heard in the interval of the dangers that were threatening, and, with an old man's anxiety, wished to leave a written record for Church government, not only for the present but for the future. And Paul wrote other acknowledged epistles when he hoped soon to see the addressees (1 Cor. 4.[19]; 1 Th. 2.[18], 3.[10]). Must he tell Timothy that he had left him in Ephesus, and Titus that he had left him in Crete? But this need be no more than the aged apostle reminding them of their responsibility. And to the spiritual overseer of Ephesus he says, " Let no man despise thy youth " (1 Tm. 4.[12]), and again, " Flee youthful lusts " (2 Tm. 2.[22]), though he had long entrusted him with difficult missions. Timothy had apparently failed on one mission (to Corinth), much to Paul's disappointment, so Paul may not have had so much confidence in Timothy as he felt affection toward him. And Timothy, though not a young man, was young for the important office he held. (c) The impossibility of finding time and place for these epistles in the recorded life of Paul (see under separate epistles). All attempts to make the date of the Pastorals tally with the facts of Acts and the Pauline epistles have failed. We must, therefore, have recourse to the unrecorded remainder of the apostle's life. Those who deny Pauline authorship say we have no evidence for an acquittal and further activity of Paul after the " two whole years " (Ac. 28.[30]). If this were true, neither have we any to the contrary. So that the hypothesis of a second imprisonment is on as good footing as its rival, or better, for we have more reason to accept the former. (1) The Pastorals. If they were written by Paul, he speaks for himself; if un-Pauline, they at least represent the conviction of a writer thoroughly familiar with Pauline affairs, and imply the same belief on the part of the churches to which they were addressed (for the name Timothy is then the only fiction of the clever pseudo-Paul). (2) The sanguine hopes entertained by Paul for his own release (Php. 1.[25, 26], 2.[24]; Phm.[22]). (3) Clement of Rome (who may possibly have been Paul's disciple and fellow-worker), writing to Corinth from Rome, and in the first century, says (1.[5]) that Paul had preached in the East and in the West, and that he had journeyed before his martyrdom to the extremity of the West (τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως). (4) The Muratorian Fragment speaks of a journey of Paul to Spain (sed et profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis). (5) The persistence of this belief in later writers. Chrysostom, Jerome, and others understand 2 Tm. 4.[16] as implying acquittal, and Eusebius (HE. ii. 22) says " report holds " that Paul went a second time to Rome; cp. Paul's intention in Rm. 15.[28]. (6) Acts is by no means a complete narrative of Paul's life: the author passed over some events of importance, e.g. about Corinth, as we learn from 2 Cor. Luke left his Gospel incomplete, to be supplemented by Acts, and perhaps he had similar intentions of supplementing Acts. (7) Before A.D. 64—and Paul was released early in A.D. 63—there was no special reason for severity against the Christians, and they were not till after that date regarded as distinct from the Jews. (8) More difficulties are explained and less new ones are raised by the hypothesis of a release and second imprisonment. (d) The heresies referred to in the Pastorals. The addressees were familiar with the tenets of the false teachers, so the writer had not reason to elaborate. Hence we find ourselves in the difficulty of lack of sufficient detail, and our knowledge of the teaching of that day is too scanty. Are the false teachers Judaistic or Gnostic, or Judæo-Gnostic? Do they represent one system or several? Is the same system combated in each of the Pastorals? It was probably some kind of Gnosticism with emphasis on " knowledge," the " endless genealogies " being the succession of æons; matter is evil, hence abstinence is the law. But there was an undoubted mixture of Judaism—" a Jewish form of Gnosticism " (Plummer). The main tendency is " that of a rabbinic speculative Judaism, playing with historical legends and casuistry, and coloured with an asceticism borrowed from some heathen source, perhaps through Essenism " (Lock in HBD.). The problem for Pauline authorship is to account for such perversions of Christianity in the decades following the establishment of the Church. But heresies were rapidly appearing (cp. Col.), and with an inquisitive Hellenism, an interpenetrating Orientalism, and a ubiquitous Judaism, we may understand all the perversion even in Paul's last days. (e) That the Pastorals represent a later and more highly organised ecclesiasticism of the second century, e.g., struggle between bishops and heretics, prominence of Gnosticism, contrast of clergy and laity, putting widows in charge of the bishops, opposition to second marriages of widows and ecclesiastical officials. Here we must remember, however, that we have traces of the same officers in the recorded Pauline period; that the Pastorals are manuals of Church discipline, in which we expect more differentiation of offices and more clearly defined qualifications; that the Pastorals are late, and so Paul, if the author, had time to watch the operation of his theories in the churches of his institution; that even in the Pastorals we are still remote from the monarchical episcopate of the Ignatian epistles; and due allowance for the development from the republican or democratic forms may bring the date of the Pastorals to the time allowed by the second imprisonment. (f) Another, and, to the writer's mind, a greater difficulty, is the philological gulf between the Pastorals and the Pauline, both in individual words and expressions, both positively and negatively. Many of the most characteristic Pauline words and expressions are absent or scantily represented; others are replaced by rival words, e.g. the word for master as opposed to servant is δεσπότης in the Pastorals, κύριος in Paul; Christ's second coming is ἐπιφάνεια, not παρουσία (cp. 2 Th. 2.[8]), διάβολος for Σατανᾶς. Very suspicious is the large group of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα (words occurring only once) in each of the Pastorals, seventy-two in 1 Tm., twenty-six in Tt., and forty-four in 2 Tm., and the apparently stereotyped phrases (πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, ὑγιαίνουσα διδασκαλία, ὁ σωτὴρ θεὸς, καθαρὰ συνείδησις or καρδία, ἐπίγνωσις ἀληθείας, ὁ νῦν αἰὼν, εὐσέβεια, σώφρων, and many others). We find also a love for strange compounds, as ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν. This evidence might be continued to any length. The diction speaks still louder against Pauline authorship. In spite of the numerous parallelisms and verbal echoes there is little in the style to recall Paul. The Pauline rush and enthusiasm are absent; there is nothing of that rugged grandeur. The thought does not, as in Paul, repeatedly defy expression, neither do we meet these tangential thoughts which make it so difficult to follow the mind of the apostle. The sentences are built in the easiest schoolboy fashion; everything is on a lower level, more commonplace and normal. The Pauline figures of speech are rare (apart, perhaps, from similes and metaphors); anacoluthon is practically absent, and that in private letters, where we should expect it to abound. Of course there are varieties both of vocabulary and style in the Pauline epistles, but no epistle or group of epistles shows such a departure as the Pastorals. No doubt a large number of the ἅπαξ λεγόμενα can be explained by the treatment of new topics, and it is not only conceivable, but probable, that Paul modified his style considerably in his later years; but whether he could modify it in five years of toil, increasing infirmities, and desertion by friends succeeding the first imprisonment, to the extent required by the Pastorals, is difficult to say, and not probable. The amanuensis employed (and we must suppose the same amanuensis for all three epistles) may have had a more pronounced individuality than his predecessors, or Paul may have allowed him a freer hand, or even entrusted to him the thoughts to clothe in what philological dress he pleased.

Integrity.—Allowing for the discursiveness and freedom of a private letter, there is not the slightest ground to regard any of the Pastorals as a mosaic composed of genuine Pauline fragments with the interpolation of pieces of later work by a redactor, and no confidence can be placed in the attempts made to dismantle these letters. In fact all such attempts are evidence for probable Pauline authorship for the entire letters ; for if those parts that can be submitted to test are proved Pauline, the presumption is the other parts are also. They are either in toto Pauline or in toto pseudo-Pauline. All MSS. agree as to the integrity.

Date.—There is little to guide us about the date of the Pastorals. But it is evident from the vocabulary, style, similarity of topics, and method of treatment, they were written within a very short space of one another, so if we could decide the date of one we should have the date of all. If we accept Pauline authorship we must suppose the latest date consistent with the limit of Paul's life. Paul came to Rome in the spring of A.D. 61, was acquitted in the spring of A.D. 63, and no doubt immediately hastened eastward to visit his churches, and perhaps new churches, spent perhaps a couple of years in the East, then went to Spain, returned eastward, was arrested (perhaps at Nicopolis) and carried to Rome. Tradition is persistent that Paul was martyred under Nero. Now Nero's death happened in the summer of A.D. 68, and Paul's probably the spring or early summer of 68. 1 Tm. was written as late as 67 in Macedonia, and Titus later in the same year; 2 Tm. shortly before his execution in 68 (the date given by Conybeare and Howson).

Much later dates are given by those who reject the authenticity of the Pastorals. They rely upon the state of Church organisation reflected, the definite separation of the clergy from the laity, the ripeness of heresies, as evidence of a necessary late date. " The struggle for existence between sound doctrine, apostolic tradition, and subjectivism became the chief task of the Church for the first time in the second century " (Jülicher, who prefers the first quarter of the second century). But forgery, to have been so successful, must have taken place before the Pauline canon was securely closed, and before the date at which we find authentic traces of the existence of the Pastorals. Early in the first century would suit these requirements.

Teaching. (a) Doctrinal.—The Pastorals are strongly doctrinal, and insist repeatedly on healthy doctrine. But the Christian life must show no incongruity between creed and practice (Tt. 2.^{7}, 3.^{8}), it must be adorned with good works (1 Tm. 2.^{10}, 5.^{10}, 6.^{18} ; 2 Tm. 2.^{21} ; Tt. 2.^{7}, 2.^{14}, 3.^{8}) ; for the Christian must be an example to the outside world. Christianity must be translated into ethical and spiritual terms. Christian duties are not only Godward and subjective, but extend to our fellowmen in whatever circumstances Providence has placed us (1 Tm. 6.^{1} ; Tt. 2.^{9}, 3.^{1}). Of course the Christian must exercise sobriety and self-restraint in all things ; true asceticism is moderation with judgment (1 Tm. 5.$^{22f.}$). Godliness is the only true gain (1 Tm. 4.^{8}, 6.^{5}), especially when accompanied by contentment (1 Tm. 6.^{6}). The Christian is to war a good warfare (1 Tm. 1.^{18}, 6.^{12} ; 2 Tm. 2.^{4}), and must expect suffering (2 Tm. 1.^{8}, 2.^{3}, 3.^{12}, 4.^{5}), and his swan song will be a song of victory (2 Tm. 4.^{8}).

God our Saviour's purpose is the salvation of all men (1 Tm. 2.^{4}, 4.^{10} ; Tt. 2.^{11}), not by works, but according to His mercy through the laver of regeneration and the renewing of the Spirit, but unto good works (Tt. 3.$^{4-7}$).

Other points are the unity of God (1 Tm. 2.^{5}), His majesty (1 Tm. 1.^{17}, 6.^{15}), the resurrection of Christ (2 Tm. 2.^{8}), His atonement (1 Tm. 2.^{6} ; Tt. 2.^{14}), His incarnation (1 Tm. 3.^{16}), the indwelling of the Spirit (2 Tm. 1.^{14}), inspiration of Scripture (2 Tm. 3.^{16}), danger of riches (1 Tm. 6.$^{9, 17}$), God is also our Saviour (1 Tm. 2.^{3} ; Tt. 1.^{3}, 2.^{10}, 3.^{4}), Christian home life to be duly regulated (1 Tm. 3.^{4}), every gift of God is good (1 Tm. 4.$^{3-5}$; Tt. 1.^{15}), no multiplicity of media between God and man, only one Mediator and He a man (1 Tm. 2.^{5}), Christ's second appearing (1 Tm. 6.^{14} ; 2 Tm. 4.^{8}), prayers for the dead (2 Tm. 1.^{18}).

(b) On Church Organisation.—See articles on CHURCH, MINISTER, BISHOP, ELDER, DEACON.

Lit. : The modern critical study of the Pastorals began in the early years of the nineteenth century with Schleiermacher, who denied Pauline authorship to 1 Tm.

Against Pauline authorship may be mentioned Baur, Die Sogenannten Pastoralbriefe ; H. J. Holtzmann's Einleitung^{3} (1892) ; Die Pastoralbriefe (1880), with a splendid account of the literature of the controversy up to that date ; von Soden in Hand-Commentar ; Harnack, Chronologie, i. 480f. For English readers : Jülicher, Introduction, Eng. tr. ; Moffatt, Historical NT. ; M'Giffert, Apostolic Age ; Introductions by S. Davidson and B. W. Bacon ; art. by Moffatt in EB.

On the conservative side : Weiss, Paul. Briefe ; Riggenboch in Kurz. Comm. For English readers : Zahn, Introduction, Eng. tr. ; Salmon, Introduction ; Purves, Apostolic Age ; Plummer, Pastorals in Exp. Bib. ; J. H. Bernard in Camb. Gk. Test. ; art. by Lock in Hastings' BD. ; Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of Paul; see also general literature under PAUL.

First Epistle to Timothy.—Historical Position. The writer is at liberty; he had seen Timothy at Ephesus (or perhaps when passing near Ephesus, as in Ac. 20.[17]), where he had left Timothy in charge, as he himself was going into Macedonia (1.[3]); Paul hoped to return soon (3.[14]), but delay was contingent (3.[15]).

These data cannot be fitted into the record of Acts and the Pauline epistles. They cannot be placed after the riot in Ephesus, after which Paul went into Macedonia (Ac. 20.[1]); for Timothy had been sent forward into Macedonia (19.[22]), and joined in the greetings from Macedonia to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1.[1]), whence he returned in Paul's company (Ac. 20.[4]): besides, the havoc depicted in 1 Tm. is something that has been in progress for some time, whereas in Paul's speech at Miletus to the Ephesian elders such perils are of the future (Ac. 20.[29, 30]). Neither could the epistle be written during the free confinement at Cæsarea, as we have no trace in the epistle of any restraint. There remains the hypothetical journey into Macedonia during the "three years" residence at Ephesus, but, besides being merely hypothetical, this visit must have been very brief to find no mention in the narrative of Acts, and could not have given time for such a state of affairs as we find in 1 Tm. We must place it in the period between the first and second imprisonment.

Analysis.

i. 1–2. Address and greeting.
3–5. Timothy's commission.
6–11. False teaching, not tending toward spirituality, misunderstanding law and its relation to the Gospel.
12–17. Expression of gratitude and praise to Christ Jesus for mercy shown to Paul in spite of his sinfulness.
18–20. Charge continued; Timothy to be true to the prophecies relating to him; warning from the example of two faithless brethren.

ii. Regulations for public worship—
1–7. Public prayers for all men, for kings and those in authority, because God wishes all to be saved and because Christ died for all.
8. Men should lead the prayers.
9–15. Position of women in public worship.

iii. 1–13. Qualifications of church officers—
1–7. Bishops, of unreproachable private character and administrative abilities.
8–13. Deacons.
10. Women (or wives of deacons).
14–15. Teach these things. Paul's hope to return quickly, and desire to leave written instructions in case of delay.
16. Hymn on the mystery of godliness.

iv. 1–7. Tasks of the Church against various forms of error; necessity of holding to the good doctrine, and exercising oneself unto godliness, for 8–10. Godliness is profitable according to the faithful saying.
11–16. In spite of his youth to be an ensample and neglect not his gift.

v. 1–22. How to treat different classes of Church membership—
1. Old and young men.
2. Old and young women.
3–16. Widows.
17–22. Elders.
23–25. Personal note—in keeping yourself pure use judgment and moderation for the sake of health.

vi. 1–2. Duties of servants.
3–10. Against false teachers, ignorant, vain, and whose questions cause strife, who think godliness gain and know not true contentment; dangers of wealth.
11–14. Solemn appeal to the man of God to follow righteousness, fight the good fight, and be faithful till the appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ—
15–16. Which is certain; Doxology.
17–19. Advice to the rich.
20–21*a*. Parting appeal to keep the committed trust.
21*b*. Salutation.

Second Epistle to Timothy.—Paul is a prisoner (1.[8]) at Rome (1.[17]) for the cause of Christ, and writes to Timothy, probably still at Ephesus (cp. 1.[18] and 4.[19]). He had been travelling recently in Asia, where his Asiatic friends deserted him (1.[15]), had been at Troas (4.[13]) and Miletus, and probably in Corinth (4.[20]). Of his companions Luke alone remains with him (4.[11]), though he is in contact with the Roman Christians (4.[21]). Timothy was somewhere from which he might with haste reach Paul before winter (4.[21]). Paul was confidently expecting death (4.[6f.]), and had already made his "first defence" (4.[16]).

These data will not tally with the beginning of the "two whole years" of imprisonment in Ac. 28., for in that case the epistle was written before Col. and Php. and Phm., which is impossible both on philological grounds and because of the confident tone of Php. and Phm. contrasted with the gloomy outlook of 2 Tm. And also what then would his "first defence" mean? (which is rightly taken by the ancient interpreters and by Zahn of his first imprisonment). The only other conceivable time is toward the end of the "two whole years," but this is precluded by the way in which the apostle speaks of his travels as if quite recent. Surely Timothy would have heard long before of Trophimus' illness, and surely Paul would have tried sooner to recover the cloak left at Troas. Again we must have recourse to the second imprisonment.

Analysis.

i. 1–2. Address and greeting.
3–5. Thanksgiving and prayer for Timothy.
6–14. To stir up his gift, to be constant, and not be ashamed of the Gospel, following Paul's example.
15–18. Personal notes.

ii. 1–13. Charge to Timothy to commit the truth to faithful men, and suffer hardship like a good soldier, like an athlete contending in the games, like a toiling husbandman, remembering Jesus Christ risen from the dead and the encouragement of the "faithful saying."

ii. 14–21. To charge the people to avoid empty strife about words; to be a good workman himself, shunning profane babblings which issue in ungodliness, of which Hymenæus and Philetus are sad examples; to remember the seal of God's foundation, and that to be a vessel unto honour a man must purge himself and perform good works.
22–26. Flee the passions of youth, and be truly the Lord's servant, so as to help the fallen to recover themselves.
iii. 1–9. The unholy men of the last days.
10–17. Having seen Paul's suffering, and realising that the godly must suffer and evil-doers grow worse, he must abide by the things he has learned, having the advantage of being well trained from youth in the inspired Scriptures.
iv. 1–5. Solemn charge to be diligent in preaching in view of the evil days that are coming and—6–8. Paul's nearness to the end of his earthly career.
9–18. Personal communications: to come soon, as the writer is friendless but for Luke, to bring Mark, and not forget the cloak. God stood by him in his "first defence," and thus he has confidence that the Lord will deliver him from every evil work and save him unto His heavenly kingdom.
19–21. Salutations.
22. Blessing.

S. ANGUS.

TIN (Heb. bĕdīl, "that wh. is separated," i.e. fm. precious metals) is mentioned among the metals that mt. be purified by passing through fire (Nu. 31.[22]). The refce. in Is. 1.[25] is to tin used as an alloy. It is one of the "drosses" named in Ek. 22.[18, 20]. It was part of the Tyrian merchandise brought from Tarshish (27.[12]). The "plummet" (Zc. 4.[10]) is lit. "stone of tin." The use of tin as an alloy has been known from very early times. The Cornish mines may have been among the sources of supply for the ancient world. Sr. 47.[18] shows that it was plentiful in Pal.

TIPHSAH ("ford"). (1) T. is named as on the northern border of the territory ruled by Solomon (1 K. 4.[24]), Gaza marking its southern limit. It is usually identified with Thapsacus on the Euphrates. It lay on one of the great trade roads between east and west, which here crossed the river by the ford. It was the crossing-place of Cyrus the younger (Xen. Anab. I. iv. 11) and of Darius, whom Alexander followed by means of bridges (Arrian, iii. 7). From the time of Seleucus I. it was called Amphipolis. It is prob. represented by mod. Qal'at Dibse, where the river bends eastward, eight miles below Meskene. Here there is a ford used by the caravans. (2) A town, apparently near TIRZAH, smitten by Menahem (2 K. 15.[16]). Following LXX (Lucian), many think that the original name here was Tappuah. Conder suggests identification with Kirbet Tafsah, six miles SW. of Nāblus.

TIRAS indicates a people descended from Japheth (Gn. 10.[2]; 1 Ch. 1.[5]). After Josephus (Ant. I. vi. 1), they were for long identified with the Thracians. We should prob. understand by them the Turusha who appear on the Egyptian monuments, a piratical people who rendered Grecian waters unsafe, and even made their way into Egypt. Jensen would identify it with TARSUS; W. Max Müller with TARSHISH.

TIRATHITES, a family of scribes residing at Jabez (1 Ch. 2.[55]).

TIRHAKAH, a king of Ethiopia (Cush) who came against Sennacherib when the Rabshakeh returned to his master after he had borne his insulting message to Hezekiah in Jerusalem (2 K. 19.[9]). The last king of the 25th Dynasty (Ethiopian) is called Taharqa, but he does not seem to have ascended the throne till B.C. 691; whereas the date of Sennacherib's first expedition was B.C. 701. Three suggestions have been made; one that T. has been written instead of Shabataka; or that before becoming king of Egypt he was generalissimo of Egypt, and that then he made his advance against Sennacherib; a third suggestion is that there were several expeditions made by Sennacherib, and these are condensed in the Biblical account. T. was a great builder, especially in Thebes. In 669 he was expelled fm. Lower Egypt by Esarhaddon, but on his death returned into Lower Egypt. Asshurbanipal marched against him and expelled him fm. Egypt wholly, appointing governors over the whole country. A conspiracy of these governors, inviting him, led T. to invade Egypt again, only to be finally driven into Ethiopia.

TIRHANAH, son of Caleb by Maachah (1 Ch. 2.[48]).

TIRIA, a Judahite, son of Jehaleleel (1 Ch. 4.[16]).

TIRSHATHA, the official title of NEHEMIAH as governor of Pal.; modified fm. the old Persian tarsata, a term wh. may be rendered "his excellency." It occurs five times, once in Ezra in a passage wh. is repeated in Nehemiah, other three times in Nehemiah. Nehemiah is eight times called "governor" by the more usual designation of peḥāh. In LXX Tirshatha is treated as if it were a proper name Athersastha, and Artasastha, with MS. variations. In the Apcr. (1 Es. 5.[40]) it is Atharias, a name wh. is joined by "and" to "Neemias," as if separate individuals.

TIRZAH. (1) A Canaanite royal city taken by Joshua (12.[24]). It became the seat of government of the Northern monarchy, and the residence of its kings (1 K. 14.[17], &c.). Here dwelt Jeroboam I., Baasha, Elah, and Zimri. The last named was swiftly overthrown by Omri, and perished here in the flames of the burning palace. Although the seat of government was changed to Samaria, Tirzah continued to be a position of importance, and was the centre of Menahem's rising (2 K. 15.[14]). It would appear to have been a place of great beauty (SS. 6.[4]). It cannot be certainly identd. Ṭallūza, c. 4 miles N. of Nāblus; Teyāṣīr, c. 11 miles NW. of Nāblus, on the road to Beisān, an ancient site, in the midst of a fruitful district; and eṭ-Ṭīreh, a ruin c. 4 miles S. of Nāblus, have been suggested. Bro-cardus (A.D. 1332) speaks of a place called Thersa, three hours east of Samaria. This points to the district of 'Ain el-Fār'a, near which, to the N. and SW., are hills with considerable ruins. (2) One of Zelophehad's daughters (Nu. 26.[33], &c.).

TISHBITE, the designation by wh. ELIJAH is commonly referred to (1 K. 17.[1], &c.), from the name of his native place Tishbeh (LXX "Thesbon") in Gilead.

TITHE. The practice of offering to their gods a tenth of the produce of the land, of their flocks, of spoil taken in war, and of their other property, prevailed among many peoples of antiquity. The idea in these old customs probably corresponded to that in the offerings made by primitive peoples still. Gifts to the deity to whom the land belongs incline him favourably to the givers, and ensure to them fruitful seasons and success in their enterprises. When good had been received, naturally such offerings would be made as an expression of gratitude. There is, however, nothing to show why the proportion of a tenth should have been chosen. There is nothing exceptional, therefore, in the action of Abraham offering a tithe of the spoils of war to Melchizedek (Gn. 14.[20]), nor in Jacob's vow to devote to God a tenth of all that he should receive from Him (28.[22]).

In Israel the tribe of Levi was set apart for religious service, and in lieu of any portion in the land all the tithes were assigned to them (Nu. 18.[21ff.], &c.). Corn, wine, oil and the firstlings of the flocks are specified for tithing (Dt. 12.[17], 14.[23], &c.). These the Levites received as representing Jehovah, the Owner of the land, who of His royal bounty had given it to Israel. The portion of the priests was a tenth of the tithe given to the Levites (Nu. 18.[26ff.]). If one did not wish to part with the portion due under this system to the Levites, he might redeem it at the price set upon it, plus one-fifth (Lv. 27.[30ff.]). Withholding of the tithes was regarded as robbery of God, while their faithful delivery was a condition of blessing (Ml. 3.[8, 10]). Amos (4.[4f.]) scornfully calls the people to their idolatrous worship, and caricatures their zeal, as offering tithes beyond all requirement. The practice of tithing is referred to in the NT. (Mw. 23.[23]; Lk. 18.[12], &c.), and appears to have been continued till the destruction of the Temple (He. 7.[8]).

Abraham gave the tenth of all to Melchizedek, not as king, but as priest of the Most High God (Gn. 14.[20]). But from 1 S. 8.[15, 17] we may infer that in some cases the tithe was levied by the king.

TITLE. (1) Heb. ṣīyūn (2 K. 23.[17]). Elsewhere the word is trd. "waymark" (Jr. 31.[21]), and "sign" (Ek. 39.[15]). In 2 K. 23.[17] we should read with RV. "monument." (2) When criminals were executed the Romans were accustomed to write on a board the name of the doomed man, and the offence for wh. he was to suffer. This was displayed on the way to the place of execution, and in the case of crucifixion might be attached to the cross over the victim's head (Mw. 27.[37]). This title or "superscription," in the case of Jesus, Pilate had written in three languages—Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; i.e. in the tongue spoken by the Jews, in the lingua franca of the time, and in the official language of the empire. The title is given with slight variations by all the four evangelists. The variations may perhaps be accounted for by the form taken in the different languages. It may have been something like the following:—

ישוע הנצרי מלך היהודים

ΟΥΤΟΣ ΕΣΤΙΝ ΙΗΣΟΥΣ Ο ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ
ΤΩΝ ΙΟΥΔΑΙΩΝ

REX JUDAEORUM

Whatever Pilate's intention was (and he had no special reason for considering their feelings), the description of Jesus without qualification was regarded by His enemies as insulting. Approaching him to remonstrate, they received peremptory dismissal (Jn. 19.[21]).

TITTLE, the tr. in EV. of the Gr. keraia, primarily "a little horn" (Mw. 5.[18]; Lk. 16.[17]). In the first of these passages it is associated with JOT, ἰῶτα, supposed to refer to the small protuberances by wh. certain Heb. letters were distinguished fm. each other as ב and כ. Others have supposed the reference to have been to the taggīn, ornamental additions made to the letters. It may have been a reference to the Gr. accents, as the square character does not seem to have been in use in our Lord's lifetime.

TITUS, a friend and companion of St. Paul, not named in the Acts of the Apostles; all we know of him is learned from the letters of the apostle. He was of pure Greek birth. According to certain legends he was born in Crete, or Corinth, and was living in Iconium when St. Paul first visited that city. It may be that there, hearing the Gospel from the apostle, he was converted (Ti. 1.[4]). He is first mentioned as going up to Jerusalem with St. Paul, from Antioch. This was fourteen years after St. Paul's first visit to the holy city as a Christian (Lightfoot on Gal. 2.). The burning question to be discussed there was the relation of Gentile converts to the Mosaic law. St. Paul maintained their freedom from certain of its obligations, including submission to the characteristic rite of circumcision. An attempt was made to compel the circumcision of Titus, but this the apostle successfully resisted, and so vindicated the liberty of non-Jewish Christians (Ac. 15.[28f.]). Probably from that time Titus continued to be a fellow-worker with the apostle, altho' he is next mentioned by name in the second letter to the Corinthians. A year before the writing of the second letter he had been sent to Corinth, possibly one of those charged with carrying the first, and there he began making arrangements for the collection of contributions, to be sent for the relief of the needy brethren in Judæa (2 Cor. 8.[10]). Steps in this direction had before been taken by St. Paul himself (1 Cor. 16.[1f.]). So far matters seem to have gone successfully. Soon after his return, however, news came from Corinth wh. caused St. Paul much anxiety, and he again despatched Titus thither to exercise discipline and to restore peace and harmony. The letter mentioned in 2 Cor. 2.[3ff.], 7.[8ff.] was probably then entrusted to him. St. Paul went to Troas hoping to meet him on his return (2 Cor. 2.[12f.]). Brooking ill the delay, he passed over to Macedonia. He found his messenger and was comforted with the good news of his mission. Bearing St. Paul's letter, known as 2 Corinthians, T. again visited Corinth, to carry through the work connected with "the collection."

After his first imprisonment the apostle appears to have visited Crete, evangelising, and to have left there his companion Titus (Ti. 1.[5]), armed with authority to take all measures necessary for the welfare of the Church. Zenas and Apollos may have been the bearers of this letter (3.[13]). Titus is exhorted, on seeing Artemas or Tychicus, to meet the apostle at Nicopolis (3.[12]). What came of this plan we know not. Titus was, however, with the apostle in Rome after his second arrest, and thence he went on to Dalmatia (2 Tm. 4.[10]).

Nothing certain is known of his after life. He is said to have lived to be an old man, unmarried, as bishop of Crete (Eusebius, HE. III. iv. 6; Const. Apost. vii. 46).

TITUS, EPISTLE TO. Historical Position.—Paul was evidently free, could plan his itinerary as he pleased (3.[12]), and had with him a band of followers (3.[15]). He and Titus had been together in Crete, where he left Titus to organise the churches (1.[5]); that island had been to a considerable degree evangelised ("every city," 1.[5]); the writer intended to winter in Nicopolis (3.[12]; probably in Epirus, which was the most important of the cities bearing that name); Apollos was known to the writer (3.[13]).

To find place satisfactorily for these data before Paul's first voyage to Rome is impossible. Only once did he touch at Crete before reaching Rome (Ac. 27.[7]), and on that occasion he was a prisoner and could not avail himself of the "much time" (Ac. 27.[9]) to do any work of evangelisation, and also where was Titus? And it is probable that Luke would have made some reference to the Christian Church there if such existed. It has been suggested that the visit to Crete was made during the three years at Ephesus (Ac. 20.[31]), which is quite inconsistent with the language of Acts. Neither is there room for the evangelisation of Crete during the second missionary journey (Ac. 15.[41f.]), for he did not know Apollos till after that time (Ac. 18.[24]), nor in the journey from Corinth to Antioch via Ephesus (Ac. 18.[18-22]), for Paul was then apparently in haste, refusing the request of the Ephesians to tarry longer; still less on the way from Antioch to Ephesus (Ac. 18.[22]–19.[1]), for he passed through "the upper country."

On any theory of authorship we must place Titus after the close of Acts and the period of the other Pauline epistles.

Analysis.

i. 1–4. Address.
5–9. Titus' commission to appoint elders in every city; qualifications of these officers.
10–12. Necessity of approved overseers because of the unruliness of the Cretan character.
13–16. Oppose those who give heed to Jewish fables and commandments of men and teach that matter is evil, whose profession and works are at variance.

ii. 1–10. Teach all how they ought to behave: elder men (2), elder women (3), young women (4, 5), young men (6), so that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour—11–14. Because of the grace of God and the sacrifice of Christ to purify unto Himself a people zealous of good works.
15. Titus' authority.

iii. 1–2. The behaviour of Christians toward authority and toward one another, founded on—3–8. The kindness and mercy of God, His love toward us and the renewing of the Holy Spirit. Necessity of maintaining good works.
9. Negative instructions to Titus.
10–11. How to treat a heretic.
12–13. Personal communications.
14. Parting advice to Cretan followers.
15. Salutation and blessing.

See Timothy, Epistles to. S. Angus.

TIZITE, the designation of Joha, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 11.[45]).

TOAH, a Kohathite Levite (1 Ch. 6.[34]), called "Nahath" in 1 Ch. 6.[26]; "Tohu" in 1 S. 1.[1].

TOB. Jephthah fled from his brothers to the land of Tob (Jg. 11.[3]), and thence the elders of Isr. fetched him in the hour of their need (v. 5). It must be sought somewhere in the neighbourhood of Gilead and Ammon. Twelve thousand men of Tob (2 S. 10.[6, 8] RV.) joined the Ammonite allies against David. It may be identical with Tubias (1 M. 5.[13]). The Talmud (Neubauer, Geog. d. Tlm. 239) identifies it with Hippos, mod. Sûsiyeh, E. of the Sea of Galilee, a little to the SW. of Fîq. The name, "The Good Land," corresponds exactly in meaning with that of eṭ-Ṭaiyibeh, c. 10 miles S. of Gadara, with wh. some would identify it.

TOB-ADONIJAH, one of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (2 Ch. 17.[8]).

TOBIAH. (1) The reputed ancestor of a family who returned with Ezra, but whose genealogy had been lost during the Exile (Ez. 2.[60]; Ne. 7[62]).

(2) An Ammonite who co-operated with the enemies of Nehemiah in hindering the work of restoration which he had undertaken (Ne. 2.[10], &c.). (3) and (4) See TOBIJAH.

TOBIJAH. (1) One of the Levites who, in obedience to the command of Jehoshaphat, carried "the book of the law of the Lord" with them, and "went throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught among the people" (2 Ch. 17.[8f.]). (2) A member of the deputation who brought gifts of the precious metals from Babylon to Jerusalem, out of wh. Zechariah was sent to select what was needful to make a crown, wh. should be "for a memorial in the Temple of the Lord," to the generous givers (Zc. 6.[9ff.]).

TOCHEN, an unidentd. town in Simeon, named with Etam and 'Ain Rimmon (1 Ch. 4.[32]). It is omitted in the corresponding list in Jo. 19.[7]. In LXX its place is taken by "Thokka." We may therefore conclude that the name has slipped out of the MT. by mistake.

TOGARMAH, son of GOMER the son of JAPHETH, and therefore br. of Ashkenaz and Riphath (Gn. 10.[3]; 1 Ch. 1.[6]). "They of the house of T. traded" in the fairs of Tyre, "in horses and horsemen and mules." It cannot be definitely fixed what the geographical situation of T. was; but the most common idea is Western Armenia.

TOI, king of HAMATH, who rejoiced at the downfall of his enemy Hadadezer, and sent his son to bless David, who by his victory had freed him from anxiety (2 S. 8.[9f.]). In 1 Ch. 18.[9f.] the name appears as Tou.

TOLA. (1) A son of Issachar (Gn. 46.[13]), reputed ancestor of the clan of Tolaites (Nu. 26.[23], &c.). (2) Son of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar, who arose to judge Israel after Abimelech. His home was in Shamir, a town in Mt. Ephraim, not identified. He judged Isr. twenty-three years. He was buried in Shamir.

TOLAD. See EL-TOLAD.

TOMB. Of the customs with regard to disposal of the dead, prevalent in Pal. in pre-Israelite times, interesting evidence is given by Mr. Macalister in his reports of the excavations at Gezer (PEFQ. 1902–1909). At one time cremation was practised, and the thick layer of burnt ash found in a large burial cave shows that it lasted long. This cave was afterwards used for inhumation. The dead were laid upon "a layer of stones, or within cists, or in pits, in the floor of the caverns." The bodies were placed in no special position. Sometimes they are squatting—doubtless the attitude habitually assumed when at rest in life.

From the days of Abraham until now the Israelites have buried their dead. The care and reverence with which the body was handled, and the arrangements made for sepulture, were due to certain ideas prevalent among the Hebrews, not unlike those held by other ancient peoples. A close connection was thought to exist between the soul and the body even after death. That the body should be buried was the one condition essential to the spirit's rest in Sheol. There was no thought of the spirit's return to occupy the body in another life, and so, although spices were used in wrapping it for burial, it was not embalmed as in Egypt. Neither was it thought necessary to add grandeur and beauty to the tomb, if only it were strong and safe; although in Is. 22.[16] some adornment may be suggested. Where anything in the way of ornament is found, it may generally be attributed to Hellenistic or Roman influence.

Further, the Hebrews preserved the sense of the family unity after death. This was fostered by finding rest for the bodies of the household within the one burying-place. Evidently the hope of meeting the beloved dead in the world beyond (2 S. 12.[23]) in some way depended on the association of their dust in ancestral tombs; and so the phrase "he slept with his fathers," had for them a peculiar and pleasing significance.

SO-CALLED TOMB OF ZECHARIAH

We can thus understand the horror of the Israelite at the thought of being left unburied, and at any fate such as drowning at sea or devouring by wild beasts, which involved the decay or destruction of the unburied body. Even the executed criminal and slaughtered foeman were to be buried (Dt. 21.[23]; Jo. 10.[26f.], &c.); see Ec. 6.[3]; Is. 14.[20]; Jr. 22.[19]. The calamity next in importance was to be excluded from the sepulchre of his fathers (Gn. 49.[29f.], &c.). This lends special meaning to David's action in laying the bones of Saul and his sons in the family sepulchre (2 S. 21.[12ff.]). The burial-ground was inalienable property, and it was strictly guarded against the burial of strangers there. Inscriptions invoke curses on any who disturb the sleepers within ; and in some cases upon any who intrude the corpse of one not belonging to the family. The tombs were therefore made secure not only against possible plunderers, but against defilement of all kinds. The sarcophagus, so familiar among their neighbours on the Phœnician seaboard, seems to have been little used by the Hebrews.

PEF. Drawing
ROCK-HEWN TOMB, TIBNEH

Burning is indeed spoken of, but only as a punishment for infamous conduct (Gn. 38.[24] ; Lv. 20.[14], &c.), or as a method for disposing of the bodies of men slain in battle (1 S. 31.[12f.]) ; and then the bones, or ashes, must receive burial. The stones heaped upon the body of a criminal served to protect it against wild beasts, and also formed a monument of warning to others.

In the climate of Pal. swift burial is necessary. One dying, therefore, away from home, or on a journey, was forthwith laid to rest in a solitary grave (Gn. 35.[8, 19]). This would prob. resemble " the graves of the common people " (2 K. 23.[6]). These appear to have been pits cut in the earth or in the rock, each for the reception of a single body, with a covering of stones, or of one single heavy stone. The family graves were side by side. When special emphasis came to be laid on impurity contracted by contact with a tomb, these stones were whitewashed (Mw. 23.[27]), lest one might stumble upon them at unawares.

With men of rank and larger means it was the pious custom to prepare their burial-places while yet alive (Mw. 27.[60]). The most common were hewn in the solid rock. Sometimes the caves which abound in Pal. were utilised and adapted to the purpose. Often a shaft was driven horizontally into the face of the rock, and a chamber excavated in the soft limestone. In many cases kōkīm, recesses 6 ft. to 7 ft. deep and 18 in. to 2 ft. in height and breadth, were cut in the walls of the chamber at right angles to the surface. Into these the bodies were slipped, with the feet towards the opening. A later form had ledges on several sides, about 18 in. above the floor, on which the bodies were laid. Sometimes these were arched over. There are also tombs in wh. the ledges or " loculi " are present with the kōkīm, evidently a transition form. Joseph's tomb must have been furnished with loculi, since the body could be seen by one looking in (Jn. 20.[5]). There are also cases in which a hollow has been cut in the ledge for the reception of the corpse. Rarely the kōkīm and loculi were of sufficient width to permit of two bodies being laid side by side. Frequently the first chamber communicated with others by means of low rock-cut passages, thus forming a complex of tombs. Instances are seen in the so-called " Tombs of the Kings " and " Tombs of the Prophets " near Jerusalem. The mouth of the entrance passage was closed by a great stone. This might swing in a socket as in the larger openings to burial caves, or it might be raised and lowered by means of a lever placed in a hole in its surface. Commonly it was shaped like a stout circular millstone, and moved in a groove cut before the opening.

In 1902 an important discovery of tombs was made at Mareshah (see PEF., Painted Tombs in the Necropolis of Marissa). The oldest of these, shown in the illustration on page 429, dates from the second half of the third century B.C. Their elaborate ornamentation, paintings, and inscriptions are of great value as illustrating the history of that period.

Examples of tombs of masonry may be seen at Qedes (KADESH NAPHTALI), Tell Hum, &c. These belong to a later date. The practice of raising monuments over tombs does not appear before the time of the Greeks. Simon the Maccabee marked in this way the burial-place of his father, his mother, and brothers (1 M. 13.[27ff.]).

PEF. Drawing
ROCK-CUT TOMB NEAR AMWAS, SHOWING MODE OF CLOSING ENTRANCE

Many of the holy places in Pal. to-day are associated with the tombs of saints or heroes. These " maqāms " are regarded by the common people with a reverence far beyond that accorded to the mosque. The shrine is carefully guarded against defilement and profanation. Anything deposited near the tomb is regarded as under the saint's protection. The perfect security thus obtained often brings together there a strange collection of articles. Nothing within the enclosure must be injured, on pain of enduring the saint's wrath. The present writer knows of one case where the death penalty was inflicted for the cutting down of a tree wh. had grown to obstruct the way to the shrine. The Jews also hold in great reverence the tombs of their famous rabbis: synagogues wh. became places of pilgrimage being built over them, like that of Rabbi

PEF. Drawing

Plan of Jewish Tomb

Meir at Tiberias, and of Rabbi Shimyon ben Yochai at Meiron.

TONGUES, THE CONFUSION OF. The narrative of Gn. 11.1-9 explains the diversity of language, the dispersion of mankind over the face of the earth, and the origin of the name of the city of Babylon. But the account is beset with difficulties. The name Babylon is derived by the sacred writer from the Hebrew bālal, to confuse. But competent Babylonian scholars are unanimous in holding that the native Babylonian name, Babilu, signifies the "Gate of God." * Then as to the dispersion of men over the world, the narrative of Gn. 11.1-9 does not accord well with the narrative of Gn. 10., wh. represents the dispersion of men and their division into different nationalities as the result of a natural process of migration, not as a punishment for misdirected ambition. No place seems left for the events related in Gn. 11.1-9. Neither does the narrative of Gn. 11.1-9 fit in well with the narrative of the Flood. The whole tenor of the narrative of Gn. 11.1-9 implies the presence on the earth of a very considerable population, a population much larger than the family of Noah or those who could have descended from them in the interval of time between the Flood and the dispersion. Indeed the narrative of Gn. 11.1-9 seems entirely independent of the narratives of the Flood and of Gn. 10. But a yet greater difficulty arises out of the conflict between Gn. 11.1-9 and the results of archæology and anthropology. The Biblical date of the Flood is B.C. 2501, or, according to the Septuagint, B.C. 3066, i.e. if we accept the Biblical Chronology as it stands. But there exist inscriptions dating apparently from much earlier than the earliest of these dates, written in three distinct languages—Sumerian, Babylonian, and Egyptian. Thus it would seem that diversity of language had arisen very much sooner than Gn. 11.1-9 would lead us to suppose. Yet again, Gn. 11.1-9 fails to account for the existing diversity of races and their wide distribution over the surface of the earth. If the various race-types to be found in the world at present have been derived from one parent stock, as the Bible and science agree in teaching that they have been, a much vaster period of time is needed for their development and distribution than seems to be allowed for by Gn. 11.1-9. Existing race-types show no tendency to vary even under changed conditions. And the types depicted on the monuments of Egypt have not changed in the 4000 years wh. separate their age and ours. From wh. the inference has been drawn that the characteristic features of the various races of mankind have been impressed upon them before the dawn of history, in the early youth of mankind, when the human frame must have been more plastic than in these later ages, when the traits wh. separate one race from another have apparently been fixed once for all. All this points to the great antiquity of the human race. And this is confirmed by evidence derived from various sources, more particularly from the numerous relics of human workmanship wh. have been found in different parts of Europe and America, showing that man in a rude and primitive stage of development ranged thro' the forests and river-valleys of these continents in company with mammals now extinct, during the glacial age. With this also agree the wide distribution of the human race over the surface of the earth and the radical differences which separate the various families of language from each other. The evidence at our command goes to show that diversity of race originated at a much earlier date than Gn. 11.1-9 wd. lead us to suppose, and that this diversity of race is the cause and not the result of diversity of language.

* The Biblical derivation may, however, be a play on the word, rather than a derivation proper.

How, then, are we to regard the narrative of Gn. 11.[1-9]?

(1) It may be a reminiscence of some incident in the history of man in Western Asia. No Babylonian parallel to it has as yet been found. But it has been connected conjecturally with the remains of two buildings in Babylonia. One is the celebrated tower of Birs-Nimrûd at Borsippa, wh. stands at a little distance south-west from Babylon, on the west bank of the Euphrates, the ruins of which form a mound of enormous size. The other is the great Temple of Merodach within Babylon itself, wh. Nebuchadnezzar mentions that he found in a dilapidated condition and restored to great splendour and magnificence. This latter was erected in pre-historic times; its earliest name was Accadian, Bit-Saggatu, "the house of the lofty summit"; it was frequently restored by Babylonian kings, and was the principal shrine in Babylon. Possibly it was some incident connected with one of these buildings that is referred to in Gn. 11.[1-9], presumably some act of daring, impious ambition.

(2) But however we may regard the narrative, it is, like all the early narratives of Genesis, suggestive of religious truth. It seems to imply that the accumulation of human beings in congested centres of population is not according to God's plan, nor is it for man's good. Man was intended by God to spread over the surface of the earth and to subdue it. It also strikes a note distinctly hostile to the existence of great brutal world-powers, of wh. Babylon has ever been the type. It teaches the sinfulness of man exalting himself against God and seeking his own glory rather than God's glory. It also teaches that rebellion against God leads to discord amongst men. And it suggests that diversity of race and language finds a place and serves a purpose in God's providential government of men. God's punishment of man's sin becomes a means of good.

Lit.: Driver, Com. on Genesis (Westminster Com., Methuen), and his article in HDB. s.v.; Dods, Genesis (Handbooks for Bible Classes, T. & T. Clark); Ryle, Early Narratives of Genesis (Macmillan & Co.); Gordon, The Early Traditions of Genesis (T. & T. Clark); Sayce, The Races of the Old Testament (Religious Tract Society).

John W. Slater.

TONGUES, GIFT OF. Our knowledge of this phenomenon of the apostolic age is derived from two NT. passages, 1 Cor. 12.–14. and Ac. 2.[1-18]. There are references to it also in Mk. 16.[17]; Ac. 10.[46], 19.[6], but with no information as to its nature. We have to distinguish at the outset between the facts described and the religious interpretation and valuation put upon them. The first question is as to the facts.

Since St. Paul's account is the more circumstantial, the earlier, that of an eye-witness, and of one who himself possessed and exercised the gift, it is from it we must start. It is clear that the phenomenon he describes was of an ecstatic character. The speaker was in a state of religious rapture or ecstasy. His spirit prayed, or sang, or blessed, but his understanding was unfruitful, i.e. in abeyance (1 Cor. 14.[14f.]). He was under the influence of a compelling power, and his utterances were involuntary (12.[2,3], 14.[32]). The impression produced on an outsider was that he was mad (14.[2,3]). This submersion of thought and will, and subjection to an overmastering impulse, are well-known features of the ecstatic state. More difficult to make out is the precise character of the words or sounds to which the speaker with tongues gave utterance. Were we to start from the account in Acts we might suppose that they were those of some foreign language unknown to the speaker under normal conditions. But St. Paul's account absolutely precludes such an idea. He who speaks in a tongue does not speak to man—so not to a foreigner—but to God (14.[2]). His words are not those of a foreign language, but "mysteries"; and they are unintelligible to others, and, until they are interpreted, useless for edification (14.[2ff.]). Still further, the fact that in 14.[10] the apostle compares glossolalia with speech in a foreign tongue is a decisive proof that he could not have regarded the two as identical. But if the ecstatic utterances were not of the nature of speech in a foreign language, what were they? Their outstanding feature, to which the apostle again and again returns, was their unintelligibleness. This does not altogether preclude the idea of disjointed ejaculations like "Jesus is Lord," "Maranatha," "Abba," "Hallelujah," and 12.[3] seems to point to such. But probably in most cases the words uttered were wholly incoherent. The apostle compares them to the sounds of a pipe or harp played without time or tune (14.[7]). What meaning they possessed was derived from the emotion of praise or prayer or blessing, of which they were the inarticulate expression. To divine this meaning and communicate it to others was the office of the interpreter of tongues. The apostle alludes to divers kinds of tongues. They may have been distinguished by the manner of utterance, whether sung or spoken, or, again, by the character of the emotion expressed—adoration, benediction, confession, &c.

The account in Ac. 2 differs from that in 1 Cor. 12.–14. in at least one important particular. While in the second account there is no question of speech in a foreign language, in the first this seems to be clearly implied. The foreign Jews in Jerusalem hear the wonderful works of God, each in his native tongue, from Galilæan speakers who presumably were ignorant of any tongue but their own (2.[7ff.]).

Must we then conclude that the pneumatic gift described in Acts is different in kind from that described by St. Paul? Such a conclusion is by no means inevitable. The phenomenon of Pentecost was repeated in the house of Cornelius—its identity is expressly asserted by St. Peter (Ac. 11.[15])—and there is a strong presumption that that familiar to St. Paul, since it bore the same name, was also of the same character. Moreover, in both accounts the phenomenon is clearly ecstatic. The disciples at Pentecost did not set themselves to address a congregation of foreigners, but burst, when the Spirit fell upon them, into involuntary utterance. Only after this did a crowd collect to witness the marvel and to listen (Ac. 2.[4ff.]). And in both cases the impression produced on the unsympathetic listener was the same (Ac. 2.[13]). The real difference between the two accounts is that in Acts the interpreter is omitted as unnecessary. The hearers are themselves able to interpret. They have the faculty of instinctively apprehending the language of intense religious emotion—a language which is, indeed, in some sense universal.

The second question to be considered is that of the religious interpretation which the NT. puts upon the gift of tongues and the value it attaches to it. For the popular religious thought of St. Paul's time the mere fact of ecstasy was itself evidence that the subject of it was under the sway of a superhuman power. And St. Paul starts from this. As the heathen ecstatic was the instrument of a demon, so the Christian was the instrument of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12.[2, 3]). But at once the apostle carries the interpretation into a far higher region. The question had been put to him how the ecstatic phenomena of the Christian Church were to be distinguished from those of heathenism, or of demoniac possession, with which, externally, they had much in common. He finds the difference, not in the fact that the one class was more of a marvel than the othe , but in their moral character and outcome. If the ecstatic called Jesus Lord, he was under the influence of the Spirit of God; if he called Him accursed, he was under a demon's influence (12.[3]). The proof of the Spirit's working was not ecstasy in itself, but the man's attitude to Jesus. The apostle's ethical standpoint appears even more clearly when he proceeds to estimate the relative value of the various gifts in which the Spirit's presence and working were recognised. No other criterion of value is allowed than that of their use for the edification of the Church. Judged by this criterion, the gift of tongues is relegated to a subordinate place, and the exercising of it is severely restricted (14.[27f.]). It is much inferior to prophecy, itself an ecstatic gift; for while the prophet, speaking words that can be understood, edifies others, the speaker in an unknown tongue edifies only himself (14.[4]). It is inferior also to the gift of knowledge or teaching, which is not ecstatic at all. St. Paul declares that he would rather speak five words with his understanding, that he might instruct others, than ten thousand words in a tongue. It is, however, when he proceeds to speak of love that he touches the culminating point of his conception of spiritual gifts and of the Spirit's working. To this gift of ordinary life he assigns a place far above that of the gifts that were esteemed mainly on account of their marvellous character. Love is the supreme manifestation of the Holy Spirit's activity, and, destitute of love, the speaker with tongues is nothing better than sounding brass. In this ethicising of the doctrine of the Spirit we find one of St. Paul's greatest services to the Christian faith.

Lit.: Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age; Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes; Joh. Weiss, Die Schriften des NTs., 1 Cor. 12.–14.; A. Wright, Some NT. Problems. W. MORGAN.

TOPAZ (Heb. piṭdāh), a precious stone, the second in the first row of the jewels on the High Priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.[17], 39.[10]); it is mentioned with other gems as the covering of the prince of Tyre (Ek. 28.[13]). It was regarded as very precious (Jb. 28.[19]). "The T. of Ethiopia shall not equal it" (Wisdom). It is presumably our T. See STONES, PRECIOUS STONES.

TOPHEL. This name occurs in a passage of admitted difficulty (Dt. 1.[1]). The intention apparently is, by mentioning certain places, to define more closely the position of the camp of Israel. Proposed identifications all refer to places too distant to serve this purpose. Many have thought that Tophel may be represented by eṭ-Ṭafeleh, a large vill. c. 15 miles SE. of the Dead Sea, on the road between Kerak and Petra. Besides the consideration mentioned above, the change of the light t to the heavy ṭ is a difficulty.

TOPHET, TOPHETH, "place of burning," accdg. to LXX was originally the name of a high place in the valley of Hinnom, where the Jerusalemites made their children "pass through the fire" to Molech (2 Ch. 28.[3], 33.[6]; Jr. 32.[35]). Fm. Is. 30.[33] it may be inferred that the "place of burning" was a pit rather than an altar. The place was defiled by Josiah (2 K. 23.[10]). Jeremiah (7.[32], 19.[6]) says "the days come" when the valley shall be called "the valley of the slain" (EV. "slaughter"), because, no place else being available, the slain of Jrs. shall be buried there. The meaning is that victims of another kind will atone for the atrocious offerings to Molech. Clearly, therefore, it was a place in the bottom of the valley: and if it was to become a burial-place for a multitude of corpses, the prophet cannot intend the narrow space in the mod. Wādy er-Rabābi, but rather the wide part where it opens into the Kidron. See HINNOM, KIDRON. G. H. DALMAN.

TORCH. See Lamp.

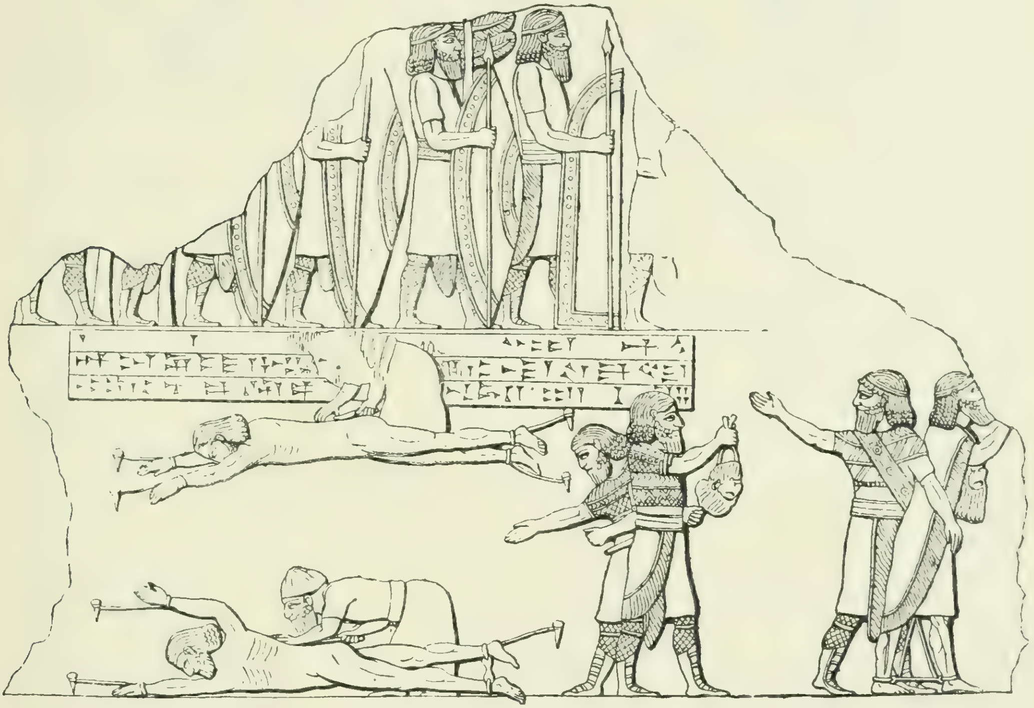
TORTOISE, an animal declared to be unclean (Lv. 11.[29]). The Heb. name tzab resembles so closely the Arb. ḍubb, "a lizard of large size," that one is inclined to identify the animals; yet it seems strange that the still commoner tortoise shd. not be forbidden. The LXX and the Psh. render "lizard."

TORTURE had two objects—either to make punishment more cruel or to force a confession, either of a crime or of associates; or (and this was not infrequent in Turkey within the past half century) to tell where treasure was hidden. The first of these appears to have been common among the Assyrians, as the flaying alive of prisoners who had rendered themselves specially obnoxious. The Romans used T. in both ways; crucifixion, preceded as it was by scourging, had as a punishment the element of vindictiveness. Scourging was used by them as a means of extracting truth, especially fm. slaves. Claudius Lysias was about to apply this to the Apostle Paul (Ac. 22.[24]) when the latter appealed to his citizenship.



Assyrians flaying their Prisoners alive, and carrying away Heads of the Slain

TOU. See Toi.

TOWER represents several words in Heb. (1) Baḥan, "watch-tower" (Is. 32.[14] RV.); bāḥōn (pl. baḥūnīm) is prob. a "siege tower" (Is. 23.[13]), wh. might be used for surveying the defences as well as for purposes of attack. In Jr. 6.[27] the word poss. means "assayer," or "trier" (RVm.), from the same verb, bāḥan, "to scrutinise," or "prove." (2) Migdāl is the usual word for "tower," whether it be part of the fortification of a city (2 Ch. 14.[7], &c.), a tower for observation in the country, or for the guarding of the roads, the vineyards, or the flocks (2 K. 9.[17]; 2 Ch. 27.[4]; Is. 5.[2], &c.). (3) Migdōl is trd. as the name of a fortified city in Ex. 14.[2]; Nu. 33.[7]; Jr. 44.[1], 46.[14]. It shd. also be so rendered in Ek. 29.[10], 30.[6] (RV.). (4) Mātzōr, "siege," "entrenchment," is only once rendered "tower" (Hb. 2.[1], RVm. "fortress"). Here it may be derived from נצר, "to observe," and should be trd. "watch-tower." (5) 'Ōphel (2 K. 5.[24]) is lit. "hill." (6) Pinnah, lit. "corner." In fortified towers the corners were strengthened with battlements (2 Ch. 26.[15] RV.; cp. Ne. 3.[24], &c.; Zp. 1.[16], 3.[6]). (7) Misgāb, "high fort," or "stronghold" (Is. 25.[12]), is trd. "tower" in many figurative phrases (Is. 33.[16]; 2 S. 22.[3]; Ps. 46.[8, 12], &c.). In Jr. 48.[1] "Misgab" is probably = "Kir Moab." In NT. πύργος stands for the watch-tower in the vineyard (Mw. 21.[33], &c.) and for the fortress (Lk. 14.[28]).

Besides the towers which strengthened the exterior defences of a city, at the corners, at the gates, or at certain intervals on the walls, such as those built by Solomon and Herod (see Jerusalem), there was often a tower or citadel, to which in extremity of peril the citizens were wont to retire. The "towers" in the vineyards were probably simple structures like those to be seen to-day, of dry stones and boughs. Of the towers guarding the highways, or sources of water, in which soldiers were quartered, comparatively mod. examples may be seen at Khān et-Tujjār, to the NE. of Tabor, and at the so-called Pools of Solomon S. of Bethlehem. Strength as well as gracefulness is implied in comparing the neck of the beloved with a "tower of ivory" (SS. 7.[4]). One or other of the strong forts, occupying almost inaccessible heights in his mountainous country, would nearly always be within sight of the Israelite. This lends peculiar significance to the phrase "my high tower" as applied to God (Ps. 18.[2], &c.); and "the name of the Lord is a strong tower." If one in danger calls on the name of a powerful man, it is enough in most cases still in the East to stay the aggressor's hand. The protector's power is the measure of the security.

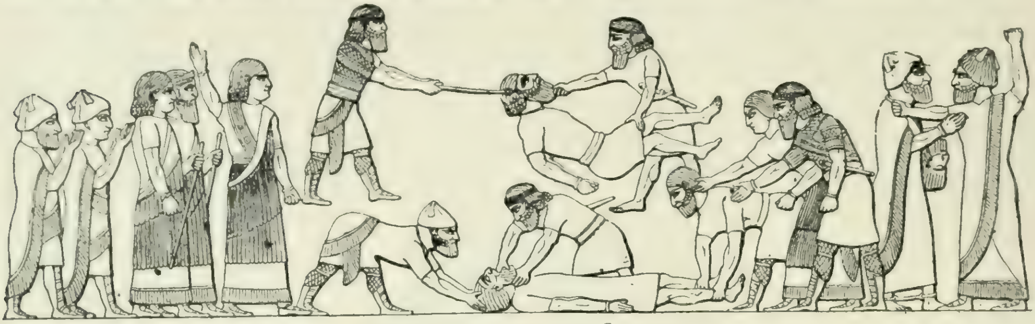
TOWN CLERK. This official is mentioned in NT. only in connection with the tumult in Ephesus (Ac. 19.[35]). The position of grammateus in Græco-Asiatic cities at that time was one of honour and responsibility, and was usually held by one who had gained repute by the discharge of important duties in the public service. The people were accustomed to meet in assembly (ekklēsia) at stated times for the transaction of business. Decrees approved by the senate were submitted to them for approval or rejection. They had no power to modify. The form in which those decrees were laid before the assembly was determined by the grammateus, who frequently presided, and himself proposed the approval of the decrees. Meetings at other times could be held only with the sanction of the provincial governor. An irregular gathering like that in the theatre at Ephesus was apt to excite the anger of the Romans, who were keenly suspicious of all movements stirring up popular excitement. Some responsibility for the orderly behaviour of the people must have lain upon the town clerk, as he seems to have thought that the proceedings involved danger to himself. The ease with which he quelled the disturbance may have been due to his own personal influence.

TRACHONITIS. The name occurs only in Lk. 3.[1], as applied to part of the tetrarchy of Philip.



ASSYRIANS TORTURING THEIR CAPTIVES

It denotes the country associated with the Trachon. Trachōn is the Greek word for "a rugged, stony tract." They called by this name two definitely marked volcanic areas to the S. and E. of Damascus. That lying to the NE. of the mountain of Bashan (mod. Jebel ed-Druze) is much the larger (eṣ-Ṣafā'), but lying as it does well into the desert zone, it is uninhabitable by man, and therefore plays no part in history. That to the NW. of the mountain—el-Lejā', "the refuge"—must always have been inhabited, and it gave its name to the surrounding district. The two Trachons referred to by Strabo (xvi. 2, 20) are of similar origin. They consist of a vast outflow of lava which, rushing over the plain, has broken up and cooled in all manner of fantastic shapes. The general level is about 30 ft. above the surrounding plain, into the greenery of which the dark, rocky edges often sink almost precipitously. That el-Lejā' is to be identified with the Trachon with which we have to do is proved by an inscription found in Musmīyeh, at the point where the Roman road from the N. entered el-Lejā' (Waddington, 2524). El-Lejā' is almost a triangle with apex to the N., with sides c. 25 and base c. 20 miles in length. The present writer describes the district as he saw it on riding through it: "Wherever we looked, before or behind, lay wide fields of volcanic rock, black and repulsive . . . with here and there a deep circular depression, through wh., in the dim past, red destruction had belched forth, now carefully walled round the lip to prevent wandering sheep or goats from falling in by night. The general impression conveyed was as if the dark waters of a great sea, lashed to fury by a storm, had been suddenly petrified. . . . At times we passed over vast sheets of lava, which, in cooling, had cracked in nearly regular lines, and wh., broken through in parts, appeared to rest on a stratum of different character, like pieces of cyclopean pavement. Curious rounded rocks were occasionally seen, like gigantic black soap-bubbles, blown up by the subterranean steam and gases of the active volcanic age, often with the side broken out, as if burst by escaping vapour; the mass, having cooled too far to collapse, remained an enduring monument of the force that formed it. Scanty vegetation peeped from the fissures in the rocks, or preserved a precarious existence in the thin soil, sometimes seen in a hollow between opposing slopes. . . . When the traveller has fairly penetrated the rough barriers that surround el-Lejā', he finds not a little pleasant land within—fertile soil which, if only freed a little more from overlying stones, might support a moderate population. In ancient times it was partly cleared, and the work of these old-world agriculturists remains in gigantic banks of stones carefully built along the edges of the patches they cultivated" (Arab and Druze at Home, pp. 30ff.). Near the centre there are breadths of fairly cultivated land. Until recently considerable tracts were covered by a forest of terebinth; but this has practically gone for timber and charcoal. A native described the district to the NE. as nothing but wa'r (rugged and stony; cp. Heb. ya'ar), over which, in summer, not even a bird would fly. Ruined sites are numerous; many houses, constructed entirely of stone, seem almost as perfect as the day they were built. Water-supply appears to have been secured by means of cisterns, in the making of which the spacious caves which abound in el-Lejā' would be largely utilised. The Trachon does not seem to be referred to in the OT. unless it is included in the ḥărērīm, "parched places" of Jr. 17.[6]. The Heb. word corresponds to the Arabic el-Ḥarrah, applied to such stony tracts in Arabia. Some have thought to identify it with Argob: this, however, is impossible (see Argob). Yet it is not easy to understand how a district of such importance, so easy of defence, so well described by its Arabic name, "the refuge," should have been overlooked.

The robber Arabs of el-Lejā', who, in alliance with the bandit chief, Zenodorus, terrorised the country, were brought into subjection by Herod the Great, who, however, was able to preserve tranquillity only by means of an army of 3000 Idumæans whom he kept in the district (Ant. XV. x. 1ff.; XVI. ix. 1f.), giving command to a Babylonian Jew, Zamaris by name (Ant. XVII. ii. 1ff.). When Herod died (B.C. 4) Trachonitis was part of the territory wh., by his will, fell to his son Philip (Ant. XVII. viii. 1; xi. 4, &c.). While Philip lived, good order seems to have been preserved. Dying in A.D. 34, after a reign of thirty-seven years, he left no heir. Tiberius therefore added his tetrarchy to the province of Syria (Ant. XVIII. iv. 6). It was given by Caligula to Agrippa I. in A.D. 37. At his death in A.D. 44 his son was still a minor; the district was therefore administered by Roman officers under the governor of Syria, until in A.D. 53 it passed into the hands of Agrippa II., who reigned until he died, A.D. 100. The Romans then again took control. In 106, under Trajan, Cornelius Palma constituted the new province of Arabia, making Bozrah the capital, and a period of great prosperity followed, carrying forward the work of civilisation begun by Agrippa I. and his successor. Of this evidence is furnished by the Greek inscriptions which are plentiful, the remains of buildings, temples, theatres, roads, aqueducts, &c. To this period must be assigned the great bulk of the remains found above-ground in the region to-day.

TRADE AND COMMERCE. Even when communities were very small, one of the most obvious benefits wh. accrued to their members was the opportunity of exchange. As communities became larger and functions became separated, possibilities of exchange multiplied; barley cd. be bartered for ploughs, and oxen for clothes. A further stage was reached when communities began to enter into commercial relations with each other. Neglecting for the moment those that were of the nature of castes, certain of the tribes that occupied different geographical situations may have been in want of what, if not necessities of existence, yet made life more comfortable and healthy. Thus some nomads who lived mainly on milk and flesh, with an admixture possibly of dates, wd. find life more healthful if they mingled the diet of their deserts with cereal meal, either of barley or wheat, and wd. therefore be glad to exchange their camels or oxen for grain and for mills to grind it. Metals wd. soon be recognised as necessities; every one not having tools or weapons of metal wd. see himself set at such a disadvantage that he wd. endeavour to possess himself of them by means of barter. So on the other hand those living where metals cd. be wrought cd. only share in the fertility of the plains by bartering. The earliest records we have reveal a complicated system of inter-relations. The laws of Ḥammurabi are largely occupied with questions of the exchange of commodities, interest on loans, and rent of land. These, however, are mainly domestic, but in the Tell Amarna tablets we have foreign commerce taken for granted as of long standing, having regular routes along wh. goods were conveyed. Between the time of Ḥammurabi and that of the Amarna letters occurred the history of Joseph. The sale of Joseph into Egypt implies trade routes and recognised traders upon them. The caravan of his brethren to buy corn confirms this, for we are not to consider the bĕnē Yisrā'ēl singular in the discovery that there was corn in Egypt. The trade in this case was a government affair. Our object in the present instance is, however, to consider the nature and extent of the commercial intercourse of Israel with Gentile nations during the continuance of the Jewish State. Addicted to commerce as the Jewish race are now, the fact that merchants were called "Canaanites" is evidence that, compared with other races in Pal., they were not commercial. In the next place we must remember that in no portion, save perhaps in the case of the territory of Asher, did Israel abut on the sea in the formative period of their history. Roughly speaking, S. of Carmel the Philistines possessed the sea coast, and north of it the Phœnicians. Palestine, besides, is very destitute of natural harbours; there are no inlets where the sea runs up into the land as it does in Greece; no islands form breakwaters, no great river falling into the sea affords a harbour in its estuary. Thus cut off fm. direct sea traffic, they had either to convey their merchandise by caravan, or, using the maritime peoples as their intermediaries, ship through them. Under David the Philistines became tributary to Israel, but of their cities only Joppa had even indifferent accommodation for sea-going vessels. It is in the reign of Solomon that Israel first appears as a trading nation. Yet in his case the conveyance of horses and chariots fm. Egypt was a commercial enterprise undertaken by the king himself, not a general movement of the people. He appears to have held possession of Joppa, as there he received the cedar trees sent by Hiram. In default of harbours in his own immediate territory Solomon endeavoured to utilise the extensive Gulf of 'Aqaba by taking fm. his tributary, Edom, the city of Elath, wh. approximately represents the modern 'Aqaba. Fm. his ally Hiram were sent "shipmen that had knowledge of the sea," to educate the servants of Solomon in seamanship. We are not to suppose that Solomon merely exported to Ophir the scant surplusage of the oil and barley produced in Pal. He imported for export the wheat of the Haurān, the fabrics of Damascus, and the merchandise of Tyre; only in this way can we explain the rich results of these voyages (1 K. 9.[28]; 2 Ch. 8.[18]). 420 talents of gold wd. be c. £2,500,000; this probably represents the profit not only of what was sold fm. the products of Syria in Ophir, but also of the products of Ophir sold in Syria. Merchandise beyond the sea was not a thing for private enterprise in those days; it was for "the kings of the Hittites and for the kings of Syria" that Solomon imported horses and chariots fm. Egypt. With his possession of Philistia and Edom Solomon held all the caravan routes between Egypt and Syria. All the while there was no class of merchants or of tradespeople in Israel; the people did not take any interest in traffic; consequently with the passing away of the merchant prince merchandise ceased. Probably, even though there had been no revolt of the Northern Tribes, Rehoboam wd. have been unable to have continued the enterprises of his father; but the revolt did occur, and was followed by the invasion by Shishak. After this the monarchs of Israel cease to be traders. Jehoshaphat and Ahaziah had something of Solomon's plan in mind, but the storm that destroyed the ships at Ezion-Geber, and the death of Ahaziah, put a stop to this plan (2 Ch. 20.[36, 37]). Meantime there was a certain amount of individual business carried on; the streets (ḥūtzōth) wh. Ahab was to set up in Damascus seem to have really been bazaars in wh. the Israelites mt. have their shops. In the description of the trade of Tyre, Judah and Israel are declared to have traded in her market "wheat of Minnith and Pannag, and honey, and oil, and balm" (Ek. 27.[17]).

It ought to be noted that "Minnith" and "Pannag" are probably not the names of places but of commodities; LXX "myrrh and cassia," Psh. "rice and scents." "Dan" in v. 19 is possibly a district in Arabia.

The post-exilic notices of trade in Nehemiah exhibit the Jews as purchasing, not exporting. At the same time, from the history of later Judaism, it is certain that with this crisis in their national development the Jews began to be the traders they have become. They were removed fm. their ancestral fields by the deportation to Babylon; on their return it wd. be impossible to secure their former possessions fm. those who had assumed property in them. Hence they were necessarily forced into traffic. The Macedonian and Roman empires enabled the Jews to spread and carry on trade fm. the heart of Persia to the Pillars of Hercules. Their occupations seem generally to have been humble.

Modes of conveyance form an important question in regard to commerce. Under the Romans the splendid roads they made for military purposes served the occasions of traffic, and by their stern extinction of piracy the Mediterranean became safe for trading vessels, and regular trade routes were established. In earlier days the roads were, as to a great extent they are still in Pal., paths beaten flat by the feet of the camels. These caravan routes became fixed by custom, so that, although the rains of winter mt. obliterate the road, the general track wd. be kept when the dry season enabled traffic to be resumed. There were three main tracks: one following the coast; another to the E. of Jordan, wh. may be traced by the great cities that sprang up in its course—Amman, Jerash, Muzērīb; the third proceeded more irregularly up the centre of the country. For commercial purposes wheeled vehicles were little used; all merchandise was conveyed on the backs of asses, mules, and camels; the horse was only used for war and pageants. See Palestine, Roads.

TRADITION. The "tradition of the elders" (Mw. 15.[2], &c.), which in later days was held in supreme reverence by pious Jews, consisted of additions to and explanation of the written law, wh. were believed to have been communicated orally to Moses. He in turn passed them on to the elders. Then from generation to generation they were handed down; growing, naturally, in bulk and complexity, as with changing conditions new interpreters had to discover and teach fresh applications. The requirements and prohibitions came to be perfectly bewildering in their number and character. In this way was formed the mass of tradition with which the SCRIBES had to deal. Such importance was attached to it that if in any point it came into opposition to the written law, at least the spirit of it, the latter had to give way: i.e. it was made "of none effect" (Mw. 15.[6], &c.). The importance attached to the mere washing of the hands well illustrates the emphasis laid on quite trifling things, emptying the obligation of moral content, and making observance a burden. The "tradition" was committed to writing in the beginning of the third Christian cent., under the superintendence of Rabbi Yehudah haq-Qōdesh, in Tiberias. This, known as the Mishna (the "second law"), with the commentaries upon it (Gemara), constitutes the Talmud.

The growth of tradition in bulk, complexity, and authority was not a peculiarity of the Jewish system. It finds ample illustration in the related faith of Islām. Beyond the revelation contained in the Qor'ān, Moslems believe that the prophet received an "unread revelation," in accordance with which he gave authoritative decisions on religious questions, moral, ceremonial, or doctrinal. Tradition is concerned with what the prophet said and did, and is regarded as the uninspired record of an inspired life. It includes also what was done in his presence without rebuke; and the authoritative sayings and doings of the companions of the prophet, who might be supposed best to understand his mind. In process of time many cases arose for wh. the Qor'ān made no provision. These were settled by appeal to tradition, wh. thus came to take a position in some respects practically superior to that of the Qor'ān itself.

We need not do more than allude to the position held by tradition in the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches. Nor can we say that traditional interpretations of truth are without influence among ourselves. The element of value in tradition is recognised by St. Paul, when he applies the term to the truth of the Gospel as communicated to others by the first believers (2 Th. 2.[15], 3.[6]).

TRANCE (Gr. ekstasis) occurs three times in Ac., always of visions; twice of Peter's at Joppa (10.[10], 11.[5]), and once of Paul's in the Temple at Jerusalem (26.[17]). The Gr. word occurs elsewhere, and is rendered "astonishment," "amazed," expressing the feelings with which the spectators beheld the miracles of Christ, or heard tidings of the resurrection. In the LXX it is used of deep sleep, as of Adam (Gn. 2.[21]), of the panic that fell on the camp of the Philistines when Jonathan and his armour-bearer assailed them (1 S. 14.[15]), the amazement that was to fall upon the "princes of the sea" when they shd. hear the news of the fall of Tyre (Ek. 26.[16]). In Dn. 10.[7] there is a distinction made between the ekstasis wh. fell upon Daniel's attendants and the "vision" (optasia) vouchsafed to himself. The influence of Deity is implied, generally either giving a vision or prompting to action; there is no loss of intelligence implied.

TRANSFIGURATION, THE. Of this transcendent event in the life of Jesus there is an account, with slight variations, in each of the first three Gospels, and it is alluded to in the second Epistle of Peter (Mw. 17.[1-8]; Mk. 9.[2-8]; Lk. 9.[28-36]; 2 P. 1.[16-18]). The name comes to us through the Latin tr. (transfiguratus est) of the Greek metamorphōthē. In the narratives of the evangelists the following details are peculiar to each, viz., Mw. 17.[6, 7]: the disciples hearing the voice fell on their faces in fear; Jesus coming, touches them, bidding them arise and fear not; Mk. 9.[3], "so as no fuller on earth can whiten them." St. Luke tells the story in his own language, with certain additions. Jesus did not go to the mountain to be transfigured, but to pray. While He was praying the fashion of His countenance was altered (lit. "became other"). He must have deliberately rejected the word metamorphōthē, owing, no doubt, to its association with the changes in form supposed to be effected by the gods of the heathen. He tells us also the subject of conversation with Moses and Elias (v. 31), and that the disciples were drowsy (v. 32).

The tradition wh. places the Transfiguration on the Mt. of Olives need not be considered. Jesus and His disciples were in the north; and in any case there was no fit locality on Olivet. For many centuries it was thought that MOUNT TABOR might claim the distinction. But two considerations seem decisive to the contrary. Jesus was on His way to Jerusalem. (a) While it was possible in the time indicated to go from Cæsarea Philippi to Mount Tabor, and then to return to Capernaum (Mw. and Mk., "six days"; Lk. about "eight days"—more than ample time), there is no evident reason why He should have done this. (b) It appears certain that the summit of Tabor was at that time occupied by a town, which during the Jewish war was fortified by Josephus (BJ. IV. i. 8, &c.). During a stay of some weeks on the mountain the present writer satisfied himself that the remoteness and quietude required for such a transaction could not be found on Mt. Tabor.

Many recent writers favour some spot on Mount

Hermon or one of the spurs of that mountain. There is nothing, however, that points certainly to Mt. Hermon. Cæsarea Philippi was then mainly a heathen city, and the centre of a non-Jewish population (Schürer, HJP. II. i. 133f.). Both the city and the mountain were beyond the border of Galilee. "The sacredness of Hermon in the eyes of the surrounding tribes" could hardly have "fitted it for the purpose" (Stanley, SP. 399), since its associations were all with heathen worship. Whatever help the identification received from "the transient comparison of the celestial splendour with the snow, where alone it cd. be seen in Pal." (ib. 400), must be given up, as ὡς χίων forms no part of the original text (Mk. 9.[3]). There are, however, few heights in Palestine from which Hermon is not visible: and looking from Jebel Jermuk on a clear night, the snow on Hermon seems close at hand.

Jesus "went up into the mountain to pray" (Lk.

Safed and Jebel Jermuk

9.[28]), prob. at night, as He seems to have come down "the next day" (v. 37). With this purpose in view it is hard to see why the ascent of Hermon should have been undertaken, involving a journey to the neighbourhood of Hasbeiyah, whence the mountain is most accessible. Even then the ascent is long and toilsome. The association of Hermon with idolatry might be a reason for avoiding it. If these difficulties were got over, it is yet obvious that in this district, on descending, He wd. not have met a crowd of Jews. The presence of "the scribes questioning with them" clearly indicates a Jewish multitude (Mk. 9.[14]).

Among the mountains of Upper Galilee Jebel Jermuk is specially conspicuous, its shapely form rising full 4000 ft. above the sea. It is the highest mountain in Palestine proper, and is fitly described as ὑψηλόν. In that district it is the mountain, par excellence (Lk. 9.[28]). It stands to the W., over against the Safed uplands, separated from them by a spacious valley, in the bottom of wh. runs the tremendous gorge, Wādy Leimun. It is by far the most striking feature in all the Galilean landscape. It rises from the midst of a district wh. then supported a large population of Jews, with such important Jewish centres as Kefr Bir'im, Gischala, Meirōn, &c., around its base. Remote and lonely as it is, the summit was just such a place as Jesus mt. have chosen for prayer. It was comparatively easy to reach, and might be comfortably climbed in the evening. Then, on His descent next day, the crowd might swiftly assemble from the country and the villages near by.

From Mw. 17.[22] it is almost a necessary inference that the healing of the demoniac boy took place in Galilee. Mark's statement that they went forth from thence and passed through Galilee, does not conflict with this. From Jermuk to Capernaum He was passing through Galilean territory.

How long our Lord stayed near Cæsarea Philippi after the conversation recorded in Mw. 16. we do not know. From Banias to Gischala, e.g., one might walk on foot without fatigue in a couple of days. If a little time were spent in the Jewish villages passed on the way, the six days, or Luke's "about eight days," are easily accounted for. It is significant that St. Luke, while recording the conversation, the Transfiguration, and the miracle, makes no allusion to Cæsarea Philippi (cf. art. by the present writer in Expository Times, vol. xviii. p. 333f.).

As to the nature of the transaction, it is described by Jesus as a "vision" (Mw. 17.[9]). The fact that it was seen by three men, whose independent testimony is evidently reflected in the extant narrative, at once takes it out of the region of unreality. How they were able to recognise the visitors from the spirit world we do not know; but doubtless this was part of the Divine revelation granted to them. The reality of the event was accepted in the early Church (2 P. 1.[16ff.]). On any other theory it is difficult to see why Jesus should be represented as enjoining silence upon His disciples.

The full significance of the Transfiguration does not fall to be discussed here. Possibly we may see in it the opening of the door by which Jesus might have resumed His place in the heavenlies. It was now abundantly clear that to accomplish the task for which He had come, in the way before Him, He must pass through suffering and shameful death. If He now regretted His choice, there was even yet this way of escape, leaving men to their fate. If this were so, then, in full view of all it meant, His final decision was taken, and we can understand why His "decease," about to be accomplished, was the subject of converse; and the experience on the mount may well have been designed to strengthen Him for His awful duty. From the vision and the voice, also, the disciples received impressions of the true nature of their Master, and of the kingdom He had come to establish, for the proper development of wh. time and reflection were required. This may in part explain why they were forbidden to speak of it. The glimpse of their Master's essential glory, associated as it was with the thought of His death, no doubt prepared them in due time to receive and accept the astounding news of His resurrection.

Hyæna caught in Trap

TRAP. Three Heb. words are so rendered. (1) Mōqēsh (Jo. 23.[13]; Ps. 69.[22]), a cord with a running noose, set for birds and ground game: see Snare. (2) Malkodeth, lit. "a catching instrument." It is used only figuratively (Jb. 18.[10]). (3) Mashḥith, lit. "ruin" or destruction (Jr. 5.[26]), applied to the "trap" as a means of bringing destruction upon the victim. The Greek θήρα (Rm. 11.[9]) is lit. "a hunting of wild beasts." The words here quoted are not found in either MT. or LXX. Perhaps we should render "let them be for a hunting."

The illustrations show ancient methods of trapping wild animals.

TREASURE, TREASURY. The Heb. word 'ōtzār denotes either the treasure, or the place where the treasure is kept. It is used of vessels made of the precious metals, gold, silver, &c. (Jo. 6.[19, 24]; Is. 2.[7], &c.). "Treasures of darkness" (Is. 45.[3]) are such as have been hoarded or concealed. It is applied to wealth, i.e. ample material resources (Pr. 15.[16], &c.). It describes the material David had prepared for the building of the Temple (1 Ch. 29.[8], &c.). In 2 Ch. 11.[11] it is the "store" (EV.) of victual and oil and wine. It stands for the place where the precious things are kept (1 K. 7.[51], &c.); for granary or store (Jl. 1.[17], &c.), and for a magazine of arms (Jr. 50.[25] [fig.]). With beth, also, it stands for "treasure-house" (Ne. 10.[38]), and for "store-house" or "magazine" (Ml. 3.[10]). It occurs also, figuratively, for God's "store-houses" of rain, snow, hail, wind, and sea (Dt. 28.[12]; Jb. 38.[22]; Jr. 10.[13], 51.[16]; Ps. 33.[7], 135.[7]); see Oxford Heb.-Eng. Lex. s.v. The other Heb. words do not call for special notice. But we may observe that Pharaoh's "treasure cities," 'ārē miskĕnoth (Ex. 1.[11]), are cities where provisions are stored. In NT. thesauros has also the double meaning; e.g. in Mw. 2.[11] it stands for the precious gifts brought by the Wise Men; while in Mw. 12.[35], 13.[52] we should read "treasury," not "treasure." In Ac. 8.[27] gaza, a word of Persian origin, is used for the "treasure" of Candace. The treasury (Mk. 12.[41], &c.) prob. means the outer court of the Temple, having thirteen openings shaped like trumpets, for the reception of Temple offerings and gifts for the poor (Gould, St. Mark, in loc.). The korbanās (Mw. 27.[6]) was the sacred treasure chest, the receptacle for the Corban, into wh. no foreign coins, and nothing with any taint, might be cast (Dt. 23.[18]). The thirty pieces of silver returned by Judas would be held to come under this prohibition.

Lion let out of Trap

TREASURER. The term (pl.) occurs in Ne. 13.[13] for Heb. 'ōtzārōth, from 'ātzar, "to lay up"; in Ez. 1.[8], 7.[21] for gizbār, a Persian loan-word; in Dn. 3.[2, 3] for gidabraiyā', prob. a scribal error by dittography from the following dĕthabraiyā'; in Is. 22.[15] for ṣākan, "servitor," "steward," from ṣākan, "to be of use, or service." In NT. "treasurer" appears only in RV. (Rm. 16.[23]), replacing AV. "Chamberlain."

TREE. The particular trees mentioned in the Bible are dealt with in articles under their separate names. The ancient woods and forests of Pal. have largely disappeared. Such trees as are found to-day are for the most part cultivated for the sake of the fruit they bear. Large, solitary trees, however, still form striking features in most of the landscapes. This must always have been true in Palestine; and now, as in ancient times, such trees, especially the oak and the terebinth, are often associated with a shrine, the reputed tomb of some saint. They are held sacred as his property, and regarded with reverence. They may even be endowed with supernatural powers, so that help, healing, and guidance may be obtained from them. Even apart from such connection with a shrine, trees may have derived peculiar qualities from the resting of a saint under their shadows. It is impossible to deny that such trees are the objects of worship. "Incense is burned to them, and they receive sacrifices and offerings; they are loaded with food, gifts, and (on special occasions) with lamps. They give oracles, and the sick sleep beneath their shade, confident that a supernatural messenger will prescribe for their ailments. They are decked with rags, wh. thus acquire wonderful properties; and the worshipper who leaves a shred, as a pledge of attachment, or, it may be, to transfer a malady, will take away a rag wh. may serve as a charm" (Cook, Religion of Ancient Palestine, 25). It is certain that in these modern, popular beliefs and practices we have survivals from ancient times (see Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day, passim, esp. pp. 90ff.). The "fall" is represented as taking place under a tree (Gn. 3.[6]). Abraham came to the terebinth of Moreh ("teacher," or "seer") (Gn. 12.[6]). Poss. under this very tree Jacob "hid" the strange gods, &c. (35.[4]); and under the oak near Bethel he buried Rachel (v. 8). Deborah sat under a palm (Jg. 4.[5]).

Sacred Tree (Nimrud)

Under a terebinth in Ophra sat the angel of the Lord (6.[11]). The green trees and thick terebinths were closely associated with the idolatrous worship into which Israel was so often seduced (Ek. 6.[13]; cp. Is. 1.[29]). The 'ashērah, associated with worship in the high places (1 K. 14.[23], &c.), was prob. a tree-like post. Figures of the sacred tree are found on the monuments. It is interesting to note that in the apocalyptic vision the symbol of healing for the nations is found in the leaves of the tree of life (Rv. 22.[2]).

"Tree" is used for the stake on which the body of an executed criminal might be raised for exposure (Dt. 21.[22f]; Jo. 8.[29]). This exposure was deep indignity. "Tree" is also used frequently for the cross on which Jesus suffered (Ac. 5.[30]; Gal. 3.[13], &c.).

TRESPASS-OFFERING. See Sacrifice.

TRIAL. Originally among the Hebrews, as among all nomads, the right of punishment and therefore of trial resided in the chief; Judah claimed this right in regard to Tamar (Gn. 38.[24]). When wrong was done to one outside the clan then revenge was the remedy; if one of the clan had been killed, then the avenger of blood must pursue the manslayer. The institution of the Cities of Refuge was a means of forcing men to lay aside blood vengeance and seek the righting of wrongs fm. a properly constituted tribunal. The tribunal contemplated in this institution appears to be the whole congregation, presumably of the City of Refuge, who shd. decide whether any given "man-slayer" had accidentally or with intention slain his fellow. In 1 K. 21. we have an account of a trial in wh., since there was glaring injustice as to fact, we may presume there wd. be the most scrupulous attention to legal form. First a crime is alleged against Naboth; as if in penitence for the sin of one of its members, a fast is proclaimed to the whole community; as the impeached person, Naboth is set on high; then the suborned witnesses come forward and declare what they allege they have heard. This process was carried out before the whole congregation of Naboth's city, and he was condemned by the shout of the multitude, much as, nearly a millennium later, a Holier was. The elders seem to have presided on such occasions. It is difficult to see what the function of the "judges" was in such a process, and yet they seem to have acted along with the "elders" (Ez. 10.[14]). When we come to NT. times the two trials of our Lord, before the Sanhedrin and before Pilate, are the first and most important. As shown by Dr. Taylor Innes (Trial of Jesus Christ, pp. 14–59), the rules laid down in the Talmud were flagrantly transgressed; it is possible that he accepts too implicitly the Talmudic statements; his own quotations show the Talmudic disregard for fact. In regard to the Roman trial we are on safer ground. The Jewish trial of our Lord was before the Sanhedrin as a cause célèbre; after the arrest there ought to have been a delay, as there was in the apostles' case (Ac. 5.[18]). Although the injustice of suborning witnesses is obvious, yet the fact that when the witnesses do not agree they give up testimony and proceed to adjuration, proves a certain attention to the forms of judicial procedure. It proves that the evidence of one witness alone was not regarded as sufficient. The witnesses were kept apart, so that it was made impossible for the second witness to copy the first. The trials of the earlier apostles and of Paul appear to have less of the formal about them. The Roman trial of our Lord and those of Paul belong rather to Roman jurisprudence than to Biblical science. It may be noted that not one of these was, strictly speaking, a regular trial; no witnesses were called either for the prosecution or defence; hence a discussion of the Roman methods of criminal procedure, while of interest, is not of importance in regard to Biblical study.

TRIBE in OT. translates two Heb. words. (1) Maṭṭeh (lit. "staff" or "rod," the badge of a leader) may have meant originally a company led by a chief with a "staff" (Oxford Heb. Lex. s.v.).

(2) Shēbeṭ (lit. " rod," " staff," " sceptre," a " club " used by shepherds in mustering their sheep: a " truncheon " or " sceptre ") is used as a synonym for maṭṭeh, but also for a portion or sub-division of a tribe; e.g. " the tribe of the families of the Kohathites from among the Levites " (Nu. 4.[18]).

" Tribe " is the name given to each division of the people of Israel which claimed descent from one of the sons of Jacob, and was known by the name of its reputed ancestor. On this theory each tribe was composed of the descendants of a single patriarch, and, after the conquest of Palestine, had assigned to it a portion of the land for its own possession. In recent years many scholars have favoured the view that the story of the patriarchs and their immediate descendants is not really concerned with individuals, but presents, in the form of personal narratives, the history of the tribes. It is taken as certain that before the Conquest there was no complete tribal organisation. While certain tribes were fairly defined, the people as a whole consisted of a congeries of kindred clans. The twofold process of separation and concentration went forward as groups of families were moved by community of interest. The consolidation of the tribe was secured, and the sense of unity promoted, by the practice of common religious rites, and sharing the sacrificial meal, which was supposed to create identity of blood (see KIN, KINSHIP). In this way arose the tribes of Gad, Asher, Dan, and Naphtali, who are represented as sons of Jacob's concubines. Ephraim and Manasseh arise through partition of the tribe of Joseph: their kinship did not prevent risk of conflict at times (Ju 8.[1]).

There is little in Scrip. to guide us as to the internal constitution of the tribe after the Conquest, how order was preserved and justice administered. Probably the system resembled (that which obtains among the Arabian tribes to-day. The direction of affairs would be mainly in the hands of the " elders " of each township or division of the community, their authority and influence being not statutory but personal. They were open to be roused and led to war by any man of striking ability. The bonds that united them before the days of the kings seem to have been slender; and perhaps traces may be seen of the rivalry between the northern and the southern tribes, destined to culminate in the great schism.

We need not doubt the historical character of the patriarchal narratives, and the account there given of the origin of the tribes. But it may be taken as certain that the strength of each tribe was augmented by the introduction of foreign slaves, wives, &c., and, after the settlement in Canaan, by absorption of the native elements of population within their various territories.

For the history of individual tribes see separate articles.

TRIBUTE. By tribute we commonly mean a fixed amount paid by one nation to another as the price of peace or protection. In EV., however, it translates several words of very different meanings. (1) Bĕlō (Aram., prob. loan-word fm. Asyr. or Old Iranian), prop. " payment in kind " (Ez. 4.[13, 20], 7.[24], RV. " custom "). The word mindāh (Asyr. loan-word), wh. precedes bĕlō in this verse, AV. trs. " custom," RV. " tribute." It is prob. a form of middāh, wh. appears in Ez. 6.[8]; Ne. 5.[4]. (2) Mekeṣ, " computation," a tax to be paid according to a fixed proportion (Nu. 31.[28, 37, 38, 41]). (3) Maṣ, a collective name, denoting a body of forced labourers, and then the forced labour itself, taskwork, and serfdom. The body of forced workers, raised by levy for the public service, is referred to in 2 S. 20.[24] under David, and it was used on a far larger scale by Solomon (1 K. 4.[6], 5.[13], 9.[15, 21], &c.).

A SUBJECT PEOPLE PAYING TRIBUTE

The word appears in the pl. miṣṣīm, in Ex. 1.[11], where the overseers of the slave-gangs are mentioned. Maṣ stands for the forced labour to wh. conquered and subject peoples were put (Gn. 49.[15]; Dt. 20.[11]; Jo. 16.[10], &c.). The tribute laid by Ahasuerus upon the isles of the sea was prob. enforced payment. (4) Miṣṣath (Aram. often in Tg. and Syriac V.), " sufficiency." In Dt. 16.[10], where alone it occurs in MT., it signifies that the freewill offering is to be equal to the giver's ability, according as the Lord has prospered him. (5) Maṣṣā', a load, or burden, that which is carried, as e.g. silver for tribute (2 Ch. 17.[11]). (6) 'Ōnesh, " a fine," the " indemnity " imposed on Judah by Pharaoh-necho (2 K. 23.[33]). It is the " penalty " or " fine " borne by the man of great wrath (Pr. 19.[19]).

In the NT.: (1) The didrachmon (Mw. 17.[24]) is the half-shekel (RV.) which every male Israelite was under obligation to pay into the Temple treasury, to meet the expense of the public sacrifices. The tetradrachmon (v. 27) was therefore = a shekel, and so sufficient for both Peter and his Master. (2) The kēnsos was first the register of property wh. furnished the basis for calculating the taxes, then it came to mean the tax levied upon persons or property (Mw. 17.[25]; Mk. 12.[14], &c.). (3) Phoros was a tax upon the land, payable in kind. Both kēnsos and phoros were taxes collected on behalf of the imperial government. The tribute money was a Roman coin. The imperial taxes could be legally paid only in imperial coin.

TRINITY. This is a purely theological term, and is not found in the Bible. The Christian Church asserts its belief in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, one God, and the name "Trinity" is applied to the peculiarly Christian idea of the Godhead, in which, within the unity of the Godhead, three distinct "persons" are distinguished. Christians from the earliest times worshipped and prayed to Jesus Christ as God, they prayed to the God whom Jesus revealed as Father, and to the Holy Spirit whom Jesus promised to send to carry on His work. At the same time they held fast to the belief in the unity of God. Thus the doctrine of the Trinity was developed to give expression on the one hand to the unity of God, and on the other, to guard the doctrines of the Divinity of Christ and the distinct personality of the Holy Spirit. The doctrine is stated in the formula: "The Father is God, the Son is God, the Holy Spirit is God. And yet they are not three Gods but one God. The Godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost is all one, the Glory equal, the Majesty co-eternal. And in this Trinity none is afore or after other, none is greater than another, but the whole three Persons are co-eternal together and co-equal."

This doctrine is based on the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, and His claim to be the Son of God, whom He revealed as Father. He is distinct from God the Father, and can say "Thou" to Him, while He speaks of the Holy Ghost as "He," and ascribes to Him a distinct personality and work. In all the books of the NT. Divine names are applied to all three, and prayers are offered to all equally, while the unity of God is as strongly asserted (1 Cor. 8.[4]; Js. 2.[19]). The aspects of this doctrine which have been attacked are: (1) the Divinity of Christ (cp. art. Christ, Person of); and (2) the distinct Personality of the Holy Spirit (cp. art. Spirit). We must remember that the word "person" in this connection is not used in the sense of separate, independent existence, as that would involve Tritheism, but is intended to denote distinctions in the Godhead which are no mere temporal manifestations or modes of Divine activity, but eternally abiding differences within the Divine Unity. The further treatment of this specifically Christian conception belongs to Dogmatic Theology and History of Dogma.

Lit.: Works on Dogmatic Theology by Hodge, Oostezee, Martensen, Dorner, Haering, Kaftan, &c.; Harnack, History of Dogma; Illingworth, Personality, &c.: Doctrine of the Trinity; Cunningham, Historical Theology, &c., &c.

W. F. Boyd.

TRIUMPH. In 2 Cor. 2.[14]; Col. 2.[15] there is allusion to the custom of voting a Roman general a "triumph" on his return from victorious war. He then rode in a triumphal procession through the city. The glory of the triumph was greatly enhanced if he were able to make a show openly in his train of famous foemen, whom he had vanquished and led captive.

TROAS, a city of Mysia, situated over against the island of Tenedos, on the coast of Asia Minor. Here St. Paul saw the vision of the man of Macedonia, and hence he set out to carry the Gospel across the sea to Europe (Ac. 16.[8, 11]). Here he waited expecting to meet Titus (2 Cor. 2.[12, 13]). Here he joined those who had gone on before him from Philippi (Ac. 20.[5f.]), and before he left the incident connected with Eutychus occurred. Prob. on another visit, of wh. we have no record, he left the cloak, books, and parchments in the house of Crispus, wh. he desired Timothy to fetch him (2 Tm. 4.[13]).

The full name of the city was Alexandria Troas, i.e. Trojan Alexandria. It was thus distinguished from other cities bearing the same name. Sometimes, however, it was called by the name Alexandria alone, e.g. by Strabo and Polybius; and again by Troas alone (Pliny, HN. v. 33). It was founded as Antigonia Troas by Antigonus, who peopled it with drafts from the population of neighbouring cities. Lysimachus enlarged and adorned it in B.C. 300, under the name of Alexandria Troas. After the fall of Antiochus the Great it passed to the Romans. The favour shown by the latter to the city was due in some measure to their belief that from the Troad their race took its origin. Augustus made Troas a Roman colony. It is said that both Julius Cæsar and Constantine thought of making it the capital of the Roman empire. In connection with the latter it is interesting to note that the mod. name of the place is Eski-Stamboul, "Old Stamboul." Under the Romans the city enjoyed a period of great prosperity. Augustus, Hadrian, and Herodes Atticus all made substantial contributions to its beauty and splendour. To the last-named was due the aqueduct, the remains of which for long were an imposing feature in the plain. The position of Troas at the eastern end of the great sea-passage between Asia and Europe lent it unique importance, and here trade routes from north and south, as well as from the interior, had their focus. The extent of the ruins shows how great a part the city must have played in these days. The wall enclosed a space of more than a square mile. The ancient harbour may also be traced, the basin measuring 400 × 200 ft.

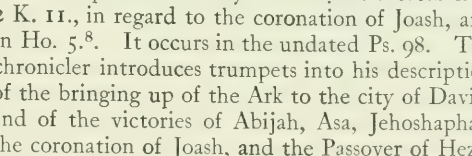
TROGYLLIUM. To the NW. of Caria, on the coast of Asia Minor, Mount Mycale terminates towards the sea in the spur known as Trogyllium, the mod. Cape Santa Maria. It overlaps the eastern projection of the island of Samos, from wh. it is separated by a strait, now called Little Boghaz, about a mile in breadth. The ship in wh. St. Paul sailed, returning from his third missionary journey, having passed Chios, made for the eastern promontory of Samos, sailed through this strait, perhaps touching at the island, and remained overnight at Trogyllium (Ac. 20.[15]). In the chief MSS. (א, A, B, C), the phrase, "tarried at T." does not appear. TR., however, probably preserves the correct reading. It was impossible to make the voyage from Chios to Miletus in a single day. The night must have been spent in this neighbourhood. There is an anchorage a little way E. of the extreme point of the spur, which is still known as St. Paul's Port.

TROOP. The Heb. word gĕdūd signifies primarily a company of marauders, men banded together for purposes of plunder. EV. frequently renders band. Irresponsible, subject to no regular discipline or control, making sudden incursions where opportunity offered, and swiftly dissolving if danger threatened them, such bands became a cause of frequent mischief and constant insecurity to peaceful dwellers within reach of their haunts (1 S. 30.[8], &c.; 2 Ch. 22.[1]; Ho. 6.[9], &c.). The word is used also for the raid or foray itself made by regular troops (2 S. 3.[22] RV.). In later use it applied to a detachment of the army (1 Ch. 7.[4]). In 2 Ch. 25.[9f.] it is the "army" of mercenaries hired by Amaziah from Israel.

TROPHIMUS, a companion of St. Paul, a native of Ephesus, who accompanied him fm. Macedonia to Jerusalem. He with some others preceded Paul to Troas (Ac. 20.[4]). In Jerusalem he was seen by certain Jews of Asia with Paul, and thus was the occasion of the riot wh. so nearly cost the apostle his life (Ac. 21.[29]). The only other notice of him we have is in 2 Tm. 4.[20], "T. have I left in Miletus sick"; this must have occurred in the interval between Paul's first and second imprisonment. It was suggested by Dean Stanley that T. was the "brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches" (2 Cor. 8.[18]).

TRUMPET, FEAST OF TRUMPETS. Trumpet represents mainly two Heb. words, ḥătzotzĕrāh and shōphār; the Gr. is salpinx. The former of these was a priestly instrument; the formation of it is commanded by God, and its use prescribed (Nu. 10.[2-10]). A pair of them were to be made; they were to be of one piece of silver; their form is well known fm. the figure on the Arch of Titus, and fm. the coins of Barcochba—thin, straight, with bell-shaped mouth, slightly under a cubit in length (Jos. Ant. III. xii.): the Egyptian military T. was of this shape. The greater part of the passage referred to defines the use to be made of these while Isr. was still encamped; if the priest blew (taqa') with only one trumpet, the heads of the people were to assemble at the door of the Tabernacle; if, however, both were blown, then the whole assembly were summoned. When the T. "sounded an alarm" (tĕrū'āh), then the east camp, that of Judah, was to strike tent and move, then the Tabernacle was to be taken down; next the camp of Reuben, that to the S., moved, and then that of Ephraim, and last, that of Dan. The precise difference between a simple blast of the T. and "sounding an alarm," cannot be fixed with any accuracy, but it wd. seem that the latter was louder and more prolonged. In the pre-exilic Scriptures the only use of ḥătzotzĕrōth is in 2 K. 11., in regard to the coronation of Joash, and in Ho. 5.[8]. It occurs in the undated Ps. 98. The chronicler introduces trumpets into his description of the bringing up of the Ark to the city of David, and of the victories of Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, the coronation of Joash, and the Passover of Hezekiah. In Ezra and Nehemiah these trumpets are mentioned in connection with the dedication of the second Temple. Later the trumpet was sounded at new moons and Sabbaths, and was very marked at the drawing of water at the Feast of Tabernacles. The shōfār was a much more primitive instrument, usually made of ram's horn; the mouthpiece being formed by piercing and scraping the small end. Some said the ram must be a first-born. Although the ram's horn is generally very convolute, the shōfār has usually only one curvature. The sound of the shōfār is harsh, and it can scarcely be regarded as a musical instrument. The earliest mention of it is the comparison of the sound wh. accompanied the giving of the law on Mount Sinai (Ex. 19.[16]). In the institution of Jubilee it was the shōfār that was to be blown (Lv. 25.[9]). When Joshua marched round Jericho it was trumpets such as were used in proclaiming Jubilee—that is, of ram's horn—that were used by the priests to blow before the ark of the Lord (Jo. 6.[4f.]). When Ehud called the people to rise against Moab it was the shōfār he sounded (Jg. 3.[27]); and when Gideon, with his three hundred, surrounded the camp of the Midianites, it was shōfārōth they had in their hands (Jg. 7.[16]). In the times of the kings it was the trumpet that called the hosts together to battle (1 S. 13.[3]), or summoned them to desist fm. pursuit (2 S. 2.[28]). It was used for the proclamation of kings as Absalom (2 S. 15.[10]), of Solomon (1 K. 1.[39]). Although according to later custom it was the ḥătzotzĕrāh that was blown at "new moon," yet in Ps. 81.[3 (4)] it is the shōfār that is to be used. In the prophets it is looked upon as one of the accompaniments of war, except in Jl. 2.[15], when it summons the people to a fast. In the synagogues of modern Judaism it is used to proclaim the New Year, and also on certain other occasions. New Year is the Feast of Trumpets; it is celebrated on the first of Tishri (c. October). See New Year.

TRUMPETER: EGYPTIAN



RAM'S HORN TRUMPET

From Wood's "Bible Animals." By permission of Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

TRYPHÆNA and TRYPHOSA. The names of two female workers saluted by St. Paul in Rm. 16.[12]. They are declared to be "labouring in the Lord." Both names are found among imperial monuments of the first century. They probably were deaconesses, and not impossibly personally sisters. In the Acts of Paul and Thekla a Tryphæna is introduced, who is called queen, and declared to be a kinswoman of Cæsar. There was a Queen Tryphæna who was cousin of Claudius.

TUBAL (Gn. 10.[2]), the fifth son of Japheth. There are two races, Mushkaa and Tubalaa, associated in the Asyr. inscriptions, as Meshech and T. are in Gn. and Ek. 32.[26], 38.[2], 39.[1]: these are supposed to be intended. T. seems to have occupied a territory nearly coinciding with the modern Georgia. Along with Javan, with whom T. is associated in Is. 66.[19], and Meshech, so generally his companion, T. brings "slaves and vessels of brass" into the Tyrian market (Ek. 27.[13]).

TUBAL-CAIN, the son of Lamech the Cainite by Zillah (Gn. 4.[22]), "the instructor of every artificer of brass and iron." The text here appears to be corrupt, as the literal rendering wd. be "the sharpener of every artificer." The LXX omit kol, "all," and the Psh. omits lōṭēsh, "whetter." The RV. trs. "the forger of every cutting instrument of brass or iron"; the tr. of ḥārāsh is somewhat violent.

TURPENTINE TREE. See Terebinth.

TURTLE, TURTLE DOVE (Heb. tōr), a bird allied to the pigeon, three species of wh. are found in Pal. While the European species winter in SW. Asia, the Egyptian visits Pal. in summer, and some are indigenous to the Jordan valley with its tropical climate. One species builds in palms. The note of the T. heard among the trees is a sign of the arrival of spring, wh. is not far fm. coinciding with the latter part of our winter (SS. 2.[12]); the migratory habit of the T. is noted (Jr. 8.[7]). Fm. its commonness the T. was a sacrifice open to the poorest: even in the wilderness, wherever there were palms the T. wd. be plentiful.

TYCHICUS, a companion of St. Paul, associated with Trophimus as, like him, a native of Roman Asia (Ac. 20.[4]). He was with the apostle during a portion of his first imprisonment in Rome, and as his messenger bore epistles and tidings to the believers in Asia (Eph. 6.[21]; Col. 4.[7]). He or Artemas was to be sent to relieve Titus in Crete, in order that the latter mt. join St. Paul at Nicopolis (Tt. 3.[12]). Fm. 2 Tm. 4.[12] we learn that Paul sent T. a second time to Ephesus, possibly to relieve Timothy.

TYRANNUS. An Ephesian rhetor in whose lecture-hall Paul taught when he left the synagogue. As manuscript authority is overwhelmingly agst. the insertion of the indefinite pron. "one," the question rises, "Why is it assumed that T. needed only to be named for the state of things to be understood by the readers of Acts?" If T. had been a convert to Christianity and put his lecture-hall at Paul's service, the matter seems simple enough; all prominent members of the small but intensely vital Christian community wd. know each other at least by name. The codex Bezæ has an interesting addition wh. has a mark of genuineness, "from the fifth to the tenth hour," i.e. after school hours.

TYRE (Τῦρος, Heb. צֹר, Tzōr, Asyr. Ẓuru, "rock"), called "the fortress-city" (Jo. 19.[29]; cp. 2 S. 24.[7]), famous for its ships and trade, was built on the Phœnician coast, about midway between Acre and Sidon, on what were originally two rocky islands, 22 stadia round, at a little distance from the shore. It had two harbours, the northern 900 ft. long and 700 ft. broad, and the southern, or Egyptian, formed by means of a breakwater; a canal, running thro' the city, connected them. On the shore was another city, as well as the necropolis and a supply of water (now Ras el-'Ain). In later times the city on the mainland was known as Palætyrus, "Old Tyre," but it is pretty certain that it was really Hosah (Jo. 19.[29]) or Usu. In the time of Moses, an Egyptian traveller describes Tyre as an island to wh. water was brought in boats.

Coin of Tyre

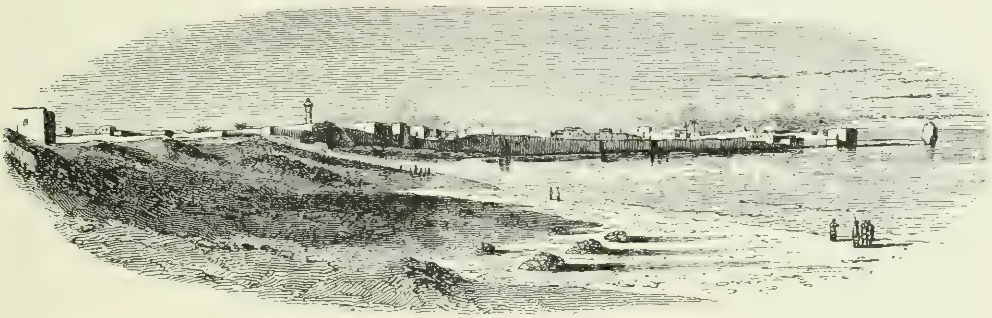
According to Herodotus (ii. 44), the temple of Baal-Melkarth, its supreme god, was built 2300 years before his visit, and in it were two pillars, one of gold, the other of emerald (cp. 1 K. 7.[21]). Among the Tel el-Amarna tablets are letters from its Egyptian governor Abimelech, complaining of hostilities carried on against him by the governor of Sidon, whose capture of Usu had deprived him of water and wood. Tyre was one of the Phœnician cities taken by Seti I., the father of Ramses II., and we hear of a letter sent to its king in the third year of Meneptah, the successor of Ramses. A new dynasty seems to have commenced with Abibal and his son Hiram I., the contemporary of David and Solomon. As the Greek histories of Tyre begin with their reigns, it is probable that the Phœnician alphabet was now first substituted for the earlier cuneiform script. Hiram joined the larger island to the smaller one on the SW., and conducted water to it from the mainland. He also fortified the whole area and restored the temples. He sent carpenters and masons for the construction of David's palace at Jerusalem (2 S. 5.[11]), and furnished his ally, Solomon, with cedar and fir for the Temple, as well as with a master-craftsman (1 K. 5.[1-11], 7.[13, 14]; 2 Ch. 2.[3-16]). In return Solomon gave Hiram a yearly tribute of wheat and oil, together with twenty cities in the Galilean region of Cabul (1 K. 9.[11]). Hiram's seventh successor was Eth-baal, the priest of Ashtoreth, and father of Jezebel, who reigned thirty-two years. The third successor of Eth-baal was Pygmalion, in whose seventh year his sister Elissa or Dido fled to Africa and founded Carthage. Under Elulæus Tyre was besieged for five years by the Assyrian king Shalmaneser IV. (B.C. 727–2), but without result, tho' the supply of water from the mainland was cut off. Like Eth-baal (1 K. 16.[31]), Elulæus was king also of Sidon, whence he fled to Cyprus on the occasion of Sennacherib's campaign against Hezekiah (B.C. 701). Tyre, however, now submitted to Assyria, and the revolt of its king, Baal, against Esar-haddon was promptly suppressed. It was again besieged, for thirteen years, by Nebuchadnezzar (Ek. 26.[7-14], 29.[18-20]). It must have eventually surrendered, since a Babylonian contract-tablet is dated at Tyre in the fortieth year of that king, and there were Tyrian hostages at the Babylonian court. For a short time the city was governed by suffetes or "judges." Under the Persians it furnished the government with a large fleet, and Alexander the Great accordingly made every effort to destroy the town. Palætyrus was razed to the ground, and its materials used in constructing an embankment 60 yds. wide and $\frac{1}{4}$ mile long, wh. united the mainland with the island-city. After a siege of seven months the city was taken by storm; 10,000 of its inhabitants were massacred and 40,000 sold as slaves. Alexander's mole, however, remained, and the island thus became a peninsula. Under the Romans its trade declined. Its territory was visited by Christ (Mk. 7.[24]), and St Paul spent seven days there (Ac. 21.[3, 4]). It subsequently became the seat of a bishopric, and St. Jerome calls it the first and greatest city of Phœnicia. It was taken by the Crusaders under Baldwin II. in 1124, and in 1190 Frederick Barbarossa was buried in its cathedral. But in 1191 it surrendered to the Mohammedans. It is now a small place, with a Latin monastery and a population of about 3000.



View of Tyre

Its trade extended to all parts of the known world (Ek. 27.). The staple of its early commerce was the purple dye obtained from the murex, to wh. was afterwards added the tin of Spain and Britain. A brisk trade was also carried on in slaves (Jl. 3.[4-6]), as well as in timber. The metal-workers and woven fabrics of Tyre were celebrated (2 Ch. 2.[7, 14]), and the remains of its glass factories are still visible. In the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400) Tyre is already described as a "great city."

A. H. Sayce.

U

UCAL AND ITHIEL appear in EV. as the names of men to whom Agur addressed the proverbs in Pr. 30. The phrase is one as to the interpretation of wh. there have been wide differences of opinion among scholars. These depend on the pointing of the Heb. text. With slight changes RVm. reads, "I have wearied myself, O God, I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed."

UEL, a son of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[34]), called "Juel" in 1 Es. 9.[34].

UKNAZ stands in AVm. for "and Kenaz" in the text (1 Ch. 4.[15]). The MT. is prob. imperfect, something having fallen out before "and Kenaz." The intention was evidently to name the sons of Elah; but only Kenaz is mentioned. LXX and Vlg. omit "and."

ULAI, a river in Elam known to classical geographers as Eulæus; it flowed past Shushan (Susa, Dn. 8.[2, 16]). In a battle near here in wh. he was victorious Asshur-bani-pal declares the U. was choked with dead bodies. The courses of the rivers in this quarter have greatly changed; if we trust an ancient tablet the U. emptied its waters direct into the Persian Gulf.

ULAM. (1) A descendant of Gilead, father of Bedan (1 Ch. 7.[17]). (2) The first-born son of Eshek, a Benjamite whose sons and sons' sons numbered a hundred and fifty, and were famous as archers (1 Ch. 8.[39f.]). The Benjamites seem to have given special attention to archery (2 Ch. 14.[8]).

ULLA, head of an Asherite family (1 Ch. 7.[39]).

UMMAH, an unidentd. city in Asher, named with Aphek and Rehob (Jo. 19.[30]). A proposed emendation of the text would read 'Acho, identifying it with the mod. Acre. This, however, is very doubtful.

UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS. See PURIFICATION.

UNCTION, lit. "anointing." As ointment was poured upon the head, so the Holy Spirit was conceived as poured out upon believers. This is the "anointing" referred to in 1 Jn. 2.[27]. The effect of this anointing is fig. called "unction" (v. 20).

UNDERGIRDERS, called HELPS (Ac. 27.[17]). Owing to the imperfect construction of ancient ships there was danger, in stress of weather, that the planks might spring, causing leakage. To obviate this cables and chains were carried, and when necessity arose these were passed round the body of the vessel and drawn tight. This in English is called "frapping."

UNDERSETTER. This is EV. tr. of Heb. kātheph, lit. "shoulder," in the description of the lavers in Solomon's Temple (1 K. 7.[30], &c.). They furnished supports for certain parts of the bases. It is impossible more exactly to define them.

UNICORN (Heb. r'ēm), an animal of the ox tribe, as it is associated with "bullocks" as suitable for sacrifice (Is. 34.[7]). Its strength is noted (Nu. 23.[22], 24.[8]); its horns are prominent (Dt. 33.[17]; Ps. 22.[21], 92.[10]). The first of these passages proves that it has two horns, for the AVm. rendering "unicorn" is more accurate than the text. It is fierce and untamable (Jb. 39.[9, 10]), but at the same time agile (Ps. 29.[6]). The rendering of the AV. is due to the LXX tr. monokerōs, wh. Jerome followed. The wild ox was a frequent object of chase among the Asyr., as may be seen in the monuments.

UNKNOWN GOD, THE. An altar seen by St. Paul when passing through Athens was inscribed "to the unknown God." This suggested the introduction to his speech (Ac. 17.[23]). From the phrase, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you," it might be a legitimate inference that the deity here referred to was Jehovah, the God of the Jews. In that case an Athenian citizen who had been preserved from some danger in Judæa, may, on his return, have erected the altar in thanksgiving, being in ignorance of, or having forgotten, the name of the God of that land. There is, however, ample evidence in Greek Lit. of the existence of altars with similar if not quite identical inscriptions. It illustrates the "religiousness" of the Athenians, and their care that no deity who could claim a sacrifice should be overlooked, that on the occasion of a plague some black and white sheep were turned out on the Areopagus, and wherever one lay down it was sacrificed "to the god concerned," i.e. to the deity of the particular place, whether he were known or not.

UNLEAVENED BREAD. See PASSOVER, FEAST OF.

UNNI. (1) One of those appointed "with psalteries" in the Temple service (1 Ch. 15.[18, 20]). (2) A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Ne. 12.[9], RV. "Unno").

UNNO. See UNNI (2).

UPHARSIN. The closing and emphatic word in the inscription wh. appeared on the wall opposite the lights on the occasion of Belshazzar's feast (Dn. 5.[25]). It is given in the plural, with the conjunction ו, in v. 25, but in the interpretation (v. 27) we find it in the singular without the conjunction. The word as it stands means "fragments" or "fractions." The difficulty of interpreting the three words lay in the fact that the natural meaning of the words as they stood consonantally was simply a statement of weights—mene, "a pound"; tekel, "an ounce"; and upharsin, "and fractions." It has been suggested that the inscription had been written there before, and simply indicated where the standard weights were kept, but that, the light falling on it, the inscription flashed out on the king, and he read it as an omen. The record, alike in the Chigi version and in the Massoretic text, speaks of a hand coming forth. There have been various interpretations of the difficulty of "reading" the inscription. A rabbinic explanation given by Fuller (Speaker's Com.) is that the words were written perpendicularly, and the Babylonian astrologers attempted to read them horizontally but cd. not find any meaning in the words so constructed. This seems an unlikely supposition. Another suggestion is that the inscription wd. be in cuneiform, and as the signs had so many possible meanings attachable to them, the astrologers were unable to fix the meaning to be given to them in this case. This also is unlikely: so far as this indefiniteness of the cuneiform symbols is true, it applies to modern scholars, but wd. not apply to those who had been taught to read cuneiform in infancy. The difficulty was that, as shown above, consonantally the words were simple enough, but were utterly unmeaning in the circumstances—there was no plausible explanation possible of this mysterious hand appearing and merely chronicling the names of weights. Daniel, divinely directed, took the words as verbs, and in each word read a deeper meaning than met the eye. He rendered mene "numbered": when the days of life of person or nation are numbered they are nearing an end. Tekel, "weighed," has in it a play on the verb qelal, "to be light," and peres may mean "Persian" as well as "divided" or "broken." It is to be observed that in the LXX (Chigi), Thd., and Vlg. the first word is not repeated. The fact that the prophecy that the kingdom shd. be given to the Persians is regarded as fulfilled when Darius "the Mede" received the kingdom, effectually disposes of the idea that the writer of "Daniel" thought the kingdoms of the Medes and Persians were different.

UPHAZ (Jr. 10.[9]; Dn. 10.[5]), apparently a place fm. wh. gold appears to have been brought; Dr. Pinches has suggested (HDB.) that U. was originally Ophir, wh. consonantally differs only in the final letter fm. Uphaz. The tendency is, however, to change the less known into the well known, not the reverse. Were it not for the initial א it mt. be regarded as Hophal part. of the pāzaz, "to purify"; a form wh. occurs in 1 K. 10.[18]. This solution wd. not apply to Dn. 10.[5] unless the words have been improperly divided; there seems to be some uncertainty as to the reading here.

UR, father of one of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 11.[35]).

UR OF THE CHALDEES (אוּר כַּשְׂדִּים), the birthplace of Abraham (Gn. 11.[28]), so called to distinguish it from an Ur or "City" elsewhere, is the Uru—"the City" par excellence—of the cuneiform texts, now El-Muqayyar (Mugheir), "the Bituminous," on the west bank of the Euphrates in southern Babylonia. In the age of its foundation the river fell into the Persian Gulf a little south of the town, but in consequence of the deposition of silt the coast is now about 100 miles distant. The river-bed also has retreated about 5 miles to the east. Owing to its situation on the Arabian side of the river there was a large West-Semitic community in the town, including more especially "Amorite" merchants from Canaan. In Sumerian times it was known as "the City of the Moon-god," to whom its great temple was dedicated. The name given to it by the Semites may have been due to the fact that it was the only representative of the Babylonian city on the Arabian side of the Euphrates. It is probably the Babylonian Οὐρίη mentioned by Eupolemus (Euseb., Præp. Ev. IX. 17), wh. he says was also called Camarinê, since qamar is "moon" in Arabic. The mounds wh. mark its site are 2700 metres in circumference, the remains of the temple lying to the north-west, and the whole place is surrounded by graves. No scientific excavations, however, have as yet been conducted there. "Ships of Ur" are referred to in Sumerian times, and trade was carried on with southern and central Arabia through the Wadi Rummein. A few centuries before the birth of Abraham Babylonia had been ruled for 117 years by a dynasty of five kings who had their capital at Ur. The first of them had been a great builder. They revived the claims of Babylonia over Syria and Palestine, and a fragmentary cadastral survey exists wh. was compiled for one of them by Urimelech, the governor of "the land of the Amorites." The last of the dynasty fell in battle against the Elamites. Ur suffered in the Elamite and civil wars wh. preceded the recovery of Babylonian independence under Khammu-rabi, and the massacre of its inhabitants in the 14th year of his father's reign may have led to the migration of its West-Semitic settlers (cp. Gn. 11.[31]). Henceforward Ur lost its importance except as one of the old centres of Babylonian religion.

Mugheir Temple: Ur of the Chaldees

Lit.: Taylor in JRL. R.A.S., 1855, ix. pp. 260 sqq.; Loftus, Chaldæa and Susiana, Nisbet, 1857, pp. 127–35; Hommel, Die semitischen Völker, Leipzig, 1883, pp. 204–11. A. H. SAYCE.

URBANE, RV. URBANUS, a Christian in Rome saluted by the apostle Paul as a "fellow-worker" (Rm. 16.[9]). When and where he laboured along with St. Paul we do not know. The name, wh. is Latin (Urbanus), was often borne by slaves. Tradition makes him bishop of Tarsus, consecrated to that office by St. Peter.

URI. (1) Father of the skilful artificer Bezaleel (Ex. 31.[2], &c.). (2) Father of Geber, one of Solomon's officers in Gilead (1 K. 4.[19]). (3) One of the gatekeepers who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[24]).

URIAH, URIJAH. (1) A man of Hittite origin, one of David's "mighty men" (2 S. 23.[39]; 1 Ch. 11.[41]), and husband of BATHSHEBA. His name ("my light is J″.," or "J″. is a fire") seems to show that he was a convert to the faith of Israel. It is evident that he was possessed of true soldierly qualities. Summoned to Jerusalem by his royal master, he refused to enjoy comforts wh. could not be shared by his comrades in the field. This attitude, admirable as it was (and none would have been more ready than David in his right mind to appreciate it), frustrated the king's purpose and cost him his life. There was nothing calling for remark in putting Uriah in the forefront of the battle at Rabbah; it was his natural place. The excellences of the simple-hearted soldier throw out in bolder relief the infamy of DAVID and his perfidious wife. David's crime has been often repeated; his repentance was peculiar to himself. (2) A High Priest in the reign of Ahaz, who actively assisted that king in the introduction of foreign innovations. He made the altar after the pattern of that seen by Ahaz in Damascus, and by his instructions put it in the position formerly occupied by the brazen altar. This latter was moved to the north, and retained there, apparently for purposes of divination (2 K. 16.[10ff.]). He is possibly identical with Uriah, who acted as a witness for Isaiah (8.[2]). His name is given as Urijah in 2 K. 16. EV. He does not appear in the list of High Priests in 1 Ch. 6.[4-15]; but his name is found in the list of Josephus (Ant. X. viii. 6). (3) A prophet in the time of Jeremiah (Jr. 26.[20]), son of Shemaiah of KIRJATH-JEARIM. His utterances agreed with those of the great prophet, and so roused the anger of Jehoiakim that he had to flee for his life to Egypt. Thence, however, he was brought by Elnathan, and by the king's orders he was slain, his dead body being cast "into the graves of the common people" (AV. Urijah). (4) Father of Merimoth, and son of Hakkoz (AV. Koz) (Ez. 8.[33]; Ne. 3.[4, 21]). His son Merimoth had charge of the sacred vessels of silver and gold brought back from Babylon, and took part in building the wall of Jerusalem (Urijah, Ne. 3.[4, 21]). (5) One of the prominent men who stood by Ezra at the reading of the law (Ne. 8.[4], AV. Urijah).

URIEL ("fire of God"). (1) A Kohathite named in the genealogy in 1 Ch. 6.[24]. (2) Chief of the Kohathite Levites in the time of David who with his brethren took part in moving the Ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 15.[11]).

URIM AND THUMMIM. What is meant by these terms it is impossible to say with certainty. The words themselves are enigmatical; "lights" and "perfections" are terms wh. do not convey much that is intelligible. Indeed they have the appearance of being foreign words, Egyptian or Assyrian, modified to make them significant in Heb. When we look at the passages we may note several things wh. are so far illuminative, if only negatively so. Moses is told to put them in the breastplate of judgment; it is significant that he is not commanded to make the U. and T.; they were extant before. They are two separate articles; they have always the definite article before them, except in the Ezra-Nehemiah passage, and 'eth, the sign of the accusative, also precedes each. Further, they are to be "put in ('ĕl) the breastplate (ḥōshen) of judgment." It was therefore no illumination either of the stones of the breastplate or the "ouches" on his shoulders that constituted the U. and T. They must have been relatively small, or they cd. not have been put in the folds of the ḥōshen—a pouch of nine inches square, jewelled without. As to what they were like the versions give us no assistance. Although photes and teleia, the exact translations of the Heb., lay to hand, the LXX. except in the Ezra-Nehemiah passage, renders dēlosis ("manifestation") and alētheia ("truth"). The Psh. tr. nahira and shalom, a literal rendering of the words; the Tg. of Onkelos simply transliterates, Tg. PJ. adds a periphrastic explanation of each term. Josephus implies that U. and T. were illuminative manifestations fm. the "ouches" on the shoulders of the High Priest. Philo tells us that the breastplate meant human organs of speech, and the reference is to considerate, well-ordered speech. Rashi speaks of the shem-hammphorash and its illuminative power. All this, however, throws no light either on the form of the U. and T. or on the way in wh. they were used. It is an evidence of the early ignorance of the nature of the U. and T. that the Samaritan Pentateuch inserts in Ex. 28.[30], "And thou shalt make the U. and the T.," and in 39.[21], "And he made the U. and the T. as the Lord commanded Moses." It was less likely that MT. shd. omit such a statement twice over than that the Sam. shd. insert it. That they were used in some way to learn the Divine will is certain fm. Nu. 27.[21] and 1 S. 28.[6]. It is more difficult to discover how this was done. There is a passage in 1 S. 14.[37f.], concerning the casting of the lot between Saul and Jonathan, in wh. there seems to be some confusion; "Give perfections" is unintelligible. The reading of the LXX at first seems little better: "Lord God of Israel, give clear (dēlous) if the iniquity be in me or in Jonathan my son, but if the iniquity be in the people give holiness (hosiotēs)." However, when one remembers that dēlous is fm. the same root as dēlōsis, then it may mean Urim, and the contrasted term will be equivalent to alētheia (Thummim); the account will then mean that, if U. was given, Jonathan and his father were guilty, if T., then the people. This we ought to say is in the Lucianic recension; the Vatican version is in confusion. From this it wd. appear that the answer of U. and T. was given by means of the lot. Fm. the connection of the ḥōshen with the Ephod it seems probable that the frequent inquiries made by Ephod were really by U. and T., i.e. by sacred lot (1 S. 23.[9-12]); it is to be noted that the answers cd. all be represented by "Yes" or "No," a mode of reply that itself suggests the lot. Were there a plate of metal with the words U. and T. on opposite sides, this wd. be a simple solution; but it seems clear that there were two objects. They mt. be cast into a helmet, as were the lots at the Trojan War, and shaken till one leaped out (Il. vii. 176f.). We have already suggested that U. and T. are foreign words modified into significance in Heb. The Egyptian deities Har (Horus), and Tum have names suggestively resembling U. and T.; only one feels that the roots of primitive Heb. custom are to be sought on the banks of the Euphrates rather than of the Nile. Prof. Muss-Arnolt has suggested an analogy with the tables of destiny wh. Marduk bore in his bosom, and the names he wd. derive fm. the Asyr. urtu, "a decision," and tamitu, "an oracle." The late Dean Plumptre had a theory that the objects, the U. and T., were contemplated by the priest so fixedly that he fell into a hypnotic trance, and in that state gave oracular responses. Though it is ingenious, the proof seems fairly strong that it was by lot in some way that the Divine will was interpreted. There is no indication that the U. and T. were ever consulted after the death of David; silence, however, is by no means a conclusive argument, the more so as Josephus speaks as if they had only disappeared about a couple of centuries before his own time. Against this statement is to be put the Ezra-Nehemiah passage, wh. implies that at the return fm. Babylon at all events there was no priest having the Urim and Thummim (Ez. 2.[63]; Ne. 7.[65]). If these objects were lost about the beginning of the Babylonian Captivity, it does not seem extraordinary that very little definite shd. be known about their form, or the method of inquiring by them.

USURY (Heb. nāshak, "to lend on interest," neshek, "interest"; there are also marbīth and tarbīth, tr. "increase" [Lv. 25.[36, 37]], Gr. tokos). To the Heb., lending on interest to a brother Heb. was a crime (Ex. 22.[25]; Dt. 23.[19]); one of the characteristics of the "man who shd. ascend into the hill of God" is that he does not lend "on usury" (Ps. 15.[5]). While lending on interest to their brethren is thus forbidden to the Israelite, it is not forbidden to lend on these terms to foreign nations (Dt. 15.[6]). The code of Ḥammurabi reveals the high rate charged in those days in Babylon. There is no denunciation of U. in the NT.; so far fm. that, it is implied to be right and proper (Mw. 25.[27]; Lk. 19.[23]). See Debt.

UTHAI. (1) Son of Ammihud, a Judahite dwelling in Jerusalem after the Exile (1 Ch. 9.[4]). (2) A son of Bigvai, who returned with Ezra (Ez. 8.[14]).

UZ. (1) In three cases in the RV. a personal name (Gn. 10.[23], 22.[21] [Huz AV.], 36.[28]); fm. the fact that Aram occurs in connection with the two former, and in the last in the slight disguise of Aran, a plausible case may be made out for regarding them as the same. (2) The land to wh. Job belonged (Jb. 1.[1]). It is difficult to fix the precise geographical position of U., but it is clearly E. of Pal., for Job is said to be "the greatest of all the men of the East." The names of the countries fm. which the three friends are said to spring confirms this; Eliphaz comes fm. Teman, wh. so far as can be identified is to the SE. of Pal.; Shuah, fm. wh. Bildad comes, is to the NE.; no definite opinion appears to have been reached as to the geographical situation of the native place of Zophar, but it seems to have been E.; Buz the br. of Huz, fm. whom Elihu came, was the son of Nahor, whose grandson Laban dwelt among "the sons of the East" (Gn. 29.[1]). Arabic tradition wd. place it in the Ḥaurān, while Delitzsch wd. locate it near Palmyra; that, however, seems too far N. for Chaldæan raiders to infest. There is a place Utztza, fm. wh. Salmaneser received tribute, but it was NW. of Aleppo, and more unsuitable, therefore, than Palmyra.

UZAI, father of Palal, one of those who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[25]).

UZAL, the sixth son of Joktan (Gn. 10.[27]; 1 Ch. 1.[21]). The name also appears in Ezekiel as that of a city in Arabia. The passage is difficult owing to disorder in the text, but the rendering now generally favoured is "Vedan and Javan of Uzal furnished their wares" (Ek. 27.[19]; see Davidson, ad loc.). The tr. "from Uzal" is relegated by RV. to the margin. This city may with some confidence be identified with Ṣan'a, the chief city of el-Yemen, the ancient name of which, Awzāl, corresponds exactly to the Heb. The mod. name Ṣan'a prob. comes from Abyssinia, in the language of wh. country it means "fortress." It was known as Azal or Izal to the Jewish inhabitants in the pre-Mohammadan time, who perhaps had revived the ancient name. The Arabs believed it to be the oldest city in the world, perhaps deriving the name from azal, "eternity." "Bright iron" was one of the commodities in wh. she trafficked. Iron is still found in various parts of Arabia; and the steel weapons manufactured in Ṣan'a are held in high repute. She also formed a depot for goods imported from India.

The mod. city stands in a wide vale among the uplands, 7250 feet above the level of the sea. It is dominated from the east by Jebel Nujūm, a spur of which is crowned by a strong fortress. At this great height the city enjoys light air and a charming climate. Through the centre of the town runs a river bed, wh. for several months of the year carries down a plentiful supply of water. This is largely used for irrigation. The soil is very fertile, and the gardens and orchards are such in beauty and fruitfulness that Arabian writers frequently compare the city to Damascus. Great wells and cisterns furnish water during the rest of the year. The famous fortress Beit Ghumdān, and the temple dedicated to Zahrah, the Arabian Venus, on the site now occupied by the mod. citadel, were the architectural pride of Arabia until, by the orders of Othman, they were destroyed. With the temple disappeared the last vestiges of idolatry in el-Yemen. A Christian church was built by Abraha el-Ashram, viceroy of el-Yemen under king Aryat of Abyssinia, for the building of wh. the Roman emperor sent contributions in marble and workmen. This structure also perished by order of Othman.

There are many khāns or caravanserais in the city for the accommodation of travellers and their animals. Tribespeople from every part of the interior are to be seen around the gates of these khāns —"bringers of salt from Mareb, the mod. Saba or Sheba; of coffee from the northern districts; of indigo and grain and spices from wherever the soil is suitable to their growth. Caravans from the Hadramaut and Yaffa discharge their goods here too, and reload their camels with the produce of the largest city of Southern Arabia" (Harris, A Journey through Yemen, 312).

UZZA, UZZAH. (1) One of the sons of Abinadab in whose house the Ark had rested for a time. U. and his br. Ahio drove the cart on wh. the Ark was placed with the object of removing it to Jrs. (2 S. 6.[1ff.]; 1 Ch. 13.[7], &c.). At the threshing floor of Nacon the oxen stumbled, and Uzzah, anxious for the safety of the Ark, put out his hand to steady it. He at once fell dead. This was understood as a token of Divine anger at his sacrilegious touch. It displeased David, who called the place Perez-Uzzah, "breach of Uzzah," and abandoned for a time the project of taking the Ark to his capital. (2) Manasseh and his son Amon are said to have been buried in the garden of Uzza (2 K. 21.[18, 26]). This seems to indicate that the garden was attached to the palace. It had prob. been acquired at some time for the royal demesne from the patrimony of one Uzza. But nothing further is known of him. Others are mentioned of this name in 1 Ch. 6.[29], 8.[7]; Ez. 2.[49], &c.

UZZEN-SHERAH, RV. UZZEN-SHEERAH, "the weighed portion of Sheerah," according to MT. (1 Ch. 7.[24]) is the name of a city said to have been built by Sheerah, the daughter of Ephraim. The building of the two BETH-HORONS is also attributed to her; but while they are well known, no satisfactory identification of Uzzen-Sheerah has yet been suggested. The text may have been interfered with. The LXX reads instead of the place-name, καὶ υἱοὶ Ὀζάν-Σεηρά.

UZZI. (1) A descendant of Aaron in the line of Phinehas (1 Ch. 6.[5], &c.). (2) Father of Izrahiah, of the tribe of Issachar (1 Ch. 7.[2], &c.). A Benjamite (1 Ch. 7.[7], 9.[8]). (4) An overseer of the Levites (Ne. 11.[22]). (5) A priest of the family of Jedaiah (Ne. 12.[19, 42]).

UZZIA, the Ashterathite, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 11.[44]).

UZZIAH = AZARIAH, king of Judah, son of Amaziah (2 K. 15.[1], &c.). The shorter form of the name may be a contraction of the longer. The two are kindred in meaning: Uzziah = "My strength is Jehovah," Azariah = "Jehovah hath helped." Or again the name Uzziah may have been adopted at his coronation. When his father was assassinated at Lachish U. was only sixteen years of age, but he was made king by acclamation (2 K. 14.[17ff.]), and his reign extended to the long period of fifty-two years. The book of Kings records little of his life, and the one warlike enterprise mentioned there is the restoration and fortification of the seaport on the Red Sea, Elath (2 K. 14.[22]). For most of our information we depend on the Chronicler. "He did that wh. was right in the eyes of the Lord," and prosperity waited on his efforts. He waged successful war against the Phil., breaking down the fortifications of many of their cities. He defeated the Arabians and the Mehunim, and the Ammonites were made tributary. He strengthened the defences of Jrs. The towers wh. he built in the wilderness were doubtless to guard the cisterns made for the watering of the flocks. Being a lover of husbandry, agriculture and vinedressing flourished under his patronage. He had a strong, well-equipped standing army, and the engines he had in Jrs. for discharging missiles were the admiration of the age (2 Ch. 26.[1-15]). We are also told that for presuming in his pride of heart to usurp the sacred function of the priest he was smitten with leprosy, and had thenceforth to dwell apart. For the discharge of such duties as involved contact with the people, his son Jotham was associated with him as regent (vv. 16[ff.]). This fact has to be remembered in connection with the somewhat confusing chronology of the period of the kings.

The reign of U. was signalised by a great earthquake, wh. seems to have made a deep impression on the mind of the people (Am. 1.[1]; Zc. 14.[5]). Perhaps echoes of it may be heard in Is. 2.[19ff] (cp. Ant. IX. x. 4).

By many scholars it was once thought that U. may be the Azriya'u of Ya'udi mentioned in the inscription of Tiglath-pileser III. (B.C. 738). This identification is now, however, generally rejected, the reference prob. being to some North Syrian prince.

U. was buried "in the field of burial wh. belonged to the kings." This evidently means that his polluted body was kept apart from the ashes in the royal tombs, "for they said, He is a leper" (2 Ch. 26.[23]).

UZZIEL, "God is my strength." Six men of this name are mentioned in OT. The more important were: (1) Fourth son of Kohath (Ex. 6.[18], &c.), reputed ancestor of the Uzzielites (Nu. 3.[27], &c.). When David brought up the Ark to Jerusalem the house of U. comprised 112 adults, under their chief Amminadab (1 Ch. 15.[10]). (2) A Simeonite who took part in the raid upon the Amalekites in Mt. Seir, securing a permanent dwelling there (1 Ch. 4.[42f.]) in the days of Hezekiah. (3) One of the goldsmiths who took part in repairing the wall of Jrs. under Nehemiah (3.[8]). If he were a priest, as his name seems to indicate, it wd. be his duty to make and repair the sacred vessels of the precious metal for use in the sanctuary. See also 1 Ch. 7.[7], 25.[4]; 2 Ch. 29.[14].

V

VAGABOND (Heb. nūd, "wandering") is used of Cain, as a fugitive without definite aim (Gn. 4.[12, 14]). In NT. it is used also in its literal sense of certain Jews, as tr. of the Greek periarchomai, "to go round about." In Ps. 109.[10] it stands for nūa', "to tremble," "totter," "stagger." Here it suggests, perhaps, the tottering step of the beggar.

VAHEB (RV. and AVm.), the name of a place evidently on the border of Amorite territory east of the Jordan (Nu. 21.[14]); not identd.

VAIL. See VEIL.

VAJEZATHA, one of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews in Shushan (Est. 9.[9]).

VALE, VALLEY. Five Heb. words are so trd. in EV., "vale" standing only for 'ēmeq and shephēlah. (1) 'Ēmeq is prop. "a deepening," or "depth." It is "a highlander's word for a valley as he looks down into it, and is applied to wide avenues running up into a mountainous country, like the vale of Elah, the vale of Hebron, and the vale of Aijalon" (HGHL.[1], 384). The word is applied to an opening in the uplands wider than the gai', but not so broad as the biq'āh. As illustrations of its use we have the valley of Achor (Jo. 7.[24]), the valley of Aijalon (10.[12]), the valley of Jezreel (Jo. 17.[16], &c.), where the vale sloping to the Jordan valley between Little Hermon and Gilboa is referred to. (2) Gai' is "a ravine," or "glen," narrower than the 'ēmeq. Such a ravine might run in the bottom of the 'ēmeq, as for example that in the vale of Elah (1 S. 17.[2f.]). By this name the valley of the son of Hinnom is known, the ravine that runs to the S. of Jerusalem (Jo. 15.[8], &c.). So also, in Ps. 23.[4], the "valley of the shadows" is the "ravine." (3) Biq'āh signifies a broad valley. It is prop. a plain wh. is enclosed by rising ground. It applies to the plain of the Jordan to the N. of the Dead Sea (Dt. 34.[3]), to the wide reaches of Esdraelon (2 Ch. 35.[22], &c.), and to the spacious hollow between the Lebanon and Antilebanon ranges (Jo. 11.[17]). In this last case the ancient name still lingers in the mod. el-Biqā'. The diminutive el-Buqei'a is applied to a vill. in a "little Biqā'," high in the mountains to the N. of er-Rāmeh in Upper Galilee. (4) Naḥal is = Arb. Wādy, a vale with a stream or torrent bed in the bottom. It may also apply to the stream itself (see BROOK). (5) Shephēlah, "lowland," applies to the stretch of lower hill country between the central range and the maritime plain. See SHEPHELAH.

VANIAH, a son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[36]).

VANITY. This word is never used in Scrip. in our mod. sense of foolish pride. (1) 'Aven, "trouble," "sorrow," "wickedness." In Jb. 15.[35]; Ps. 10.[7], RV. renders "iniquity"; in Pr. 22.[8], "calamity"; in Is. 58.[9], "wickedly." It stands for idolatry (Ho. 12.[2] &c.), trouble of iniquity (Jb. 22.[15]), &c. (2) Hebel, "breath," "vapour." This is the word most commonly rendered "vanity." In Is. 57.[13], "A breath shall carry them all (idols) away," and Pr. 21.[6], "The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vapour," it is used literally. For the rest it denotes what is evanescent and worthless, e.g. idols (Jr. 10.[15], &c.); heathen statutes or ordinances (v. 2); life (Jb. 7.[16], &c.); the fruitlessness of human endeavour (Ec. 1.[2], &c.); false gods (Dt. 32.[21], &c.); see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. (3) Rīq, "emptiness" (Ps. 4.[2]; Hb. 2.[13]). Used of labour from wh. no profit results (Is. 49.[4], &c.). (4) Shāv', "nothingness," almost synonymous with rīq. It is used of profitless toils (Ps. 127.[2]). "For what vanity" (Ps. 89.[47] RV.), i.e. "what nothingness hast thou created all the children of men." It is used of lying, i.e. unreal speech (Pr. 30.[8], &c.), of false, i.e. empty prophecy (Ek. 12.[34], &c.), of vain, i.e. worthless persons (Ps. 26.[4], &c.). (5) Tōhū, "formlessness," "unreality." It is applied to the confusion of the primæval world (Gn. 1.[2]); of a ruined city (Is. 24.[10], "city of confusion"), of idols, as "things of naught" (40.[17], &c.), of moral unreality (59.[4]), &c. In NT. kenos, "empty," denotes lack of truth (Eph. 5.[6]), of insight (Js. 2.[20]), of advantage (1 Cor. 15.[10], &c.); eikē indicates what is purposeless, heedless, or at random (Rm. 13.[4]; 1 Cor. 15.[2], &c.); mataios, what is devoid of force, truth, real outcome (1 Cor. 3.[20]; Tt. 3.[9]; Js. 1.[26]; 1 P. 1.[18]). Matiotēs is a frequent LXX rendering of hebel (see (2) above). It occurs three times in NT. It is applied to the condition in wh. the creation is in consequence of sin (Rm. 8.[20]), to the uselessness of heathen intellectual speculations (Eph. 4.[17]), to the high-sounding but profitless speech of certain boastful, false teachers (2 P. 2.[18]).

Vanity in Scrip. thus denotes what is evanescent, unreal, empty, unprofitable, and worthless. Our sense of empty pride is expressed by the word kenodoxia, "vainglory" (Php. 2.[3]; cp. Gal. 5.[26]).

VASHNI, the first-born son of Samuel (1 Ch. 6.[28]), according to MT. In 1 S. 8.[2] the name of Samuel's first-born is Joel (cp. 1 Ch. 6.[33]). The Peshittā reads "his first-born Joel, and the name of his second son Abiah." It would appear that the name "Joel" has fallen out of the text in 1 Ch. 6.[28], and then vāshēnī, "and the second," has been read as a proper name. So RV. understands it, and reads "the first-born Joel, and the second Abiah."

VASHTI, "best" (Persian), the queen of Ahasuerus who refused to display herself to the king and his companions in their carouse, and was in consequence sent away. It is impossible to identify V. with any queen known to history. The Persians, according to Plutarch (Conjug. Præcept. c. 16) and Herodotus (v. 18), were accustomed to have their legitimate wives seated with them at their banquets (Josephus [Ant. XI. vi. 1] denies this), and when excess began the wives were sent away, and concubines and dancing girls were called in. V. may have been an inferior wife who refused the rôle of the latter.

VEDAN, RV., where AV. reads "Dan also" (Ek. 27.[19]). AV. is certainly mistaken. It is the name of a city or people who traded with Tyre, apparently in Arabia. If the former, it may be identified with the town of Waddān, to the SW. of Medina. But owing to the state of the text no certain decision is possible.

VEIL, VAIL. The RV. spelling is uniformly "veil." The veil which covers the whole or part of the face is a common article of female attire in the East. The ḥarīm ("woman-kind") of the Moslems in the cities regularly veil the face; but it is wrong to say that "no respectable woman in an Eastern village or city goes out without the veil" (Davies, HDB. s.v.). Dr. Davies refers in his next paragraph to the wife and daughters of the chief of Zobas, between Nāblus and the Jordan, who wore no veils, whose respectability he does not impugn. The village and Bedawy women are seldom veiled; the like is true of the Christian and Jewish women in the towns; and certainly a missionary lady veiled wd. be a rara avis in Pal. (ibid). (1) Miṭpaḥath (Ru. 3.[15]) is a "covering," RV. "mantle." (2) Masveh is used only of the covering wh. Moses put over his face when he came down from the Mount (Ex. 34.[33ff.]). (3) Tzā'īph, lit. a "double or folded thing." This is the wrapper, or shawl, with wh. Rebecca covered herself on meeting with Isaac (Gn. 24.[65]). With this also Tamar wrapped herself (Gn. 38.[14]). Her object was to conceal her identity from her father-in-law. There is nothing to show that any evil significance attached to this particular "veil." (4) Rĕdīd (SS. 5.[1]; Is. 3.[23]) is a wide wrapper, prob. going over the other garments. In the NT. kalumma is the covering worn by Moses over his face (2 Cor. 3.[30ff.]).

ORNAMENTED BLACK VEIL

No curtain or veil is mentioned in the account of the construction of Solomon's TEMPLE save in 2 Ch. 3.[14], where it is described as made of blue and purple and crimson and fine linen, with cherubim embroidered on it. In similar terms is described the veil wh. hung upon four pillars of acacia overlaid with gold, cutting off the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place in the Tabernacle (Ex. 26.[31ff.], &c.). The Heb. word is pārōketh, lit. "what habitually shuts off." Māsāḥ is the term trd. "hanging" (AV.) or "screen" (RV.), denoting three curtains or veils, connected with the TABERNACLE: (a) that which hung at the entrance to the court (Ex. 27.[16], &c.); (b) that which closed the doorway of the tent of meeting (Ex. 26.[36], &c.; and (c) the veil between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, within the tent (Ex. 35.[12], &c.). This word is also used for the covering spread over the well in the court of the house of Bahurim (2 S. 17.[19]).

Although information is lacking as to details, it is probable that such veils were found in the Temple of Zerubbabel. Evidence for one veil in the Temple of Herod is supplied by the narratives that record its rending at the time of the crucifixion (Mw. 27.[51], &c.), and by references in the Epistle to the Hebrews (6.[19], 9.[3], 10.[20]). The veil there mentioned is that concealing the Holy of Holies. The mention of it as " the second veil " is also evidence as to the first, which hung at the entrance to the Holy Place. This is confirmed by Josephus, who describes here what he himself knew familiarly. The first was "a Babylonian curtain," 55 cubits high and 16 cubits in breadth, "embroidered with blue and fine linen, and scarlet and purple, and of a contexture that was truly wonderful." A mystical significance attached to the colours and figures wrought npon it (BJ. V. v. 4). The second veil he mentions, but does not describe (ib. 5). See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

VENISON (Heb. tzayid, "something taken in hunting"). The word might almost be trd. "game"; but the idea of "sport" in our sense was not then familiar to the Hebrew mind. Their ancestors had lived largely by the produce of their bow and spear. The old feeling of its stern necessity had hardly worn off, and men did not hunt for amusement. Esau went to the chase only in the interests of the table (Gn. 25.[28], 27.[5], &c.).

VERMILION (Heb. shāshar), used for adornment of houses (Jr. 22.[14]), for portraying figures (Ek. 23.[14]). Gr. miltos. See COLOUR.

VESTRY (Heb. meltāḥāh), a word of uncertain meaning, gen. taken to denote the place where the worshippers of Baal were provided with holy vestments. Cheyne (EB. s.v.) suggests that we shd. read by a slight emendation of the text, " him that was over the hall."

VIAL in 1 S. 10.[1] is EV. tr. of pak, " a flask " for oil; in 2 K. 9.[13] AV. renders " box," RV. " vial." The " vial " of Rv. 5.[8], &c., Gr. phialē, was a shallow, saucer-like " bowl " (so RV.) used in pouring libations of wine, &c., upon heathen altars.

VILLAGE. When the people of Israel changed their manner of life from the nomadic to the settled, they carried over many of their old words and applied them to new things. "Tent," e.g., continued to be the word for a man's dwelling. In this way prob. ḥawwoth, wh. like the Arb. ḥiwā' may have signified a group of tents, came to mean the collection of dwellings forming a village (Nu. 32.[41], &c.); see HAVOTH-JAIR. Solitary houses were never reckoned safe in Pal.; consequently the scattered homesteads and cottages that dot our landscape were never seen there. For society and mutual protection men drew close together, and the villages thus formed were grouped around a common centre, a fortified city, and ranked as its " daughters." In the NT. the distinction between the city (polis) and the village (kōmē) was one of constitution rather than size, altho' the city was probably always fortified. The kōmopoleis of Mk. 1.[38], lit. " village-cities," were not smaller than the cities, but occupied an inferior position as regarded constitution. Josephus (BJ. III. iii. 2), speaking of the villages of Galilee, says that the smallest contained 15,000 inhabitants. It is impossible to accept his figures; but evidently he had very large " villages " in view.

The villagers till the soil, the land round the vill. often being common property. Imperial taxes are paid and the rest of the year's crops is divided. Sometimes the villagers work the land for other owners, and receive a percentage of the yield.

The position of the villages has been determined by two considerations, the nearness of water supply, and ease of defence. They often stand on sites marked by ruins of ancient buildings, with stones fm. wh. they have been built. Many of the villages, however, are composed of poor mud-huts, usually of but one apartment, in wh. the animals find shelter at night, as well as the family. There is an air of temporariness over all their wretched life, so that for centuries the land has worn the aspect of a house in the hands of caretakers, who expect at any moment the owner's return. Yet there are elements of nobler things in this strange people, e.g. in their regard for the comfort and security of the guest. The village " guest-house " is usually near that of the sheikh who acts as " host." But each villager holds himself responsible for his share towards the proper entertainment of " the guest of God." The religious practices of the peasants, nominally Mohammadans, connected with their maqāms, the little white-domed sanctuaries, which are always at hand, point to the survival of certain elements of the worship of the ancient Canaanites. This field yet awaits thorough investigation. See Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day, passim.

TYPICAL PALESTINIAN VILLAGE

VINE, VINEYARD. Noah is said to have planted a vineyard (Gn. 9.[20]). Prob. in view of the evil wrought by unwise use of its produce, old traditions have attributed this planting to Satan. The vine was early cultivated in Egypt, where it was said Osiris taught men how to manage it. In the days of Joseph the pressing of grapes into the cup of the king was one of the duties of Pharaoh's chief butler (Gn. 40.[9ff.]). A ground of complaint in the wilderness was that it was "no place of . . . vines" (Nu. 20.[5]). The hail destroyed the vines of Egypt (Ps. 78.[47]). Vine-culture was undoubtedly followed from very early times in Palestine. While still in the hands of the Canaanites it was famous for its vines (Dt. 8.[8]). Grapes from the vale of Eshcol formed the chief of the fruits brought back by the spies (Nu. 13.[23f.]). The vine flourished then also in the land of Edom (Nu. 20.[17], &c.). Israel took possession of the vineyards as they found them in Palestine (Jo. 24.[13]). The regulations referring to vine-culture in Lv. and Dt. show its importance. And this is fully attested by the traces of ancient vineyards in many districts where there is no sign of vines to-day. It was an industry provided for during the Captivity, when the poor of the land were left to act as vine-dressers (2 K. 25.[12], &c.). For its satisfactory cultivation, however, peaceful and secure times were needful, so that for a man to sit under his vine (Mi. 4.[4]) was a symbol oi safe contentment.

PEF. Photo THE RETURN OF THE SPIES

Both the soil and the climate of Pal. are well suited for vine-culture. On the terraced slopes of the sunny hill-sides, through long unclouded months, the vines bring their precious clusters to perfection, the heavy night-dews furnishing sufficient moisture. The terraces require careful attention lest the winter rains destroy them. The ground is worked over with a hoe, and all alien roots removed. The space occupied by the vineyard is usually surrounded by a dry-stone dyke, or fence of thorns, while a "tower," or shelter for the watchman, is always present, whence the vines may be guarded against pillage or injury by robbers or animals. The vines are planted in rows, about 8 or 10 ft. apart. They are trained in a sloping position. Pruning is done in December and January. April and May see the blossoms, and in the month of September the vintage is general. The industry, wh. seems to have flourished for at least 200 years after Christ, languished under Moslem dominion. In recent years the influence of German and Jewish colonies has done much to restore it in certain districts, and vast numbers of the choicest vines have been introduced. While the bulk of the grapes are used in the making of wine, &c., many are dried as raisins, while great quantities are disposed of, fresh, in the markets. The grapes of es-Salṭ, on the east of the Jordan, are especially prized for raisins. It appears certain also that in ancient times, as to-day, the custom prevailed of boiling the grape-juice into a thick, sweet syrup, known as dibs, "grape honey." This is possibly at times intended by the Heb. dĕbash, wh. EV. always render "honey." For wine-press, &c., see WINE AND STRONG DRINK.

The Nazirite was forbidden to touch any product of the vine (Nu. 6.[4], &c.). The vine has long been to the nomads the symbol of the settled life, wh. tends always to encroach upon their free domain. As such they have regarded it with antipathy; and this may to some extent explain their aversion to the produce of the vine to-day, and also the attitude of the RECHABITES in the olden time.

Jesus takes the vine-stock as a figure of Himself. He is the great life-giver and sustainer of those wh. trust Him. The condition of fruit-bearing is that the branches abide in Him, that the relation between them remain fresh and vital (Jn. 15.[1ff.]). This allegorical use of the vine was all the more easy and natural because "in the OT., and partially in Jewish thought, the vine was the symbol of Israel, not in their national but in their church capacity" (Edersheim, LTJ. ii. 520).

VINE OF SODOM. See SODOM.

VINEGAR (Heb. ḥōmetz, Gr. oxos). V. "of wine," and V. "of strong drink," were both prohibited to the Nazirite (Nu. 6.[3]). The former is the light wine of the country gone sour, i.e. it has passed through the process of fermentation in which the alcohol it contains has been converted into acetic acid: the latter is formed by the fermentation of saccharine fluids. V. was used with food in ancient times, the bread being dipped in it and then eaten (Ru. 2.[14]). It was certainly used as a beverage by the humbler people, but the Psalmist (Ps. 69.[21]) seems to complain that nothing better was given to slake his thirst. It was a safe and refreshing drink (diluted with water, of course), of wh., under the name of posca, the Roman soldiers were very fond. They had a jar full of it at the cross (Jn. 19.[29]), fm. wh. the executioners might drink. In ancient medicine it was highly valued for its cooling properties. Moved by Jesus' cry of distress, and not understanding it, one dipped a sponge in the vinegar wh. stood by the cross, and putting it on a reed, reached it up to the lips of the Sufferer. This He gratefully accepted. It is noteworthy that, having rejected the wine mingled with myrrh, wh. wd. have acted as a narcotic, He drank the vinegar, wh. would have a refreshing effect (Mw. 27.[48], &c.).

Undiluted V. sets the teeth "on edge" (Pr. 10.[20]). V. dropped on nitre (crude sodic carbonate) causes effervescence (Pr. 25.[20]).

VIOL (Heb. nebel; this word, except in Is. 5.[12], 14.[11], 22.[24] AVm.; Am. 5.[23], 6.[5], is rendered in AV. PSALTERY: in Is. 22.[24] text is "flagons"). See MUSIC.

VIPER. See SERPENT.

VIRGIN. The usual Heb. word is bĕthûlāh, wh. in certain places denotes virgo intacta (Gn. 24.[16]; Dt. 22.[23], &c.). The importance attached to virginity in a bride led to strict regulations for the protection of virgins (Dt. 22.[13ff.]; vv. 23ff., &c.). The exact significance of the word, when used figuratively of a people, is not easy to determine. It occurs with the word "daughter," e.g. "the virgin daughter of Zion" (Is. 37.[22], &c.), "virgin dr. of Zidon" (Is. 23.[12]), &c. It may possibly mean that the people remain unconquered, never having yielded to the foe. But in Jr. 31.[4] virgin is applied to Israel with the yoke of bondage on her neck. In Jl. 1.[8] it is applied to a woman who laments in sackcloth "the husband of her youth."

The word 'almāh in Gn. 24.[43] denotes "virgin." In SS. 1.[1], 6.[8], the meaning is uncertain. It may prob. be understood as a young woman who has reached the stage of puberty; who may be married or unmarried. In Is. 7.[14] the LXX translates it parthenos, wh. means strictly "virgin," and St. Matthew, quoting from the LXX, regards this verse as a definite prophecy of the virgin birth of Christ. It is strange that this word should have been used in Heb. when the more familiar bĕthûlāh would more clearly have conveyed the meaning.

In NT. parthenos bears its usual meaning of virgo intacta, but in RV. 14.[4] it is applied to men, where possibly it implies that they have preserved themselves from impurity, not that they were celibates. Perhaps to this verse may be in part traced the emphasis subsequently laid upon the excellence of virginity, as a condition of religious life. For Virgin Birth see JESUS CHRIST.

VISION (Heb. ḥāzōn, and other derivatives of ḥāzāh; and mar'āh), the state of mind in wh. a prophet was when he received a Divine communication. In the case of some of the literary prophets the seer describes what he saw: thus Ezekiel gives a picture of what appeared to him at the river Chebar (Ek. 1.[4-28]); so also Daniel. On the other hand, Isaiah assumes the picture and gives, as it were, a lyric accompaniment to it. Balaam's account of the phenomena is worthy of special attention; he describes himself as he "which saw the vision of God falling into a trance but having his eyes open," i.e. retaining his consciousness. The prophet, seized upon by the Divine Spirit, his own spiritual nature filled with the message of God, saw pictures that were flashed forth fm. his imagination to give body to "the burden" that was oppressing him. V. was not a mere literary device consciously adopted; it was part of the phenomena of prophecy.

VOLUME (Heb. mĕgillāh, Gr. kephalis) is lit. "roll" (so RV.: Ps. 40.[7]; He. 10.[7]). The prepared skin or parchment on which the work was written was rolled round a piece of wood and unrolled for reading. See illustration to SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH.

VOPHSI, father of Nahbi, who represented Naphtali among the spies (Nu. 13.[14]).

VOW. From very ancient times the Hebrews shared the widespread custom among primitive peoples of making vows to the deity on special occasions. In moments of grave peril, or of pressing need, men naturally appeal to their god for protection or help. In like manner, embarking on an enterprise of more than usual anxiety, they seek for assurance of divine assistance. To convince the deity concerned of the grateful spirit that is in them, to win his favour and incline him to grant their requests, they promise to dedicate to him what they believe will be pleasing in his eyes, if their desires are fulfilled. Or again, in a spirit of loyalty and devotion, to prove their zeal and sincerity in their religious service, men promise to deprive themselves of certain things which make for comfort and enjoyment, and even dedicate themselves personally to the deity. The former transaction is in the nature of a bargain. The oldest instance in Scrip. is that of Jacob, who vowed to make the pillar he had set up the house of God, and to give to Him a tenth of all he should possess, on the distinct condition, however, that God should be with him and help him, give him bread and raiment, and bring him again to his father's house in peace (Gn. 28.[20ff.]). Jephthah's vow was of the same order (Jg. 11.[30]).* Hannah also vowed that if the Lord gave her a son he should be consecrated to the Divine service—a NAZIRITE from the womb (1 S. 1.[11]), and we find the vow remembered with the yearly sacrifice (v. 20). On the pretext of paying such a vow, made in his exile at Geshur, Absalom was allowed to go to Hebron, and so secured the opportunity to raise there the standard of revolt (2 S. 15.[7f.]). The vow of self-denial may be illustrated by the resolve of Israel not to profit by the spoil of Arad, if God gave it into their hands, but to devote it absolutely to Him, i.e. to destroy it (Nu. 21.[2]). Saul sought to prove his devotion by abstaining himself, and causing all his army to abstain, from food until the evening of the day on which he sought vengeance on the Phil. (1 S. 14.[24]); cp. also David's vow (Ps. 132.[1ff.]).

* A curious Jewish explanation of the phrase "was buried in the cities of Gilead" (Jg. 12.[7] Heb.) is that it was Jephthah's duty to have obtained relief from the obligation of his rash vow, from an official in Israel, who had authority to absolve men from vows wh. were displeasing to God. Jephthah preferred to execute his wicked vow: for this he was smitten with a terrible disease. In the course of visiting the fortresses of Gilead, the members of his body dropped off one by one, and were buried where they fell.

There was in Israel no necessity for one to make a vow (Dt. 23.[22]); but from the obligation to fulfil the vow, once it was made, there was no escape (Nu. 30.[2]; Dt. 23.[21]). A vow taken by a maid living in her father's house might be disallowed by him and thus become void. The like was true regarding the vow of a woman living with her husband. But if the father or husband kept silence the vow was valid. A widow, or divorced woman, acted on her own responsibility. The phrase "bind the soul" may mean that death was the penalty of a broken vow (Nu. 30. passim). Any attempt to escape the full responsibility, by substituting "a blemished thing" in the sacrifice, was cursed (Ml. 1.[14]). Anything vowed, however, except animals, might be redeemed on certain terms (Lv. 27.). Nothing could be vowed wh. already belonged of right to God, e.g. firstlings.

In the days of Jesus the vow was used as a means of escape from some of the most sacred filial duties. Children must support their parents in the helplessness and need of old age. But if they declared the intention to devote their possessions to God—calling it Corban—while still at their own disposal for personal purposes, they could no longer be used for the help of their parents (Nu. 15.[5], &c.). Unnatural greed found a pretext in piety. St. Paul conformed to Jewish practice in relation to vows (Ac. 18.[18], 21.[23ff.]). As to cutting the hair on the fulfilment of a vow, see HAIR, NAZIRITE.

To this day vows are common among the Jews and the Arabs in the East. Vows taken in hours of distress often involve long pilgrimage and much privation in their fulfilment. But in this matter there is a very sensitive conscience. The present writer has known men who suffered much personal inconvenience and loss rather than run the risks attached to failure.

VULGATE. The word is a contraction for Vulgata Editio, and means practically the current Latin version of Holy Scripture, though St. Jerome and later writers apply that name to the Greek version known as the Septuagint, which was the current version in the early days of the Church. It might have been expected that the earliest Latin translation of the Bible should have been made at Rome, and for the use of Roman Christians. As a matter of fact this was not so. The early Christian Church at Rome was essentially Greek. Greek was the ordinary language of the community; the names of the Roman bishops were Greek; the earliest Roman liturgy was Greek; and such remains as we have of the early Roman Christian literature are Greek. And in the churches of Gaul Greek held a correspondingly predominant place. There is a general agreement among scholars that the earliest Latin version of the Bible was made for the use of the Roman settlements in North Africa, which seem to have been Latin-speaking from the first. This translation may probably be dated about the middle of the second century, though it is sometimes traced back to apostolic times. Though the work of private hands, and not produced by any public authority, it would seem from the language of Tertullian to have acquired a measure of public recognition before the end of the second century. This version is known to scholars as the old Latin (Vetus Latina). In Italy it was held to be marked by provincial roughness of expression; and the acquaintance of the leading bishops with Greek naturally led to comparisons between the original language of the NT. and the African version. The result of these influences was the Latin version known as the Itala, which appeared in the fourth century, and seems to have been made with some degree of authority. It secured the commendation of Augustine on the ground of its close accuracy and perspicuity. It has been held that similar national recensions were made for other countries.

Jerome's Version.—Apart from variations which in course of time are bound to creep into manuscripts transmitted from age to age, a statement of Augustine (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 16) encourages the view that there was no recognised authority for securing the transmission of a correct text of Scripture. Any one who came into possession of a Greek manuscript of any part of Scripture, and who thought that he had any command of the two languages, held himself entitled to undertake a Latin version; the result towards the end of the fourth century being that the bishop of Rome (Damasus) felt that an authoritative recension was necessary. The imminent severance of the Church into East and West at this juncture rendered the necessity all the greater. Providentially the services of a great scholar were at hand to meet the requirements of the western division of Christendom. Jerome—his full name was Eusebius Hieronymus—was a native of Stridon, in Pannonia. He was born about the year 346 (sometimes given as 329, which, however, is contradicted by his letters), and lived to 420. He lived the life of a student and scholar; he was by education master of the Latin and Greek tongues, while of Hebrew he made a special study, that he might know at first hand the language from which he must render the OT. into Latin. He came to Rome in 381 and stayed there till 385. At the request of the bishop (Pope Damasus) he devoted himself to the revision of certain portions of the Bible, and as a matter of fact the new version of the Psalms, which he made from the Septuagint, was used in the Roman Church till the Pontificate of Pius V. By strenuous preliminary labours on the Itala, and by commentaries on various books of the Bible, he prepared himself for the production of the Vulgate or Latin version of the Bible, which was destined to be for centuries the authoritative version of Scripture current in Western Christendom. His labours were steadily continued notwithstanding the suspicions and enmity of the clergy and people, whom his vigorous and at times contemptuous language certainly did nothing to conciliate. There is ground for holding that the deliberate purpose of preparing a Latin version of the whole Bible was formed when Jerome settled in the monastery at Bethlehem in the year 386. The work was accomplished and issued in successive portions, and, though variously interrupted, it was completed and issued as a whole about the year 404; and the title of Vulgate, hitherto applied to the version previously in use, came in time to belong to the edition which was mainly the work of Jerome. Certain parts of the work are admitted by Jerome himself to have been hastily performed, and they obviously bear the marks of haste. But, as Westcott says, "Such defects are trifling when compared with what he successfully accomplished. The work remained for eight centuries the bulwark of Western Christianity; and as a monument of ancient linguistic power, the translation of the OT. stands unrivalled and unique."

Carolingian Version.—The version of Jerome was permitted to work its way gradually into acceptance by the Church without any exercise of authority being made in its favour. But in course of time its text deteriorated under the same influences as corrupted the text before Jerome, namely, the liability to the introduction of error into copies written by the hand, and the disposition of individuals who had some knowledge of Greek to introduce changes from the Septuagint. However caused, the variations in the text of Scripture drew the attention of Charlemagne, and about the year 802 Alcuin was entrusted with the duty of revising the text for the use of the public service of the Church. Opinions differ as to the extent and scope of Alcuin's work. According to some, he made a fresh translation from the Hebrew and the Greek; according to others, to these resources he added a collation of the best attainable MSS. of the Vulgate; while others, like Porson, think that he employed MSS. alone. In any case, he preserved the continuity of the Vulgate by prefixing the prologues or prefaces of Jerome to the books. The British Museum contains a copy of Alcuin's or Charlemagne's Bible. The revision is allowed to have contributed much towards preserving a good Vulgate text, though it could not, of course, any more than its predecessors, secure its permanent purity. Inevitable corruption gradually took place. A fresh revision was undertaken by Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury (1089), and in the following century Cardinal Nicolaus (1150), finding the copies very corrupt (paene quot codices tot exemplaria reperirem), undertook to revise the text. The Correctoria or Epanorthotæ, which were issued by learned and religious associations, and contained revised Biblical texts with critical remarks in the margin, did not contribute to the purity of the text, though they were not without value. They were constructed on no sound critical canons, but merely gave the readings adopted by preference from some favourite Father. From these causes it has been inferred that "the old MSS. had far more variations than are to be seen in any critical edition of the Vulgate afterwards printed; and that the text has passed through so many circumstances as make it a hopeless task to bring it back to what it was at first. It cannot but be corrupt now, whatever be the labour expended in restoring it." The invention of printing at once revealed the confusion existing in the MS. texts.

Printed Versions.—The first book that issued from the press was the Bible. It was without date, but is usually assigned to the year 1455 (Mainz: Gutenberg and Fust). The first that had a date was published at Mainz in 1462; numerous editions followed, issuing from Rome, Nürnberg, Piacenza, Paris, Naples, Venice, &c. The first attempt to form a really critical text was made by Cardinal Ximenes (1502–1517) in the Complutensian Polyglott, a work of great labour based upon a comparison of various MSS., and occasionally upon the Hebrew and Greek originals. It was far surpassed, however, by the edition of the Paris printer, Robert Estienne or Stephens (1528), improved in successive editions to the eighth in 1557. Various translations—Catholic and Protestant—followed, constructed in varying degrees of dependence upon Vulgate MSS. and the original tongues. A full account of these will be found in the article "Lateinische Bibelübersetzungen" in Herzog's Encyclopädie. In the year 1546 the Council of Trent pronounced the Vulgate version authentic, and decreed that "hereafter sacred Scripture, but especially this ancient and Vulgate edition itself, shall be printed as accurately as possible." By the term authentic the Council probably meant that the Vulgate should be used as the authorised or standard version of the Catholic Church, to which appeal should be made in all disputations or expositions. This decree, however, did not prevent the issue of new editions with varying texts, and at length a text specially prepared under papal authority was found necessary.

The Sixtine and Clementine Editions.—The work was seriously undertaken by Sixtus V. (1585–90), who brought together a number of scholars to labour at it without intermission. In cases of difficulty the Pope himself decided the reading that should be adopted in the text, and with his own hand corrected errors of the press. The result was issued in 1590 as the true, legitimate, and authentic text for all future time, and the greater excommunication was threatened against all who in any way presumed to alter it. Notwithstanding this, it was ill received by the scholars and theologians, whose labours on the text had been disregarded by Sixtus in the readings which he imperiously and arbitrarily introduced. As Sixtus died in the same year in which his work was published, the attempt was made to suppress it entirely and to issue a new edition in its stead. The three following popes were short-lived: one of them (Gregory XIV.) authorised two of his cardinals to make a new revision of the Vulgate by comparing the Sixtine edition with the original texts. He died before the work was finished, but its completion was undertaken by Clement VIII., who entrusted the work to three cardinals, and under their care it was published in 1592. This new edition was also declared authentic, and the same threat of excommunication was issued against alteration as in the case of the Sixtine text. Roman Catholic theologians have always had a difficulty in reconciling the actions of these two popes; and to save the credit of the Sixtine edition the expedient of Bellarmine, who wrote the preface to the Clementine edition, has generally been adopted of throwing the blame on the printer. On this theory the Clementine edition was merely a reprint of the Sixtine with the printer's error corrected; but Protestant critics have little difficulty in proving the untenability of this position (Davidson, Biblical Criticism, p. 279). Fresh editions of the Clementine version were issued in 1593 and 1598, the last with a correctorium of itself and of the 1592 and 1593 editions; but the differences between the three are so considerable in number and importance that they cannot well be regarded as merely typographical errors. The Clementine editions contain the official text of the Latin Bible of the Roman Catholic Church, and the publication of various readings with this edition of the Vulgate was and is expressly prohibited. Of the three editions, that of 1593 is allowed to be the best. All editions of the Vulgate that have appeared since the Clementine are of merely private authority. Even the meritorious work of Vercellone (Rome, 1861), which was the first attempt to establish Jerome's text on the basis of all available material and on sound critical canons, although issued from Rome and under all the customary guarantees of authority, is only a private and not an official text. The attempt of Lethielleux in the Paris edition of 1891 to republish Vercellone's text as official in France, is altogether discountenanced in the appendix to the latest edition of the Clementine text by P. Michael Hetzenaver (Innsbruck, 1906), an elaborate work representing the toil of fifteen years. This text is based upon a collation of the three Clementine editions and the Correctorium. Beyond the correction of obvious typographical errors, everything admitted into this text must have Clementine authority. The Vulgate text agrees generally with the Massoretic Hebrew. It has had immense power in forming the doctrinal terminology of Western Christianity. J. HUTCHISON.

VULTURE (Heb. 'ayyāh, Jb. 28.[7]; elsewhere trd. "kite"; dā'āh, Lv. 11.[14]; dayyāh, Dt. 14.[13]; Is. 34.[15], so AV.: RV. reserves V. for rāḥām, Lv. 11.[18], AV. "gier eagle"). There are several kinds of V. in Pal., and it is difficult to determine the special kind meant by each term. It is to be noted that there is no reference to the principal function of the V., i.e. acting as scavenger, in the Bible notices; that work is assigned to the eagle (actos) in the NT. (Mw. 24.[28]; Lk. 17.[37]). They are often depicted on the Asyr. marbles.

W

WAFER represents two Heb. words. (1) Tzĕphīḥith (only once, Ex. 16.[31]), from tzāphah, "to make wide" or "broad." (2) Rāqīq, from rāqaq, "to be thin." This is the usual term (Ex. 29.[2], &c.). Both words obviously are descriptive of the same thing—the thin cake of unleavened bread wh. figures in many of the ritual directions.

WAGES are first mentioned in connection with Jacob's service to Laban, and there they are paid in kind (Gn. 29.[15], &c.). To one in Jacob's position money would have been of little use. Wages were promised to Moses' mother by Pharaoh's daughter (Ex. 2.[9]). Micah engaged the Levite to perform the functions of "a father and a priest" in his house at a stipend of "ten pieces of silver by the year and a suit of apparel," together with his food (Jg. 17.[10]). Nebuchadnezzar failed to take Tyre, and so his army is said to have had no "wages" for the weary toil of the siege. Egypt, however, is to fall to him, and its spoil shall be "wages" for his army (Ek. 29.[18f.]). Of the rate of wages paid there is no indication in the OT., but in the NT. a denarius (see MONEY) is taken apparently as an ordinary day's wage for a labourer (Mw. 20.[2]). The denarius wd. be worth about 7½d. of our money. Tobit hired the angel Gabriel as a companion in travel to his son, at the rate of "a drachm a day, and things necessary," with the promise of something more if they should return in safety. This last is clearly the bakhshīsh which the soul of the Oriental loves. Nothing is said of the amount given to the hired man who looked after the flocks (Jn. 10.[12]).

In olden days the work on the land would be done for the most part by the peasant farmer and his family. Not many would be able to afford the luxury of slaves. But when hired help was called in the payment of wages was strictly regulated. They must be paid in the evening of each day (Lv. 19.[13]; Dt. 24.[15]; cp. Mw. 20.[8]). It is probable that the master supplied the labourers with food. Jb. 24.[10f.] seems to reproach the employer who stinted the workers' provisions. The hired servant cost twice as much as the slave, i.e. food and clothes besides his wages (Dt. 15.[18]). To withhold the hire of the toiler was regarded with special reprobation (Jr. 22.[13]; Ml. 3.[5]; Js. 5.[4]). In Rm. 6.[23] " wages " stands for death, as the reward gained by the practice of sin. It was customary to give one who was engaged for a specified time to do special work, a part of the wage agreed upon at the beginning. This was the arrhabōn, " earnest " (2 Cor. 1.[22], &c.), the Arb. ra'bōn, or " pledge " ; the remainder being paid on completion of the work.

The Code of Ḥammurabi shows that in ancient Babylonia the wages paid to artisans and different classes of workmen were strictly defined. Thus the harvester gets eight gur of corn per year, the ox-driver six, and the herdsman eight. The labourer hired for work in the fields receives six she of silver per day during the first five months of the year, and five she per day for the rest of the year. The brick-maker, the tailor, the stone-cutter, the carpenter, the builder, &c., have all their hire prescribed. So also with the ox, the ass, and the calf, for threshing ; the cart, boat, or ship (see Code of Ḥammurabi, HDB. extra vol. p. 606f.).

WAGGON. See Cart.

WAILING. See Mourning.

WAITERS FOR THE REDEMPTION. Of the aged Simeon who met Mary and Joseph when they brought the child Jesus into the Temple, it is said he was " waiting for (RV. " looking for," Gr. prosdechomenos) the consolation of Israel " (Lk. 2.[25]). Anna, who also recognised Christ, " spake of Him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem " (2.[38]). Again at the end of our Lord's earthly career, when Joseph of Arimathea begs the body of Jesus, we are told of him that he was one that " waited for (RV. " looked for ") the kingdom of God " (Mk. 15.[43]; Lk. 23.[51]). As all the Jews, with the possible exception of the sceptical Sadducees, were " looking for " the coming of the Messiah, unless the words have a more restricted meaning, Anna's talk concerning Jesus wd. be addressed to every inhabitant of Jrs. There appears to have been a sect wh. assumed a name in wh. " waiting " was an essential element. Josephus refers to no such sect, nor does Philo. On the other hand, although our Lord met with every class of person—Pharisees, Sadducees, Zealots, Herodians, publicans, scribes, &c.—He never meets with the Essenes, a sect of whom both Philo and Josephus make a great deal. This is the more extraordinary, as Josephus says that " many dwell in every city " (BJ. II. viii. 4) ; and Philo says that there were myriads of them, and that they inhabited many cities and large and populous villages (quoted fm. Philo's Apology by Eus. Prep. Evang. viii. 11). If " Essenes," however, were of the nature of a nickname, as " Quakers " for the Society of Friends, then our Lord mt. encounter them under another name ; as the sect of W. for the R. is otherwise unmentioned, we may identify them with the Essenes. It is slightly confirmatory of this view that Epiphanius associates the Essenes with a sect which he names Gortheni, a name wh. may be derived fm. agrey, " to expect " (Aph. fm. gāra). The etymology of Essene is extremely difficult, but the most probable seems that of Baur and Gfrörer, wh. derives it fm. aṣa, " to heal " (cp. aṣya, " a physician "), as this suits the practice Jos. attributes to them of healing by incantations and their knowledge of the healing powers of herbs. The accounts given of them are somewhat difficult to harmonise. The detailed descriptions we find in Jos. and Philo relate only to a community of cœnobites who resided at En-Gedi, near the Dead Sea, about four thousand in all. We can only summarise the elaborate accounts wh. these authors, especially the former, give of them. Those living at En-Gedi carried on simple husbandry under the superintendence of " overseers " (epimelētai), working fm. sunrise to an hour fm. midday. Then, having bathed and put on white linen garments, they assemble together in a refectory and partake of a simple meal ; each has a single small loaf put before him, and a dish with one kind of food. The priest then offers a prayer, before wh. it is unlawful to taste the food : after the meal he again prays. Having doffed their white garments, they return to their labour, at wh. they continue till sunset, when they sup as they had dined. As to their general characteristics, Josephus says that they have more mutual affection than any of the other sects, that they have all things in common, they avoid swearing, and are ready to help all that stand in need of succour. These features shd. be noted for the resemblance they bear to the teaching of Christ and the practices of the early Church. There are certain other features wh. have more a ceremonial aspect ; the extreme strictness with wh. they sanctified the Sabbath, the avoidance of oil for anointing themselves, and the dressing in white. Philo says in addition, " No one of the Essenes ever marries a wife " ; on the other hand Josephus says, " They do not absolutely repudiate marriage," though " they despise" it. Members are received into the community by a ceremony wh. suggests baptism; "he partakes of the purest water for cleansing." They avoided everything connected with war, they did not go to the Temple, and did not approve of bloody sacrifices. One thing that strikes the student is that these features harmonise neither with each other nor with notices we have of individual Essenes. The earliest incident Josephus narrates contradicts the statement that they shunned the Temple. Judas the Essene was teaching in the court of the Temple when Antigonus, son of John Hyrcanus, br. of Aristobulus the High Priest, passed through; when he saw him he exclaimed that he was proved a false prophet, for he had foretold that Antigonus was to die that day in Strato's Tower (Cæsarea), and here he was 600 stadia fm. there. While he was lamenting his mistake the tidings was brought that the youth had been assassinated in a subterranean passage, beneath a tower in the wall of Jrs., wh. had that name. They are said to have nothing to do with war, yet one of the commanders of the Jews at the opening of their war against the Romans was John the Essene. These differences are most easily explained by considering that there were several kinds of Essenes, as there are several kinds of Methodists among ourselves, differing in tenets and practices. There were some Essenes who were practically monks in the community on the shores of the Dead Sea; there were those who travelled about the country, who had little communities and houses of call in every city; there were those who had no aversion to the Temple, as well as those who had; there were those who eschewed marriage, and those who did not.

The Relation of the Essenes to the Apocalyptic Books.—Hilgenfeld (Messias Judæorum) conjectures that they are the authors of the majority of the Jewish Apocalyptic books. A great deal can be said for that view. Josephus mentions that they preserve books "that belong to their sect, and the names of the angels." All these Apocalypses assume the names of ancient prophets and patriarchs, and claim to be on a par with Scripture. Further, their angelology, especially that of the largest of them, the book or books of Enoch, is very complex, and many names are given to seraphim and cherubim and ophanim, besides the seven who stand before God—who sometimes are four. One point of difference is that while in the Apocalyptic books the Messiah and His kingdom bulk largely, in the accounts we have of the doctrines of the Essenes there is no mention of this. We have to remember the two sources of our information, Josephus and Philo. Both had reasons wh. led to the avoidance of all notice of the Messianic hopes of his people, yet both had so commended the Essenes that they wd. have had to declare an adhesion to these hopes if they mentioned them at all. To Gentiles—the audience addressed by both—these hopes wd. seem absurd and chimerical; there mt. even be elements of danger fm. the Roman authorities to any Jew who mt. be supposed to be inciting the people to renew the contest so recently ended. Hence the silence of Josephus and Philo has no evidential value.

The Relation of the Essenes to Christ and Christianity.—If our identification of the W. for the R. with the Essenes is correct, then it wd. seem probable that both Joseph and Mary belonged to this brotherhood, through some of its freer forms; it is clear, at all events, that the brotherhood took them up. The action of Joseph of Arimathea is made more easily explicable on this supposition. There are numerous points in our Lord's ethical teaching wh. confirm this view; the despising of riches, the mutual love and helpfulness enjoined, the admission into the brotherhood by baptism. There are indirect suggestions of a connection; as when the apostles are sent forth two and two, in every town they are to seek "who in it is worthy": if this meant belonging to the Essene brotherhood, the search wd. be simple, the more especially as they had regular houses of entertainment. Like the apostles when the Lord sent them out, they carried nothing with them; singularly enough, he mentions that they carry weapons for fear of robbers; and Peter had a sword. The most striking indication, however, is the fact referred to above, that our Lord is never recorded as having met an Essene; were He, in however outward a sense, a member of the society, His encounters with Essenes wd. be a meeting with brethren; it may be that the "brethren" who, with His mother, wished to speak with Him, and who declared Him to be beside Himself, were the epimelētai of the Essenes. In this we wd. not be held as derogating fm. the supreme originality of Jesus. Real originality does not consist in throwing a thought athwart the line of human development, utterly unrelated to anything that has preceded. Such a thought cd. only be apprehended with difficulty by those to whom it was addressed. Originality consists rather in summing up all that has gone before and advancing the line of progress. Our Lord cut away fm. Essenism all its sanctimoniousness, as He threw off the posing of the Pharisees. Combining in Himself all that was best in Judaism, He fulfilled, and so superseded it, as the setting seed supersedes the flower.* The subsequent history of the Essenes confirms this view. With the fall of Jerusalem they disappeared in the Christian Church. Bishop Lightfoot traces Essenism in the heresy that infected the Church at Colosse ; that infection came fm. Judaisers ; therefore the Judaising members of the Church were Essenes. The character Hegesippus gives of James, the Lord's brother, and the respect in wh. he was held by the people, all suggest that he belonged to the wider Essene brotherhood. Much of the Gnosticism of slightly subsequent times was due to Essenian elements. The sect of the Nazarenes, if not also the Ebionites, were the Essenes as baptized unto Christ. In another aspect the white robes of the blessed in Paradise may be a reflection fm. the garments of pure white linen in wh. the Essenes sat down to their evening meal when their work was done and they entered into rest.

* We must always remember that Jesus was more than a teacher. His originality did not consist so much in the doctrines He taught as in the vital force His substitutionary death contributed to those that believe in Him and realise these doctrines in their lives. Other teachers before and since have taught morality; He alone gave an adequate impulse to live out the precepts, and living power to do so.

WALLET. See Bag.

WALLS. There are three purposes wh. are regarded as served by walls in Scrip., and in the OT. these are denoted by different words. (a) A fence (Heb. gādēr, geder, gēderāh). In Pal. at present walls are generally used for fences, and are built fm. the loose stones, fragments of limestone rock that have mingled with the soil ; they are not very high, and broad in proportion to their height. No mortar is used, and the stones fitted into each other are held in position by their weight. Probably these walls have always been in use to protect gardens and fields fm. the intrusion of cattle and beasts of the field. (b) The W. of a house, temple, or palace (Heb. qīr). Houses are now built of squared stone, and the foundation dug as described in the art. on House. An older form of building was constructed of sun-dried brick, seen to this day in Damascus and in the plains of Mesopotamia. The idea of burning the clay seems soon to have occurred to the inhabitants of Babylonia ; still the walls of private dwellings seem to have been constructed of sun-dried brick. In Nineveh even the palaces were built of such bricks, and the thick walls so resulting were faced with gypsum slabs adorned with historic bas-reliefs and inscriptions. Although stone was plentiful in Egypt, and easily accessible, most private buildings were erected of this crude brick mixed with straw. We may presume that carved stone was little used in Pal., at least before the days of David, a presumption wh. is confirmed by Solomon's employment of Hiram's hewers along with his own subjects in the building of the Temple (1 K. 5.[18]). In Gezer the walls of houses were built of unhewn stone faced with mud ; the stones are such as are found in any field at the present time ; the mud supplied the place of mortar. Probably stone wd. be employed for the foundation. In Egypt the walls were much more solidly constructed even fm. the earliest times ; the stones that form the Temple of the Sphinx are so accurate that in many places the joints are scarcely perceptible. The stones used in Egypt were frequently large, and were fastened together with tenons of wood. The Phœnicians also used stones of great size, as may be seen at Baalbek ; sometimes, while accurately fitting the joints, they left the outside rough, merely channelling the stones at the joints in order to make sure of accuracy ; the effect was thus much like Roman rustication ; no cement was used. The foundation stones of the Temple at Jerusalem are huge square blocks channelled at the joints as above referred to, thus resembling the Phœnician method of construction. The tower in Gezer within the bastion of Bacchides, as shown in Macalister's Bible Side Lights, fig. 37, exhibits this also. (c) Walls of a city (Heb. ḥōmāh). Though in purpose this resembled the "fence" (geder), the solidity of structure required brings it more into line with the W. of a temple or palace. The wall at Gezer is formed of large, untrimmed stones cemented with earth ; it is perpendicular to a height at present of fm. 12 to 14 ft., a height wh. can represent little more than the foundation of the finished structure ; its thickness is 14 ft. At intervals along the course of the W. were towers ; especially was the gate so strengthened. The Solomonic W., with its closely fitting stones, was yet stronger than the W. of the earlier Canaanites. With the sculptures of Nineveh and the wall-paintings of Egypt we have a pretty good idea of what a city W. must have been in OT. times. Fm. the frequency with wh. Assyrian soldiers are depicted removing stones fm. the foundations of the W. of besieged cities with the point of their spears (Layard, Mon. of Nineveh, plate 66), or with implements fitted for the purpose (id. plate 19), and fm. the small size of stones represented as being removed, it wd. seem that the structure of city W. in the days of Sennacherib was in general like that of the Amorite wall of Gezer. There are several other words for W. in OT., as ḥēl, "a bulwark" (Ps. 122.[7]) ; bātzār, "a fortification" (Nu. 13.[28]) ; shūr, "a wall" in general (cp. Gn. 49.[22] with Ps. 18.[29]).

WAR. In ancient times a state of W. was presumed unless a treaty existed, hence we do not find among the Jews any regular form of "declaration of war" as there was among the Romans. The nearest approach to a declaration of war is the message of Amaziah to Joash of Israel (2 K. 14.[8]). The first step before entering on any warlike expedition was, among the Israelites, as indeed among all ancient nations, to consult the Deity. They approached JHWH by sacrifice and learned His will fm. His priest (Jg. 20.[26-28]). Later, prophets were inquired at (1 K. 22.[5f.]). When war had been decided on, and it was determined to invade the territory of the foe, Divine direction was again entreated as to how they were to go up against them (2 S. 5.[23]). Under the word ARMY the constitution of the military force of Israel is considered. Saul began with a small standing army, then increased it; under David it appears to have become yet more numerous. A levy en masse does not seem to have been resorted to in cases where W. had to be carried on beyond the boundaries of Israel. Thus when David made a campaign against Hadadezer of Zobah, he cd. not have all those able to bear arms with him; there wd. only be a chosen number. Even in wars against nearer foes, Moab and Ammon, it was only the "choice men of Israel," and "all the host of the mighty men," that went. Although it is said that when it was told David that Hadarezer had assembled all the Syrians against him, "he gathered all Israel together," the choice of those of age to carry arms is all that is meant. We know nothing of the way this conscription was carried out. The campaign began in spring, in March, when operations were less likely to be interrupted by floods of rain, and when the grain of the country invaded was either yet in the field or in the threshing floor ready for being garnered; there was grass also for the horses. The Biblical narrative is interested in war in a purely subordinate way, so we learn nothing of how they marched when making an expedition in an enemy's country; or how they kept up their communications. Encampments are yet more important than modes of marching or of securing communications; of these we know something fm. the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, and it is probable the Hebrews followed methods not unlike those of their more military neighbours, and had a rampart of a sort round their camp. In confirmation of this it may be noted that in 1 S. 26.[5] ma'gāl (ma'gālāh, 1 S. 17.[20]), trd. "trench," really means a "rampart of waggons," a system of defence adopted in S. Africa against the Kafirs. They do not seem to have formed, like the Romans, a rampart of earth, or one formed of shields like the Egyptians. The division of the night into "watches" is a proof that they placed sentinels. In the dry climate of the nearer East there is no need of tents, and we see that Saul was lying on the earth with his spear stuck in the ground at his head. When the purpose of the campaign was not a mere plundering raid, the objective was the capital of the country; the possession of it was frequently decided by a battle in its neighbourhood. Although the Egyptians had their ARMY arranged in brigades and battalions wh. charged together as we see fm. the monuments; although fm. the different uniforms portrayed something similar must have existed among the Assyrians, a battle with the Israelites was a much more irregular affair; champions played a prominent part in the conflict, as in the Homeric battles. Since there were "captains of thousands, of hundreds, and of fifties," there appears to have been some approach to military organisation. It shd. be observed that "thousand" ('eleph) probably in this connection meant "family." These wd. charge together, the champions taking the lead, much as did the Highland clans with the armed dhuine-wassails in front. Battles seem to have been most frequently decided by panic seizing one party or the other. To induce this, ambuscades were resorted to (Jo. 8.[3, 11]), and surprises (Jg. 7.[15ff.]). David's tactics against the Philistines seem to combine both (2 S. 5.[23f.]). If the battle under the walls, as it might be, of the capital resulted in a decisive victory, frequently the victors pressed in and seized the city. If this was not accomplished, the tedious operations of a SIEGE had to be resorted to. The method most usual was a strict blockade; to make this effective the army went into encampment and surrounded the city with lines of circumvallation. Mining and escalade were attempted, as we see fm. the paintings of Egypt and the sculptures of Assyria, to expedite the slow effects of hunger and hopelessness. The Jews do not seem to have used battering rams, although the Assyrians had them, until Uzziah made "engines invented by cunning men." If the city were captured, then followed sack and slaughter such as we find depicted on the slabs of Kuyunjik and Khorsabad. Sometimes a ransom was paid; in such a case the city sometimes received a garrison, but more frequently gave hostages and promised tribute. In the march of the army wholesale devastation appears to have been the rule. With the Greeks, and still more with the Romans, W. became more scientific; roads were made to facilitate the march of troops, and fortified camps held the conquered peoples in subjection. From their enemies the Jews learned new methods of war. The contest for religious freedom against Antiochus under the leadership of the Maccabæans, and that against the Romans rather more than a couple of centuries later, wd. be carried on in a very different way fm. the conflicts with the Philistines.

WASHING. Apart from the washing necessary for PURIFICATION in cases of ceremonial uncleanness, great importance was attached to the washing of the hands and feet. For the former there was an obvious reason. In eating from a common dish the hands are thrust into the food to convey portions to the eater's mouth. For his own comfort, as well as for that of his companions, his hands must be clean. The custom from time immemorial has been to pour water over the hands for cleansing before eating. This in the time of Jesus had been exalted to the rank of a solemn religious duty. "The Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands diligently (lit. 'with the fist'), eat not, holding the tradition of the elders" (Mk. 7.[3]). In the same category were "the washing of cups, and pots, and brasen vessels, and of tables" (v. 4). These were among the rules to wh. Jesus attached no importance, for the neglect of which He and His disciples incurred the hostility of the Pharisees.

The priests were required to wash their feet before going near to minister at the altar (Ex. 30.[19, 21]). In no other case is it prescribed, and the Pharisees do not seem to have thought it of any religious importance. But the washing of the guest's feet, especially if he had walked far on the dusty highway, was an act of gracious and kindly hospitality seldom omitted. The sand, working under the sandal-straps in the heat, fretted the feet, and the application of cold water was peculiarly delightful and refreshing. To withhold this attention was an obvious mark of disrespect. Abraham provided water for his guests to wash their feet (Gn. 18.[4]), so also did Lot (19.[2]). In Joseph's house his brethren were similarly treated (43.[24]). It was part of the old man's hospitality in Gibeah (Jg. 19.[21]). The duty was usually entrusted to a menial, and it was regarded as a special honour to the guest if performed by the host (1 S. 25.[41]; Lk. 7.[38ff.]). That it was a menial duty lends special significance to the act of Jesus (Jn. 13.[10]), where the distinction is drawn between the washing of the feet or hands from travel-stains or soiling of work, wh. may be often repeated, and the washing of the whole body, wh. is done but once a day.

Pilate washed his hands as a sign of his claim that no guilt attached to him for Jesus' death (Mw. 27.[24]).

WATCHES. The Jews divided the night into three divisions, called 'ashmuroth, "watches," fm. shāmar, "to guard." See Year.

WATCHERS. In Daniel (4.[13]), Nebuchadnezzar, in telling his dream to Daniel, calls the messenger of judgment sent to command that the spreading tree be hewn down, "a watcher" ('īr) and a holy one." In the books of Enoch the watchers usually mean the fallen angels, especially in the first book (e.g. 1.[5], 10.[9, 15], 12.[2, 4]); in the second and older book the watchers are the archangels (e.g. 39.[12, 13], 40.[2]). See Angels.

WATER is one of the first necessities of life. In its absence not only do men and animals perish of thirst, but all trees and plants of the earth wither and die. Wherever it is scarce it is held in peculiar value, guarded and used with especial care.

In Palestine the average annual rainfall is about 30 inches. This, however, is confined to the months from October to April. During the rest of the year the skies are cloudless. Unlike Egypt and Babylon, with their splendid rivers, Palestine was dependent upon "water from heaven." The Jordan, and such other streams as might almost be called rivers, are so low that their waters are available for irrigation only in the valleys they traverse—a limited area in all. The rain would pour down with futile gush round the tawny flanks of the mountains, were it not caught and stored by human industry against the needs of the months of drought. Great cisterns and reservoirs were therefore constructed for its reception. This was made easier by the limestone formation of the mountains, with its many caves and hollows. From these treasuries of refreshment streamlets were conveyed to garden and orchard as occasion required. There are many springs throughout the country; but these too are dependent upon the rainfall, and often run dry before the summer is over. The coming of the rain is therefore expected with great eagerness by the people. If it be delayed beyond the end of October anxieties deepen; and if December be still dry, synagogues and mosques are full of distressed worshippers crying out for rain. Plentiful rains in October and November are taken as the heralds of an abundant harvest. When the first shower falls a thrill of joy seems to run through all nature, as if every living thing drank and were glad. The deep wells dug in the maritime plain, many of them of crusading origin, are the successors of those which in old times made life possible here (Gn. 26.[15ff.], &c.). Where abundant and perennial supplies of water are available, field, garden, and orchard smile in perpetual beauty and fruitfulness.

Great Wheel raising Water for Irrigation

Cities wh. were not built near a river or sea, were supplied by means of Conduits, or aqueducts, bringing water from a distance, and also by Cisterns, or reservoirs, wh. caught the rain from the roofs. It was a matter of importance to conceal the sources from an invading army, and enemies in a country were often sorely put to it in this way (2 K. 3.[19, 25]; 2 Ch. 32.[3f.]).

From the first, water was the natural means to allay thirst, and for this purpose it almost seems to be held as common property. The man who, possessing water, refuses drink to the thirsty, is regarded as a churl (Gn. 24.[17f.], &c.). Often by the wayside, especially near the little white-domed sanctuaries, a jar of water is set, and kept replenished by certain pious souls, for the refreshment of wayfarers. Even the Metāwileh, the most bigoted and exclusive of Eastern sects, will furnish an alien with drink, although they must destroy the vessel from which he drinks, for fear of ceremonial defilement. The same rights, however, cannot be claimed for flocks and herds, because of the amount of the precious liquid they consume. For them it is often necessary to buy water. The order in which the flocks may drink is fixed by unwritten but valid law, and any attempt to override it is apt to breed conflict (Gn. 29.[2ff.], &c.). Wells or cisterns are found now in the open country, now in the mountains, and again in retired spots of the wilderness, he mouth being carefully covered so as to escape the notice of strangers. The movement caused by plunging the buckets down with a cord, to draw water, helps to keep the well fresh. These stores of water belong to the local family, or to the tribe within whose "circuit" they lie, and with them a bargain must be made for its use. The water for use in the tents is drawn and carried exclusively by the women (Gn. 24.[11]; Jn. 4.[7], &c.). When a journey has to be made across the desert, water is drawn and tied up in Bottles of skin. These are strapped on camels: the water oozes slightly through the "bottles," and the consequent evaporation keeps the contents very cool. The water-seller is a familiar figure in the streets of Oriental cities.

Water Carrier

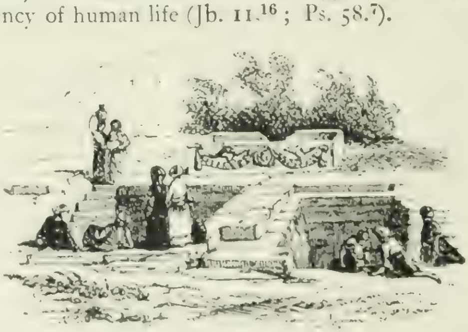
There are many allusions to irrigation in Scrip. (Dt. 11.[10]; Ps. 1.[3]; Ek. 17.[7], &c.). In Egypt and Babylonia this practice was universal, the water being led from the great rivers in canals, whence in little runlets it was conducted to garden and orchard, and even distributed over wide reaches of land. In Palestine the field-crops had usually sufficient moisture from the rain, but fruit and vegetables required artificial supplies. These were derived from great tanks in which the rain water had been stored, or into which the water had been raised by mechanical means from the deep wells. When the water ran along channels made in the soil the flow was guided and controlled by the foot, as it is to this day (Dt. 11.[10]). When, at evening, the sluices are lifted and the water makes music through all the shady avenues of the orange groves, while white-robed figures dart among the greenery, directing the course of the vitalising streams, the scene is both picturesque and beautiful.

Naturally the "living," i.e. the "flowing" water of the spring or stream is more highly valued than that of the cistern. Exhaustless, life-giving, and refreshing, it is a fit symbol of the Divine grace (Jr. 2.[13]; Jn. 4.[10], &c.). But it is also light and easily moved, and so it becomes the symbol of weakness and instability (Gn. 49.[4]; Ek. 21.[7], &c.). At times the rains fall so heavily that all the streams suddenly overflow their banks. Tents unwarily placed in the Jordan valley, together with their occupants, time and again have been swept away by the raging flood of the swiftly swollen river. Such floods stand for the perils which cannot be foreseen (Ps. 32.[6]; Is. 28.[17]). Their swift subsidence suggests the transiency of human life (Jb. 11.[16]; Ps. 58.[7]).



So-called "Fountain of Cana"

WATER OF JEALOUSY. See Bitter Water.

WATER-POTS are mentioned only in Jn. 2.[6f.], 4.[28]. The Greek word is the same (hudria), but in the latter case the jar in wh. the water was carried from well or spring is intended. It is usually of ordinary earthenware, and when full is poised upon the head or shoulder. The water-pots at Cana were much larger, and were filled by means of the smaller jars. These large water-pots are also earthenware, and are often sunk into the earth, in the court, or within the doorway, to keep them cool; and from them water is drawn as required for domestic purposes.

WATERS OF MEROM. See MEROM, WATERS OF.

WATERS OF STRIFE. See MERIBAH.

WATERSPOUTS occurs only in Ps. 42.[7], "Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of Thy water-spouts." RV. renders "cataracts." The word tzinnōr in late Heb. means "spout," "pipe," or "conduit." Its early use is difficult to determine. It is trd. "GUTTER" in 2 S. 5.[8] (RV. "water-course"). Duhm (ad loc.) suggests that the reference may be to the tumultuous waterfalls in a stream swollen by melting snow. Oxf. Heb. Lex. takes "the sound of Thy (water) spouts" as figurative of the sluices of heaven opened.

WAVE OFFERING (Heb. tĕnūphāh), a sacrifice that before being burnt on the altar was waved before the Lord. The offering of these formed part of the ceremony of consecration in the case of Aaron and his sons (Ex. 29.[22-27]). See SACRIFICE.

WAY. This is EV. tr. of many Heb. and Greek words, and in most cases a literal road is intended. The usual Heb. word is derek, from dārak, "to tread." The NT. word most used is the common Greek hodos, "a road." "Way" is, however, used in several secondary senses: e.g. of a journey (Gn. 30.[36], &c.); of direction (2 Ch. 6.[34, 38], &c.); of manner, or usage (Am. 4.[10], &c.); of the course of life (2 Ch. 13.[22], &c.); of moral action and character (Gn. 6.[12], &c.)—sometimes in a good sense (1 S. 12.[23], &c.); frequently in a bad sense (Jg. 2.[19], &c.). God's purpose of grace is a "way," "the way of the Lord" (Is. 40.[3]; cp. Ml. 3.[1]). This phrase recurs in the NT. in relation to Him who had come to fulfil that purpose (Mw. 3.[3]; Mk. 1.[3], &c.). This is the way by wh. men reach peace (Lk. 1.[79]), truth (2 P. 2.[2]), and final salvation (Ac. 16.[17]). Since by Him alone the wandering children of men may find their way back to the great Father, Jesus Himself is "the Way" (Jn. 14.[6]).

One Scriptural use of the term is specially important. It denotes the combination of ideas and practices associated with a particular faith. Thus Amos speaks of "the way of Beersheba" (Am. 8.[14] RV.), referring to the idolatrous worship there. So in the NT. the word takes a technical character, and "the way" becomes a phrase denoting Christianity: e.g. "this way" (Ac. 9.[2]), "that way" (Ac. 19.[9]), "the way which they call heresy" (Ac. 24.[14], &c.). So also the Qor'ān describes Islām as "the way" (eṭ-Ṭarīq), or "the path" (es-Sabīl): or, by way of distinction from all other faiths, it is called "the straight path." The like usage prevails in connection with many religions. See ROADS.

WAYMARK. This is EV. tr. of Heb. tzīyōn, only in Jr. 31.[21], where something like a milestone is evidently intended. The waymarks are associated with "guide-posts" (RV.) pointing the direction over the desert. In 2 K. 23.[1] it clearly denotes a monument (RV.). In Ek. 39.[15] it is a sign-post.

WEALTH (Heb. hōn, ḥayil, "might"; ṭōb, "good"; koaḥ, "strength"; nĕkāsīm, "things stored"; 'ōsher, "riches"; rĕkūsh, "substance"). The Mosaic law discouraged the accumulation of W. in the hands of individuals; Israel was to be an agricultural people, owning the fields they tilled. These fields cd. not be alienated, except temporarily; large estates cd. not be acquired. Like the later agrarian laws of Rome, those of Israel were evaded. Among those who on the E. of Jordan still maintained the nomadic habit, wealth meant large herds of camels and oxen, and numerous flocks of sheep and goats. On the west, where the country was more settled, wealth meant grain stored in pits. In the time of the kings there was the "adding of field to field" (Is. 5.[8]). Slaves do not seem to have been numerous enough to be a generally recognised element of wealth. Altho' usury was forbidden, many lent at interest, as proved by the commendation of those who had not done so. Gold and jewels, also probably carpets and garments, formed stores of wealth. The appropriation of the land by foreigners during the Exile rendered post-exilic application of the law impossible; estates became larger and W. accumulated. In Herodian times the rich became very rich and the poor very poor. W. was almost necessarily the product of wrong; the publicans, the priests, and the members and dependents of the Herodian family were most flagrant sinners. It is this that gives point to our Lord's denunciations of W. and its possessors.

WEAPONS. Primitive weapons were necessarily clubs for hand-to-hand conflict, and stones for throwing at a distant enemy. By the time Israel had become a nation the primitive stage had long been passed. For hand-to-hand struggle the club —"maul," AV. (Heb. mapītz)—though used, was greatly superseded by the SWORD (Heb. ḥereb). The sword of the Egyptians wh. appears on the monuments and wall paintings, from its form must have been mainly used for cutting; a dagger is also depicted, of such length that it may be called a sword. With the Assyrians the sword is always a subsidiary weapon; it is short, and suitable for either cut or thrust. With the Israelites the sword was mainly for thrusting (Jg. 9.[54]; 1 S. 31.[4]); however, the use of the term "edge (peh, "mouth") of the sword" implies the blade. The battle-axe combined the sharp edge of the sword with the weight of the club. This weapon was used both by Egyptians and Assyrians, but we have no reference to it in Scripture. For conflict with a foe at some distance were slings (qela'), darts or javelins (shēlah, shebēt), bow (qesheth), and arrows (ḥetz): the bows were sometimes made of bronze (steel). All these are found in the monuments of Egypt and Assyria. A battle was opened by the discharge of these missiles before the hand-to-hand struggle began. Another weapon there was, universal in ancient warfare, the spear (ḥanīth, kīdōn); it may be said to combine weapons for near and distant conflict. It prevented the foeman fm. coming so near as to make his personal strength an element in the struggle; moreover the Homeric warriors hurled their spears at their opponents. The Assyrians used them simply for thrusting, as may be seen in the various battle scenes depicted in the monuments. While the Egyptians seem to have used spears in the same way, several of the foreign races are exhibited as carrying two spears, almost a certain sign that they were intended for missiles. They never realised the power of the "hedge of spears"; this was left to be evolved by the Greeks. In a sense the CHARIOT was a W., especially when scythe-blades were attached to the axles of the wheels. For defensive weapons see ARMOUR, also SHIELD, &c. For more powerful and complex weapons used in the siege and defence of cities see BATTERING-RAM, ENGINE, &c.

DAGGER AND SHEATH

WEASEL (Heb. ḥōled), mentioned as an unclean animal in Lv. 11.[29] along with the MOUSE and the TORTOISE. The EV. have followed in this rendering the LXX, Vlg., and Psh. Etymology wd. suggest "mole," or "rat," fm. the fact that this is the meaning of khuld in Arb. Both animals are fairly common in Pal.; the evidence of the versions is, however, preponderant.

WEAVING (Heb. 'ārag). Although the art of weaving is not reflected in Scripture to anything like the extent to which agriculture, or even carpentry and smith-work are, it was practised in Palestine as widely as any of these. It was known in Egyptian times long prior to Israelitish history. The products of the loom in Palestine never acquired such a reputation as those of Egypt, Phœnicia, and Persia. While the spinning was all done by the women at home, and also the greater part of the weaving (Pr. 31., 2 K. 23.[7]), men were also employed in weaving, probably at the finer qualities of textiles, as tapestries (Ex. 35.[35]), &c. By the time of Christ the finest fabrics were imported. There was a guild of weavers whose occupation in later days was associated with those of the pastry-cook, the hairdresser, and the perfumer, in the contempt of the rabbis. This was due partly to the fact that it, along with the others, was regarded as an unworthy concession to foreign luxurious habits, and partly to the fact that as an occupation it brought men so much into contact with women, which the rabbis regarded as undesirable. Flax was worked up into different qualities of linen, which is mentioned as having been largely used in the coverings of the Tabernacle and the dress of the priests, that of the High Priest being woven in one piece as Christ's was (Jos. Ant. III. vii. 4). Woollen fabrics were also woven, being worn chiefly by the wealthy (Mw. 6.[19], 11.[8]; Js. 5.[2]). Goats' hair, when woven, was used chiefly as outer garments by the peasants, and as tent-coverings (Ac. 18.[3]). It was also made into sackcloth. Camels' hair was also woven (Mw. 3.[4]; Mk. 1.[6]). The interweaving of wool and linen was forbidden by the Mosaic law (Lev. 19.[19]; Dt. 22.[11]). The loom was, as it still is, very simple in construction. "Two upright posts are fixed in the ground, which hold the roller to which the threads of the warp are fastened, and upon which the cloth is wound as it is woven. The threads of the warp are carried upward towards the ceiling at the other end of the room, and pass over rollers and are gathered in hanks and weighted to keep them taut. The different sets are kept apart by reeds. The weaver sits at the cloth-roller and works the shuttle while the healds are worked by treadles" (HDB. s.v.). Different parts of the loom mentioned in Scripture are the beam or cloth-roller (1 S. 17.[7]; 2 S. 21.[19]; 1 Ch. 11.[23], 20.[5]), the pin for beating the woof together to form a firm texture (Jg. 16.[14]), the shuttle (Jb. 7.[6]), which by its entrance, rapid flight through the threads of the warp, and exit, suggests the shortness of life, while the sharp cutting of the threads suggests the sharpness and finality of death (Is. 38.[12]). RV. renders "embroider" (Ex. 28.[39]) by "weave in chequer-work," and "wrap up" (Mi. 7.[3]) by "weave together."

GEORGE P. WALLACE.

WEDDING. See MARRIAGE.

WEDGE (Heb. lāshōn, lit. "tongue") is the EV. term applied to the piece of gold coveted by Achan (Jo. 7.[21, 24]). See illustration to article ACHAN.

WEEDS. The Heb. ṣūph is so rendered only in Jh. 2.[5], where clearly it denotes the seaweed that clings round a drowning man. Elsewhere it refers to reeds or rushes (Ex. 2.[3, 5], &c.), or to the arms of the RED SEA, lit. "Sea of reeds" (Ex. 10.[19]; 1 K. 9.[26], &c.).

WEEK, a period usually of seven days; sometimes of as many years (Gn. 29.[27]). See Year.

WEEKS, FEAST OF. See Pentecost.

WEEPING. See Mourning.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. (1) Weights.—The Hebrews never seem to have had one system of weights, which they adopted to the exclusion of others. Babylonian, Syrian, and Phœnician systems were all used by them. It has thus been necessary for scholars (1) to determine the present equivalents of the weights of these different nations; (2) to settle if possible which of the systems is referred to in any passage of the Old Testament where weights are mentioned. In the former department of study much has been done, both in the careful study of the Old Testament itself, of Josephus, and of the Mishnah, and in the discovery and publishing of large numbers of Babylonian and Assyrian tablets, from which it has become possible with some degree of certainty to determine the value of the weights in use. A few actual stone weights have been found in Babylonia and in Palestine itself, and though they are naturally worn by time, are of use by comparison with the information derived from written records.

Egyptian Weighing Rings of Metal, with Weights in form of Animals

The chief characteristic of the Babylonian system is that it is sexagesimal, i.e. founded on the number 60 (like our division of the hour into 60 minutes, each of 60 seconds). The unit was the mana (Heb. maneh). It was composed of 60 shekels, while 60 manas made a talent. There was a double standard, the mana, &c., in the heavy standard being twice the weight of the corresponding denomination in the light standard. In addition to these there was apparently a government standard, in which the weights, both heavy and light, were increased by a twentieth.

From weights of an early period (B.C. 3000–2500) now extant the heavy mana is estimated to have been equivalent to 15,160 grains (about $2\frac{1}{6}$ lbs), the light mana to 7580 grains, while the government manas were about 16,000 and 8000 grains respectively. The heavy shekel was thus $252\frac{2}{3}$ grains and the light $126\frac{1}{3}$. It was probably this scale that passed by Babylonian conquests and influence to many countries in the west, where it was adopted with various modifications. It is evidently the scale referred to in 2 K. 18.[14], where the weight of gold agrees with that given in the Assyrian account of the same event (see Schrader, COT., on this passage). On the other hand the system generally used in Syria and Palestine seems to have been the result of a blending of the sexagesimal of Babylonia with the decimal used in Egypt. From Egyptian tribute lists of c. B.C. 1500, and from certain stone weights (see below) found in Palestine, it seems that the heavy shekel of this scale (used in Palestine from c. B.C. 1600–600) weighed 320 grains, the light 160, and that 50 of these went to the maneh, and 60 manehs to the talent. The maneh of 16,000 grains was thus the same as the Babylonian government mana.

The enterprise of Phœnician traders led to the introduction into Palestine at a very early date of yet another system of weights, that of the Phœnicians. This seems to have remained in use after the others had been given up. In it the heavy shekel weighed $224\frac{1}{2}$ grains, the light $112\frac{1}{4}$ grains. The full scale was—

50 shekels = 1 maneh.
60 manehs = 1 talent.

This is the system used in the P. writings of the Pentateuch (Ex. 38.[24ff.], 30.[23f.], 38.[29], &c.). The shekel of the sanctuary (Lv. 27.[25]) was of this system (see Money).

Besides the three weights mentioned above, two others occur in the Old Testament, viz. (1) the gerah (Ex. 30.[13]; Lv. 27.[25]; Nu. 3.[47], 18.[16]; Ek. 45.[12]), only in the P. writings and Ezekiel, is defined as a twentieth of a shekel; and (2) the beka (Gn. 24.[22]; Ex. 38.[26]), a half-shekel. In the New Testament the litra or "pound" (Jn. 12.[3], 19.[39]) weighed 12 ounces.

The instruments used in weighing were (1) the balance (Am. 8.[5]; Lv. 19.[36], &c.); (2) the weights (sometimes carried in a wallet, Dt. 25.[13]), which were of stone, the Hebrew word for "stone" being constantly used for a "weight" (2 S. 14.[6]; Dt. 25.[13], &c.). Four of these stone weights discovered in Palestine are described in PEFQ., 1890, 1893, 1894, and 1899.

(2) Lineal Measures.—The Hebrews, like many other peoples, measured comparatively small objects by comparing their length with parts of the body, especially with the hand and fore-arm. The following occur in the Old Testament: the finger or digit (Jr. 52.[31]), the palm or hand breadth (1 K. 7.[26]; Ex. 40.[5], &c.), the span (1 S. 17.[4]), the cubit, i.e. the length of the arm from the elbow to the tips of the fingers. Longer measurements were expressed by a "step" (1 S. 20.[3]) or a "pace" (2 S. 6.[13]), still longer by such terms as a "bowshot" (Gn. 21.[16]) or "a stone's cast" (Lk. 22.[41]).

All these were approximate measurements only originally, and might vary in actual length. It was necessary to take one of them as a unit, give it a fixed measurement, and bring the others in relation to it. The unit of the Hebrews seems to have been the cubit. Two cubits, however, were known in the time of Ezekiel: the ordinary one and that used by Ezekiel in his measurements for the Temple. The latter was one hand-breadth longer than the former, and as Ezekiel is trying to restore the proportions of Solomon's Temple, it is likely that his special cubit was a restoration of the one in actual use earlier in Palestine, the shorter one, in common use in Ezekiel's time, being a later introduction. This latter consisted of two spans; each span was of three palms (or hand-breadths), while each palm was naturally of four digits. Another measurement in Ezekiel was the reed, consisting of six cubits. Various estimates have been made by modern writers of the exact length of a cubit. Some have put it as low as 16 inches, some as high as 25.2 inches. Professor A. R. S. Kennedy (HDB. iv. 906ff.) has carefully compared the evidence of the Siloam inscription, of Josephus, and of the Mishnah with that derived from Egyptian monuments, and has shown it to be most probable that the cubit of the Hebrews was of Egyptian origin and measured $17\frac{2}{3}$ inches, but in New Testament times had been made equal to the Greek cubit of $17\frac{1}{2}$ inches.

The Hebrew table was thus :—

1 digit = c. $\frac{3}{4}$ in.
4 digits = 1 palm = c. 3 in.
3 palms = 1 span = c. 9 in.
2 spans = 1 cubit (ordinary in Ezekiel's time) = c. 18 in.
2 spans + 1 palm = 1 cubit (special cubit of Ezekiel) = c. 21 in.
6 cubits = 1 reed (ordinary) = c. 9 ft.; (special) = c. 10 ft. 6 in.

Two instruments of measuring are mentioned in the Old Testament: the reed (Ek. 40.[3]) and the line or thread (Jr. 31.[39]; Zc. 2.[1]).

The measures in the New Testament are the cubit (see above), the furlong (or stadion), of 600 Greek feet or 194 English yards, and the mile of 5000 Roman feet or 1618 English yards. The fathom in Ac. 27.[28] measured about 6 feet.

(3) Surface Measures.—The Hebrews had two ways of expressing the measurement of land-areas, neither of them exactly fixed. The word translated "acre" in Is. 5.[10] is really "yoke," and indicates as much land as could be ploughed by a yoke of oxen in one day. The Romans, who adopted this same method of measuring land, fixed the amount by law at c. 3016 sq. yards. We have no indication in the OT. that the Hebrews fixed the amount of the "acre" exactly, but as the Egyptian unit was a square of 100 royal cubits on each side, it is probable that the Hebrew acre was about the same, i.e. about half an English acre. The other method of land measurement was according to the amount of seed required to sow it (cp. Lv. 27.[16], and so probably 1 K. 18.[32]).

In some cases area is denoted by the words "four square," the length of two sides being given (Ex. 27., 28.[16], &c.).

(4) Measures of Capacity.—These are either of dry measure or liquid measure.

The scale for dry measure according to the OT. is :—

6 kabs = 1 seah (= the "measure" of Mw. 13.[33], &c.).
3 seahs = 1 ephah.
10 ephahs = 1 homer (later called a kor).

The tenth part of an ephah was called an "omer" or a "tenth."

The scale for liquid measure is :—

12 logs = 1 hin.
6 hins = 1 bath.

According to Ek. 45.[11] the ephah and the bath were identical. Josephus identifies the log with the Greek-Roman sextarius, i.e. .99 pints, so that the ephah or bath contained 71.28 pints (nearly 9 gallons), or about 1 bushel. From this the equivalents of the other measures can easily be deduced. But comparison with the Babylonian, Egyptian, and Phœnician measures makes it probable that in earlier times these measures were not so large, but that the ephah or bath then contained only 65 pints.

The only new measures of capacity that occur in the NT. are the chœnix = 2 pints (Rv. 6.[6]), used of wheat, and the firkin = 72 pints (Jn. 2.[6]), used of liquids. The "pot" in Mk. 7.[4, 8] is a pint measure, the "bushel" in Mw. 5.[15], &c., is a household vessel holding a seah. G. W. Thatcher.

WELL. The most usual Heb. word is bĕ'ēr, lit. "cistern" or "pit." Such were the wells at Beer-lahai-roi (Gn. 16.[14]), and those digged by Isaac (Gn. 21.[30], &c.). They might, however, contain "living water" from a spring in the bottom (26.[19]). Bōr, from the same root, also signifies "cistern" or "pit." The well at Bethlehem is so called (2 S. 23.[15], &c.), and the wells digged in the vineyards (Ne. 9.[25]). Bĕ'ēr is used of the slime-pits in the vale of Siddim (Gn. 14.[10]); and fig. of the grave (Ps. 55.[23]), and of the strange woman (Pr. 23.[27]). The words mā'yān and 'āyin denote lit. "spring" or "fountain" (Jo. 28.[15], &c.; Gn. 24.[13], &c.). In the NT. the Gr. pēgē, "fountain" (Jn. 4.[14]; 2 P. 2.[17]), is also applied to the well of Jacob (Jn. 4.[6]), elsewhere called phrear, "pit" (vv. 11f.). It may be that, as some have affirmed, there was a spring in the bottom of the well. See Jacob's Well.

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the wells to the pastoral peoples of Palestine and Arabia. In most of the valley bottoms water may be reached by patient digging; and in the maritime plain especially, supplies are abundant at no great depth. Not many wells have been dug during recent centuries, but the work of the ancients was excellent, and their successors enjoy its fruits to-day. The wells at Beersheba furnish illustrations, and Doughty (Arabia Deserta, passim) shows that the same is true throughout Arabia. It was one of the attractions of Palestine to the Israelites, that wells were already dug which should pass into their possession (Dt. 6.[11]).

The well mouth may be cut in the rock, or it may be a flat stone, with a hole of 12 in. to 15 in. diameter piercing it. Through this the nomads lower the bucket, or daluw, attached to a cord, and draw up the water. The opening at the mouth is often deeply scored with the friction of these cords through the long years. The water in a well which fills by percolation is often exhausted at a watering of the camels or flocks; but in the course of a few hours supplies are again available. The mouth is covered by a great stone, often difficult to move (Gn. 29.[2ff.]). When the well collects only the surface water it may be soon exhausted. Then it may be used for a variety of purposes. Into such a "pit" Joseph was let down (Gn. 37.[22]). One was used for concealment (2 S. 17.[18ff.]), and in such a "pit" Jeremiah was imprisoned.

As for the law of the well, "Property in water is older and more important than property in land. In nomadic Arabia there is no property strictly so called in desert pastures, but certain families or tribes hold the watering-places, without which the right of pasture is useless. Or, again, if a man digs a well he has a preferential right to water his camels at it before other camels are admitted; and he has an absolute right to prevent others from using the water for agricultural purposes unless they buy it from him. This is Moslem law; but it is broadly in accordance with old Arabian custom, and indeed with general Semitic custom, as appears from many passages of the OT. (Gn. 21.[25ff.], 26.[17ff.]; Jg. 1.[15]; joint ownership in a well, Gn. 29.[8]; Ex. 2.[16])" (Robertson Smith, RS.[2], 104f.). For ideas of sacredness attaching to water, and to particular spots where water is found, see RS.[2], by index.

WEN. The Heb. word occurs only once, in the fem. sing. yabbeleth (Lv. 22.[22]), and denotes "a running sore or ulcer."

WENCH occurs only in AV. for Heb. shiphhāh in 2 S. 17.[17] (RV. "maid-servant"). "Maid," "maid-servant," and "hand-maid" are the usual renderings. It is applied to a maidservant who is her master's concubine (Gn. 16.[2], &c.).

WHALE (Heb. tan, tannin). Each of the Heb. words so tr. is generally rendered "dragon" or "serpent": only in one case in regard to the first word and twice in regard to the second the tr. is W. In the case of the creature that swallowed Jonah it is called a "great fish," wh. is tr. in LXX kētos; so in Mw. 12.[40]. The sperm W. wd. be quite capable of swallowing a man whole; these have sometimes found their way into the Mediterranean. The shark is more frequently found, sometimes as large as 30 feet long. See Jonah.

WHEAT was cultivated from very early times in Egypt and Babylonia. To the rich plains of Mesopotamia its origin has by some been assigned. It was also grown in Pal. in ancient times (Dt. 8.[8]). In Gn. 30.[14] the wheat harvest marks a season of the year. Wheat was doubtless the "corn" wh. the sons of Jacob went down to Egp. to buy. In the NT. the Gr. sitōs is always trd. "wheat." The term has a more general significance, and might be rendered "corn," as covering more than the one cereal. But wheat was the most common, so we may take it as practically correct.

Several varieties of wheat (bearded) are still grown in Palestine. The Ḥaurān is the principal wheat-bearing district. The plain is of marvellous fertility, and yields abundantly. Throughout the country, however, more barley than wheat is grown. Barley is sown first, sometimes as early as November, if the rains have been satisfactory; and the wheat immediately afterwards. The wheat harvest is general about the end of May, and the yield of a hundredfold is not unknown to-day. The flour of wheat is used mainly for bread, only the very poor using barley. Wheat is also boiled, keeping the grain whole, and dried, to make what is called burghul. This again is often mixed with pieces of meat and pounded in a mortar (Pr. 27.[22]) to make the dish known as kibbeh. "The finest of the wheat" (Ps. 81.[16], 147.[14]; EVm. "fat of wheat"), and "the fat kidneys of the wheat" (Dt. 32.[14]), refer to the choice flour of the wheat.

WHEEL. (1) Heb. 'obnayim (Jr. 18.[3]), lit. "turnings," is the potter's wheel (see Potter). (2) Heb. 'ōphān is used of chariot wheels (Ex. 14.[25], &c.)—see Chariot; of the wheels of the threshing waggon (Is. 28.[27]); of the wheels in Ezekiel's vision (Ek. 1.[15], &c.); of the brazen wheels which supported the bases of the lavers in Solomon's Temple (1 K. 7.[30], &c.). Of these last it is said, "The work of the wheels was like the work of a chariot wheel; their axletrees, and their felloes, and their spokes, and their naves, were all molten" (1 K. 7.[33] RV.).

Egyptian Cart with Four Wheels

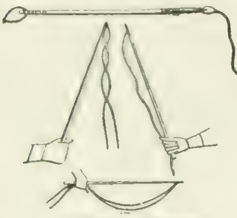
The wheel may have been cast in a single piece; but the parts may have been cast separately and fitted together in the workshop. (3) Galgal, "wheel," or "whirlwind," used of the wheel of a war-chariot (Is. 5.[28], &c.); of the wheel at a well's mouth, over which the cord is passed to lower and raise the bucket (Ec. 12.[6]); also of the wheels in Ezekiel's vision (Ek. 10.[2], &c.). The figure of the wheels may have been suggested to the prophet by certain striking phenomena which, after sunset, are sometimes witnessed from the plains of Mesopotamia, in the western sky.



EGYPTIAN WHIPS

WHIP. See SCOURGE, SCORPION.

WHIRLWIND in EV. stands for two Heb. words. (1) Ṣūphah (from ṣūph, "to come to an end") is lit. "a wind that makes an end," i.e. a destructive wind, sweeping everything before it (Pr. 1.[27]; Ho. 8.[7], &c.). Sometimes (Jb. 21.[18], &c.) it is rendered "storm." (2) Ṣa'ar, or ṣĕ'ārāh (from ṣā'ar, "to rage, or move tempestuously"), is a tempest or storm-wind that agitates and throws into confusion everything in its path. While neither word, therefore, of necessity means "whirlwind," it is clear from the context in several passages that this is intended (Is. 5.[28]; 2 K. 2.[1], &c.). Moving round its axis with great velocity, it draws up dust, straw, and other light and movable things, forming the appearance of a gigantic column. As it gyrates, it hurries over the landscape, leaving a track of desolation behind it. It sucks up the water it encounters, raising it to a great height, and then the bursting of the column forms the water-spout. The great figure of the whirlwind is regarded with dread, not only because of the destruction it works, but also because of the superstitious ideas that are associated with it. The dark whirling terror is supposed to be the abode of evil spirits. It is worthy of note that from the whirlwind Job heard the voice of God (Jb. 38.[1], &c.). It was a whirlwind that caught Elijah away from earth (2 K. 2.[1, 11]). It is used as a figure for any resistless destroying agency (Is. 40.[24]; Jr. 23.[19], &c.).

WHITE. See COLOUR. W. is the symbol of joy (Ec. 9.[8]), the symbol of purity (Is. 1.[18]); so too in RV. e.g. 3.[4].

WHITE OF AN EGG. The word trd. "white" (Jb. 6.[6]) is lit. "juice," or "slime." It is used in 1 S. 21.[13] for "spittle." "Slime of the yolk" could only mean "white of egg," but some scholars think the insipid juice of a plant, possibly the common purslam, may be intended.

WIDOW. The support of the widow naturally devolved upon her family; the main responsibility being upon the first-born, who received a double share of his father's property, no doubt with this in view. She was entitled to a portion of the tithe of the third year (Dt. 14.[29], 26.[12]). For her also consideration was to be shown in the matter of the gleaning (Dt. 24.[19ff.]). She also participated in the sacrificial meals (Dt. 16.[11, 14], &c.). In later times we find that she received a share of spoil taken in war (2 M. 8.[28, 30]). God Himself is the special guardian and judge of the widow (Dt. 10.[18]; Ps. 68.[5], 146.[9], &c.). She was therefore to be treated with kindness and respect (Ex. 22.[22], &c.). Oppression or violence done to a widow covers a man with opprobrium and exposes him to a curse (Dt. 27.[19]; Jb. 22.[9]; Mw. 23.[14], &c.). A blessing is promised to those who treat her kindly (Jr. 7.[6], &c.). Her garments might not be taken in pledge (Dt. 24.[17]).

If a widow were left childless, her husband's brother, or his next kinsman, was under obligation to marry her. Beyond this, she was free to marry whom she would. Only the High Priest might not marry a widow (Lv. 21.[14]); a provision applied by Ezekiel to the common priests (44.[22]).

Widows first appear in the NT. in connection with the daily distribution of relief; and the complaints of the Hellenist widows that those of the Hebrews got more than their share, led to the appointment of special officers to attend to this service (Ac. 6.[1ff.]). The maintenance of the widows seems to have been regarded as part of the regular responsibility of the early Church. That it was sometimes burdensome we may well believe. Perhaps we may infer from the directions on the subject given by St. Paul in 1 Tm. 5. that it had been found necessary to keep a carefully prepared list of the most deserving cases, whom the Church would recognise as entitled to support at its hands. No one was to be "enrolled as a widow" (v. 9 RV.) unless she were sixty years of age, had been the wife of one man, and had led a useful and charitable life. These were "widows indeed" (v. 3), who had no near relatives to whom they might look for maintenance. Although this rule was adopted, no doubt individual cases of special need among younger widows might be attended to. The reason for refusing younger widows is their reputation for instability. He would have them to marry again (v. 14 RV.). All who could support their widowed relatives were in honour bound to do so, that the Church might be able to attend to those who were widows indeed (v. 16).

It has been thought by some that this enrolment does not point to a list of pensioners, but rather to a roll of such widows as had so won the respect and confidence of the Church that they might be called on to take some definite share in its work. But it would be precarious to identify this with the order of "widows" of whom so much is heard in immediately succeeding days.

WIFE. See FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERINGS. See EXODUS.

WILDERNESS, DESERT. (1) The Heb. word midbār, which these terms commonly represent, is practically equivalent to the Arabic barrīyeh, which applies to all that lies beyond the settled and cultivated land; the wide spaces where the nomads rove, and the beasts of the wilds take their freedom. Spring covers the desert with a garment of green, and the flocks wander far in enjoyment of fresh pastures. With the advance of summer it becomes very bare and brown, and only the wisdom of the shepherd can guide his charges to the green patches, where hidden waters preserve the sweet grass, or the perennial spring breaks the monotony. Desert shrubs and occasional trees are found, beyond the confines of the sand; and prickly plants in great numbers, which furnish food especially for the camel. Of the "wild beasts" we hear in Mk. 1.[13] (cp. Is. 13.[21], &c.). Mention is also made of the owl (Ps. 102.[6]), the ostrich (L. 4.[3]), and the pelican (Ps. 102.[6]), of the wild ass (Jr. 2.[24], 25.[24]), the fox (Ek. 13.[4]), and the dragon (Ml. 1.[3], RV. "jackal").

The great wilderness S. of Palestine is often mentioned in connection with the wanderings of Israel. The various divisions are known by local names: e.g. the Wilderness of Sin, the W. of Shur, the W. of Kadesh, &c. It is called to this day Bādiyet et-Tīh, "Waste of the Wandering." The wilderness of DAMASCUS (1 K. 19.[15]) is the Syrian desert on the edge of which that city stands. Its rolling sandy breadths, lying between Palestine and the Euphrates, are referred to in Is. 40.[3]; Ek. 20.[35]; 1 Ch. 5.[9]; and different parts of the same desert as it stretches southward along the eastern boundary of Palestine in Nu. 21.[11, 13, 23]; Jg. 11.[22]. The wilderness of JUDAH (Jo. 15.[61]; Jg. 1.[16], &c.) comprised the whole of the Judæan uplands sloping towards the Dead Sea. The name covered districts of varied character. There were pasture lands, in which the interests of the flockmasters made necessary towers for protection, and cisterns for the watering of the cattle (2 Ch. 26.[10]). David's brother accused him of leaving uncared-for the "few sheep in the wilderness" (1 S. 17.[28]). Nabal pastured with his flocks the neighbourhood of Carmel (ib. 25.). Amos was a shepherd in the uplands near Tekoa (Am. 1.[1]). There are grim and savage tracts, with great caves, which furnish a refuge for the fugitive, and secure retreat for lawlessness (1 S. 24., 26.; 1 M. 2.[28f.], &c.). Towns are mentioned within its boundaries, where water made their existence possible (Jo. 15.[61], &c.). Then there are the tracts of utterly bare and desolate rock and mountain slope. The different parts of the wilderness are called by the names of the towns which they adjoined—the W. of Beersheba (Gn. 21.[14]); the W. of En-Gedi (1 S. 24.[1]); the W. of Maon (1 S. 23.[24f.]); the W. of Ziph (1 S. 23.[14], &c.). This also applies to its extension northward, where we have the W. of Beth-aven (Jo. 18.[12]), the W. of Gibeon (2 S. 2.[24]), &c.

Besides the usual word midbār, we may note (2) ḥorbāh, which indicates a dry, uninhabitable land. It is also used for ruins, and the desolation which they mark (Ek. 5.[14], "desolation," RV.; cp. Arab. kharāb, "ruin," "devastation"). (3) 'Arābāh, "a desert plain, or steppe." It is applied to the whole bottom of the Jordan valley from Chinneroth to the Dead Sea (Dt. 1.[7], &c.), now el-Ghōr, "the depression." But the name Wādy el-'Arabah still applies to the great depression between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of 'Aqaba. The plural 'arābōth is applied to particular level stretches within the area: e.g. 'arĕbōth (AV. "plains") of Moab (Nu. 22.[1]), and of Jericho (Jo. 5.[10])—see ARABAH. (4) Yĕshīmōn, "waste," "wilderness," denotes savage, forbidding tracts, waterless and tenantless but for wild beasts, the "howling wilderness" (Dt. 32.[10]). It is applied to the dreary region NE. of the Dead Sea (Nu. 21.[20], &c.), in wh. is Beth-Jeshimoth (Nu. 33.[49]); to the wilderness of the wanderings (Dt. 32.[10], &c.); to the district frequented by David as a fugitive from Saul (1 S. 23.[19], &c.), prob. the tracts close to the Dea Sea along its W. shore; and to the desert between the Euphrates and Pal. (Is. 43.[19], &c.). (5) Tzīyyah, lit. "dryness" or "drought," is at times represented in AV. by "wilderness" (Jb. 30.[3], RV. "dry ground"), "dry ground" (Ps. 107.[35], &c.). Its literal equivalent, "drought," stands in EV. (Jb. 24.[19], &c.).

WILD OLIVE. See OLIVE.

WILD OX. See UNICORN.

WILLOW TREE. The Heb. word tzaphtzāphāh occurs only once, in Ek. 17.[5], a highly poetical and imaginative passage. It is the Heb. equivalent of the Arabic ṣafṣāf, a generic term covering the various species of willow found in Palestine. The Arabic gharab is the equivalent of the Heb. 'arābāh, which may mean "poplar," but also "willow," especially "the weeping willow," Salix Babylonica, which is found largely near the sea coast. Some think the Heb. word denotes the white poplar, Populus Euphratica. Both poplar and willow abound along the water-courses in the East, with which in Scrip. the 'arābāh is associated. "Willows of the brook"—i.e. of the valley with a water-course in it—were used to make the booths at the Feast of Tabernacles (Lv. 23.[40]). They form a shade for the hippopotamus (Jb. 40.[22]). The harps of the mourners in Babylon were hung on willow trees by the rivers (Ps. 137.[2]). See also Is. 15.[7], 44.[4].

Tristram has suggested that instead of "willows" poss. we should read "oleanders." The oleander is certainly very plentiful along the water-courses and round the Sea of Galilee, and very beautiful is the flush of bright colour it spreads in its season. But the suggestion is improbable. In many districts to-day the natives plant the willow. It grows swiftly, and requires little attention. It is used extensively for making baskets and other wattled work.

WILLOWS, THE BROOK OF THE (Heb. naḥal hā-'arābīm), is evidently a wady in Moab (Is. 15.[7]). Wetzstein would identify it with Wādy el-Aḥsā, which forms the boundary of the territory of Moab—the lower reaches of the valley, because of the frequency of the Populus Euphratica. De Lunyes points to Wādy ed-Derā'a, at the mouth of Wādy Kerak. It is to be noted that another traveller (Irby) found here a local name, Wādy eṣ-Ṣafṣāf, "Wady of the willows." See Buhl, GAP. 124.

WIMPLE is AV. tr. of miṭpaḥath in Is. 3.[22] (plural miṭpāḥōth, RV. "shawls"). In Ru. 3.[15], AV. trs. "vail," RV. "mantle." The word is from the root tāphaḥ, "to spread out," "to abound." "Cloak" (Oxf. Heb. Lex.) is perhaps the best translation.

WIND. The Hebrews knew nothing of our exact definition of directions. Anywhere on the southern horizon between, roughly, SE. and SW. was for them south; and similarly with the others. The winds, therefore, are spoken of only as blowing from the cardinal points of the compass. The actual direction in each case, where it is possible, must be fixed by other considerations. The winds from the south are usually warm and pleasant, but the north winds, blowing from the snows of Lebanon and Hermon, are cold. From the great sea in the west the winds come laden with moisture. Those from the eastern deserts are dry and often laden with sand. During the rainy season west and south-west winds prevail. The south-west is popularly known as Bab esh-Shitta, "the gateway of the rain." When the rains are over the northerly winds set in, and during the months of summer they help to moderate the fierceness of the heat. In September, and until the rains begin, easterly winds are common. The sharqīyeh, or east wind, dry and hot as it is, makes every living thing shrink. The very furniture twists and cracks in its burning breath, and human beings are stricken with utter weariness. Earlier in the year the east wind is a dreaded visitant: with its withering power a few hours suffice to blight the beauty, and with it many hopes, of a country side.

In the evening often a breeze springs up from the Sea of Galilee, to refresh the surrounding region. Through all the summer the dawn brings a soft breath from the western sea, fanning all the seaward face of the Central Range. At sunset the cooling air moves down the slopes; and the higher strata from the sea drift towards the uplands, bearing wealth of precious moisture on their broad bosoms. Hence come the dews that lie so thick in the Palestinian morning, refreshing all things that live.

Storm-winds often burst with great sudd nness and fury over the Sea of Galilee. The sailors of to-day encounter the very trials with which the disciples of our Lord were familiar (Mk. 4.[37], &c.). The "tempestuous wind which is called Euraquilo" (Ac. 27.[14]), which beat down from the island of Crete and caught the ship in which St. Paul was sailing, is the well-known "Levanter," as the sailors in the Eastern Mediterranean call it, which blows from the ENE.

WINDOW is the EV. tr. of several Heb. words. (1) 'Arubbāh, "a lattice" or "sluice." This word is used for the opening through which smoke escapes (Ho. 13.[3], EV. "chimney"); for the openings of a dovecote (Is. 60.[8]); and metaphorically of eyes (Ec. 12.[3]), perhaps as latticed by the eyelashes. In other places it is used of the sluices in heaven, through which, when opened by God, the rains rush down, to devastate (Gn. 7.[11], &c.) or to fertilise (2 K. 7.[2], &c.). In this latter sense it is used fig. of blessing (Ml. 3.[10]). (2) Ḥalōn. This is the word commonly employed for the window of a house. The Eastern window is usually just an aperture in the wall, unglazed, but closed with a lattice. The windows generally open on the court round which the house is built, but one or two may command a view of the street. As they are invariably latticed it is possible for one to see without being seen (Jg. 5.[28]; 2 S. 6.[16], &c.). Frequently, houses which are built on the city wall have projecting windows, whence the surrounding country may be observed. Such windows formed means of escape for men who were hard pressed, as, for example, the spies at Jericho (Jo. 2.[15]), and St. Paul at Damascus (2 Cor. 11.[33]); possibly also for David (1 S. 19.[12]). People sat in the window for coolness, but with the lattice open this was dangerous (Ac. 20.[9]).

In the village houses to-day there is frequently no window. When the family are all housed, with cattle in the lower part of the dwelling, and an oil lamp in a niche emitting its peculiar odour, the atmosphere is often terrible. Under conditions like these the present writer once asked a peasant woman in the plain of Sharon why they had no "window" in the house. In amazement she replied, "Put a window in the wall to help the robbers!" With their slender means of subsistence they live in perpetual dread of marauders, who, without any assistance, too easily dig through their mud-built walls.

(3) Tzohar (Gn. 6.[16]), prob. rather "roof" or "back" than "window." (4) Shĕmāshōth (Is. 54.[12]), read with RV. "pinnacles." (5) Sheqeph

(1 K. 7.[5]) is the framework, or casing of the doors. (6) 1 K. 7.[4] RV. trs. "prospects," possibly "windows of narrowing frames" (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). The Greek word used in the passage quoted above from Acts is thuris, the diminutive form of thura, a door; it generally means "window." In classical Gr. it is sometimes used for the cells of a honey-comb.

WINE AND STRONG DRINK. In this phrase, which occurs frequently in OT., wine signifies the liquor made from the fruit of the vine, and strong drink all other alcoholic beverages. The Heb. terms are respectively yayin and shēkār. Shēkār resembles the Babylonian shikaru, a name originally signifying date-wine, the expressed juice of the date which had passed through fermentation. From this it came to be applied to all other drinks possessing the same intoxicating qualities. Yayin, denoting the fermented juice of the grape, is a word of Indo-Germanic origin, which came to the Hebrews through the Greek oinos, represented in Latin by vinum. The Heb. ḥemer (Dt. 32.[14]; Is. 27.[2]) and the cognate Aram. ḥămar, like the Arabic khamr, "wine," denote a drink which has been produced by fermentation; from the root ḥamar, "to ferment," or "foam up." Mimṣāk, from māṣak, "to mix," is wine mingled with other elements, e.g. water, or spices (Pr. 23.[30]); used in libations to Meni (Is. 65.[11]). Ṣōbe', from ṣāba', "to imbibe," or "drink largely," denotes that which is drunk, liquor (Is. 1.[22]; cp. Ho. 4.[18]; Na. 1.[10]). 'Aṣīṣ, from 'āṣaṣ, "to press," or "tread down," is the expressed juice. It is applied to the juice of the pomegranate (SS. 8.[2]), and elsewhere is trd. "sweet" or "new wine" (Is. 49.[26]; Jl. 1.[5], &c.). Shĕmārīm (only in pl.), from a root signifying to be tawny, or dark, is properly "the lees," or "dregs" of the winepress (Ps. 75.[8], &c.); but is applied to wine which has been allowed to stand on the lees for the acquisition of body (Is. 25.[6], &c.). Tīrōsh, "must," or "new wine." This is properly the juice of the grape just as it has been pressed out, or while in the process of fermentation. It is spoken of as found in the grape clusters (Is. 65.[8]). It occurs frequently with corn and oil, as one of the most valuable products of the land (Gn. 27.[28]; Dt. 7.[13]; Jr. 31.[12], &c.). Of this tithes were paid (Dt. 12.[17], &c.) and first fruits (Dt. 18.[4], &c.). Efforts have often been made to show that tīrōsh was unfermented, non-alcoholic, juice of the grape; but it is impossible to defend this position. We have only to refer to the effects ascribed to the use of tīrōsh in Jg. 9.[13], "which cheereth God and man"; and in Ho. 4.[11], where it is said to take away the understanding; and we see that its non-intoxicating character cannot be established. Possibly, however, we may take it as signifying the lighter beverage made by checking the process of fermentation before it was quite completed (Driver, Joel and Amos, 79f.).

In the New Testament the terms are: (a) gleukos, "new wine" (Ac. 2.[13]), wh. probably corresponds to Heb. tīrōsh; and (b) oinos, which is the usual Greek word for the fermented juice of the grape (Mw. 9.[17], &c.). Here again the qualities attributed to gleukos forbid us to understand it as non-intoxicating. There is nothing in the language either of the Old or of the New Testament to show that anything unfermented was called wine. The grape-juice squeezed into Pharaoh's cup by his butler (Gn. 40.[11]) probably corresponded to the beverage mentioned in a text found at Edfu; the juice of grapes was squeezed into water, and drunk by the king (Driver, Genesis in loc.). This could be done only in the season of ripe grapes, and could not be done in Palestine many months after the vintage was past (Lk. 22.[18]). The Jews in Palestine are among the most conservative of men in all things affecting the practice of religion. The wine they use at the Passover feast is fermented; and they have no knowledge of anything else ever having been employed. The rabbis did not think highly of the man who drank the unfermented juice of the grape. "He who learns from the young, to what is he like? to one that eats unripe grapes, and drinks wine from his vat," i.e. from the receptacle that receives the juice as it is pressed from the grapes (Pirqe Aboth, iv. 28).

In soil and climate Palestine was excellently suited for the cultivation of the vine (see Vine, Vineyard); and from very ancient times the inhabitants understood the art of making wine. Popular belief on this subject is doubtless reflected in the attribution of this knowledge to Noah (Gn. 9.[21]), if indeed he was not regarded as the first to discover it. Among the settled peoples, in all historic time, wine has been a common beverage. The Heb. word for "feast"—mishteh, from shātāh, "to drink"—shows what an important element it was in the social meal. Its use on festive occasions was illustrated at the marriage at Cana of Galilee (Jn. 2.[10]). But the drinking of wine was also a feature of the common meal (Gn. 27.[25]; Lk. 7.[33]). It was held in high esteem as a means to relieve heaviness of heart, to cheer the faint, and was regarded as a necessary element in a full, prosperous, and happy life (Pr. 31.[6]; Ps. 104.[15]). The Nazirite was debarred from the use of wine during the currency of his vow (see Nazirite, Vine), and the priests, while free to partake at other times, were prohibited from touching wine before going to service in the sanctuary (Lv. 10.[9]). The opposition of the Rechabites to wine was probably due to the nomadic view of the vine as the symbol of the settled life (see Jonadab). The Nabatæans also abstained from wine on political grounds. Mohammad's prohibition of wine was quite in accord with Arabian sentiment. The prohibitions show that very early men became alive to the dangers associated with the use of wine, and its abuse is condemned in the most thoroughgoing fashion both in the OT. and in the New (Pr. 20.[1]; Is. 5.[11, 22], 28.[7];

LARGE FOOT-PRESS (EGYPTIAN)
The Amphoræ and the Deity protecting the Store-room

Ho. 4.[11]; Eph. 5.[18]; 1 Cor. 5.[11], &c.). The praise of wine was therefore not indiscriminate. Its value is fully recognised, but with equal frankness the perils of abuse are stated.

It is worthy of note that in the institution of the PASSOVER there is no direction as to the use of wine. This may have been taken for granted, as a part of every feast. In any case, in our Lord's time it had become, and since then has remained, an essential feature of that celebration; whence it has been taken over and consecrated to Christian use, in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

The astringent properties of wine made it valuable for other purposes. We find it used, in combination with oil, in the dressing of wounds (Lk. 10.[34]).

Although Palestine was such a rich vine-growing country, a great trade seems to have been carried on in the import of wine from the Levant. In recent excavations great piles of the handles of amphoræ, the Greek wine jars, have been found; especially numerous are those from Rhodes. It may be that the more wealthy appreciated foreign wines. But Syrian wines were also held in high esteem. The wine of LEBANON, and that of HELBON, appear to have been specially prized (Ho. 14.[7]; Ek. 27.[18]). To this day the wine made in the Lebanon, especially that of Shtora, is in great repute in Palestine.

In early times probably the light wines of Palestine were drunk without dilution. Later we find that water was added (2 M. 15.[39]), both water and wine being regarded as hurtful if drunk alone. The rabbis fixed the proportion of water for ordinary wines at two parts water and one wine; but for the wine of Sharon, which appears to have been particularly strong, three parts water to one of wine. But the "mingled" or "mixed wine" of the OT. (SS. 8.[2]; Is. 5.[22]) was not weakened. Aromatic herbs and spices were added, in accordance with a custom ancient and widespread, thus lending flavour, and increasing strength. The wine mingled with myrrh offered to Jesus at the cross (Mk. 15.[23], &c.) was designed to act as a narcotic, "numbing pain."

We have seen that no argument can be founded on the terms used for wine in Scripture; but we must remember that the question of total abstinence had not yet been raised in any acute form, any more than that of slavery. While the shame and sin of drunkenness are heartily denounced, each man is left free to determine his own conduct in the light of conscience. But the reasoning of the apostle Paul puts the Christian duty of abstinence upon stronger grounds than those of mere language (Rm. 14.[13ff.]; 1 Cor. 8.[8ff.]), and in the circumstances of our time the appeal of his argument wakens an ever fuller response from the enlightened Christian conscience.

The wine-presses found in many parts of Pal. to-day, in places whence the vines have long since vanished, are evidence of the widespread industry of ancient times. One cut in the rock of a mountain slope, on the side of the track between the Sea of Galilee and Safed, is very familiar to the present writer. Nothing grows around among the rocky irregularities but thorns and thistles, and the stunted shrubs of the mountain, where once the vines must have made the summer beautiful. A large, rectangular trough is cut to a depth of about 15 inches in a flat surface of rock, with a slight slope to the east, where an aperture through a ridge of rock, left standing, communicates with a much deeper trough cut at a somewhat lower level. The upper is the wine-press proper (Heb. gath), the lower is the wine-fat (Heb. yeqeb). While this is true, the distinction is not always strictly preserved in the Hebrew, and in our EV. no attempt is made to observe it. Into the larger and higher trough the grapes were gathered, and there trodden with the feet. In the larger presses there might be a good many treaders. The juice thus expressed flowed through the aperture or conduit mentioned above into the lower trough. Sometimes there was a third trough, lower still, into which the must was conducted, after it had settled and clarified in the second. When the "treading" was done the broken mass in the bottom of the press was gathered together, and a slab of stone or wood placed on it. This was pressed down by means of a beam of wood, one end of which rested in an aperture in the side of the press, while the other was weighted with a large stone.

ANCIENT WINE-PRESS (EGYPTIAN)

In cases where the rock in which to cut the press was not available, a pit was dug in the ground (Mw. 21.[33], &c.), carefully built round and cemented. This received the juice, which was trodden out in a wooden press erected on the adjoining surface.

It was a joyful occasion among the people, the treading often being enlivened by the singing of songs, and the rhythmic clapping of hands. If possible the must was allowed to stand in the vat for about four days, when, it was calculated, the first or "tumultuous" stage of fermentation would be over. It was then put into large jars, or bottles (prepared skins), where the process of fermentation was completed. This lasted for three or four months, and then the wine was judged fit for use. The wine was then strained, being put through a linen cloth or strainer prepared for the purpose; poured into earthenware jars, which had been lined with pitch, and sealed up; or into skin bottles, and stored in cool cellars. The process of after fermentation caused the skins to stretch. This having been done once, the "bottles" might not be used for the same purpose again, as, having no further powers of distension, they were sure to burst if new wine were again put into them (Mw. 9.[17], &c.).

Wine also appears in the figurative language of Scripture. Note especially the wine of God's wrath (Rv. 16.[19], &c.); see also Rv. 14.[8], &c.

WINK. In Ac. 17.[30] AV. renders "the times of this ignorance God winked at," for wh. RV. substitutes "overlooked." Allowance was made by God for errors which were due to ignorance, and not to any evil will.

WINNOW. See Agriculture.

WINTER AND SUMMER stand in Scripture for the two great divisions of the year. There are no distinctive names for what we call spring and autumn. The Arabs speak of er-Rabī'a, the time of the springing of the fresh grass, and of el-Kharīf, when the vintage falls and all the fruits of the earth are gathered in. They are not regarded as distinct seasons, but only as stages in the passing of the seasons, summer and winter. Ṣaif wa-Shitta include the whole year. Winter is the season of the rainstorms. The Arabic name shitta means "rain," thus corresponding to the Greek cheimōn. It covers the months from October till April, when the rain supply for the year falls. Ṣaif is the rest of the year, May till September, the season of heat. In the less frequent showers of April, the foliage of the fig bursts out, covering the tender fruit, and men know that the sunny days are near. In cloudless sunshine the work of the fields and orchards goes forward, harvesting, threshing, winnowing, the vintage and wine-making, until the gathering clouds betoken the coming again of the rain. The first showers soften the earth, baked hard by the heat, and ploughing begins. The winter brings cold, often piercing on the higher ground, where at times Snow may be seen. In the Jordan valley the temperature is never very low; but the system becomes accustomed to the greater warmth, and in the damp, raw air of the rainy season cold is felt at higher temperatures. The rains make sad havoc of the "roads" in Palestine, which at the best are usually foot-paths beaten by the hoofs of camels and the feet of pedestrians. They swiftly go to soft mud, and in parts they are even dangerous.

WISDOM. Nations and ages are to be estimated very much by what they regard as wisdom—what they reckon the most to be valued of mental gifts. The Greeks, before the days of Socrates, regarded as highest the power of persuasion—of, if needful, making the worse appear the better reason; sophistry was with them W. To the Roman W. was the ability to direct military and political affairs in a way that wd. best promote the interest of the Republic. To-day it wd. almost seem that the sharpness wh. can engineer "trusts" and "corners" is the W. most esteemed and regarded. To estimate the Hebrews of Biblical times we must consider what they reckoned W. The pre-eminently wise man of Israel was Solomon. The first exhibition he gave of the gift of W. was his judgment concerning the child. All over the E. down to the present day it is one of the supreme tests of W., to be able to give a righteous decision in cases of difficulty and conflicting evidence. When the Queen of Sheba, having heard of the W. of Solomon, desired to test him, she "proved him with hard questions." These were of the nature of riddles, if we may believe later Jewish and Mohammadan accounts. How far his knowledge of natural history was reckoned W., and how far it and his song-writing were regarded as distinctions, illustrating the splendour of his reign, it is impossible to say. The W. of Joseph and Daniel was manifested in the interpretation of dreams; mastery in this province of W. is not attributed to Solomon.

Another means, however, is open to us in investigating the nature of Heb. W.—the books that have come down to us wh. were devoted to the exposition of Ḥokmāh (wisdom). Within the Canon we have Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes; in the deutero-canonical books of the Apocrypha we have Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom (of Solomon). The side of W. that expressed itself in visions and the interpretation of them may be seen in the writings that are known as Apocalyptic. In the Canon of the OT. there is Daniel; in the Apocrypha there is 2 Esdras (wh., however, is not admitted even into the Apocryphal Canon by Luther, and by the Council of Trent it was placed in an appendix); in the NT. the book of Revelation is an example of Apocalypse. The connection of this class of Literature with W. may be seen in Rv. 13.[18]: "Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast." As the first of Hokmāh books in the ordinary Heb. Bible, Proverbs is that wh. falls to be considered. Those pithy sayings, in wh. the wisdom of many is crystallised by the wit of one, have always been associated with W. To Solomon there are attributed three thousand proverbs in 1 K. 4.[32]. In the book of Proverbs there are not the quarter of that number. From the evidence of the LXX the text of Pr. is in a very unsatisfactory state; this result is natural, as this book was not regularly read in the synagogue, so the ear did not assist the eye to preserve the purity of the text. As seen in Pr. Heb. W. is shrewd and worldly; what prudence there is in "He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it; and he that hateth suretiship is sure" (Pr. 11.[15]), and in "A prudent man concealeth knowledge; but the heart of the fool proclaimeth foolishness" (12.[23])! There is cynical observation of humanity in "The poor is hated even of his own neighbour; but the rich hath many friends" (Pr. 14.[20]); and "Every man is friend to him that giveth gifts" (19.[6]). At the same time there is a vein of kindness, as "He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker; but he that honoureth Him hath mercy on the poor" (14.[31]); "He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed." Nevertheless justice is commended. "Divers weights and divers measures are an abomination to the Lord" (20.[10]). In the introduction there are gleams of higher things: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of W." While Proverbs proceeds on the assumption that the sum of all good is earthly prosperity, and that every one knows what it is, in ECCLESIASTES we have a criticism of aims. It ends in something very like a counsel of despair so far as an intelligent apprehension is concerned. "Fear God and keep His commandments, for this is the whole duty of man" (Ec. 12.[13]), really means in the connection in wh. it occurs, "Do your duty and don't philosophise." With the book of JOB we enter into a higher region. In it we have the perennial question discussed, "Why is there pain in the world?" Assuming that there is moral evil in the world, is pain connected with it? If so, then in what way? is it disciplinary or punitive? or may it be testing? Naturally the first idea is that pain is penalty. In Nature pain follows any such violation of physical law as wd. involve injury to the body; it is thus at once punitive and disciplinary. All primitive ideas suggest that bodily pain follows, and ought to follow, moral dereliction; on this idea all the earlier ideas of the education of children proceeded. On this fundamental notion the arguments of Job's three friends rest; they assume that evil must be in Job in some abnormal degree for such an accumulation of ills to have befallen him. If there is a moral governor of the universe—and this all the disputants assume—it would be legitimate not only to deduce guilt fm. pain, but also the amount of the guilt fm. the degree of the pain. Job triumphantly shows that whether or not pain implies guilt, the amount of the pain bears no proportion to the guilt, as many who are notoriously guilty of extortion and of all manner of wickedness yet "live, become old, yea, are mighty in power: their seed is established in their sight, their houses are safe fm. fear. . . . They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave." The conclusion to wh. the friends were to some extent leading, and wh. was more consciously affirmed by Elihu, is that we cannot understand God's reasons; thus it becomes us to submit ourselves to Divine dealings and trust where we cannot know. This view is emphasised by God Himself when He speaks to Job out of the whirlwind. Another solution is suggested in the Prologue; that other beside human beings are interested in God's dealings with men, and that Job's sufferings found their reason in the angelic sphere. There is a wider view still hinted at: that Job's ability to trust where he cd. not see, demonstrated the salvability of mankind. We can only draw attention to the later W. books of Judaism. ECCLESIASTICUS, the first of these, is the work of a scribe of Sadducean tendencies. It imitates Proverbs constantly, and to some extent ECCLESIASTES. The WISDOM OF SOLOMON is morally and poetically a higher book than ECCLESIASTICUS, but it seems to owe somewhat to the influence of Greek thought. One thing to be noted is the certainty attained as to personal immortality.

WISE MEN, an expression used, in addition to its use in its general sense, specifically of soothsayers, diviners, and magicians, in Dn. 2.[12, 13, 14, 18, 24, 27, 48], 4.[6, 18], 5.[7, 8, 15]; Mw. 2.[1, 7, 16]; and probably in Gn. 41.[8]; Ex. 7.[11]; Est. 1.[13], 6.[13]; Is. 19.[11, 12]; Jr. 50.[35], 51.[57]; Ek. 27.[8, 9]; Ob.[8]. The wise men (Mw. 2.[1, 7, 16]; RVm. Magi, Gr. μάγοι), a number of whom visited the infant Saviour, formed a corporation mentioned chiefly in association with their claims to occult knowledge. Other references are the story of Simon (Ac. 8.[9], μαγεύων), and Bar-jesus (Ac. 13.[6]; μάγον), and possibly the title, Rab-mag (Jr. 39.[3], perhaps "Chief of the Magi"), of one of the Chaldean officers. The LXX also renders "astrologers" in Dn. 1.[20], 2.[2, 10, 27], 4.[7], 5.[7, 11, 15], by μάγοι. The word comes from an old root, mag, meaning great, hence leader, and possibly priest, and is connected with the Persian mih; Sanscrit mahat, mahâ; Gr. μέγας; Lat. magis, magnus.

The origin of the Magi is lost in the unknown past. History first connects them with Zoroaster (c. B.C. 1000) as a priest-caste to whom he entrusted the execution of his principles. But Zoroaster did not create this body; he reformed a priesthood already in existence. In the Vendidâd he curses the Magians who opposed him in the interest of their worship of the Devs. Herodotus (i. 101) mentions them as one of six tribes of the Medes, and they doubtless formed a distinct hereditary caste, such as the tribe of Levi in Israel, the Egyptian priest-caste, the Brahmins among the Hindus, and the Druids among the Celts. The reformed priest-caste became a very powerful order. The only approach to God was through them, and their special study concerned the nature of God, His purposes, law, and the ceremonies with which prayer and sacrifice might be presented to Him. The peculiarity of this order, which in time became their distinctive feature, was their claim to ability to reveal the Divine will. They gave oracular pronouncements about the future to such as inquired of them. The nature of their worship led them to do this principally from observation of the heavenly bodies. Thus they invented an elaborate system of astrology. As the result of their careful observation they became the founders of the sciences of astronomy and chronology. They also studied philosophy, natural and metaphysical, and medicine. They claimed, too, to predict the future by interpretation of dreams and various forms of divining. By these claims they acquired the greatest influence in public and private life. When Cyrus united the Medes and Persians he adopted the hereditary religion. The Magi thronged the court. Herodotus and Ctesias mention them as priests under the first Persian princes, and Xenophon in the Cyropædia tells that Cyrus, on establishing his government, appointed the Magi to chant hymns at the rising of the sun and to offer the proper daily sacrifices. This position the Magi retained under succeeding Persian monarchs. With the destruction of the empire and the decay of all Oriental institutions it is not surprising to find a body which at the best must have made almost a science of deception falling largely into a very degraded condition. The bonds of association became loosened. The priestly character was largely lost, and the Magi lived to display that to which they have given their name, magic. Members of their body wandered far and wide practising on human credulity. Their secrets were sold to enterprising foreigners. Thus men of the type of Simon Magus (who thought also to buy the secret of the power of the Holy Ghost) and Elymas became the commonest representatives of the Magi, with the result that later classical references to them are contemptuous and condemnatory (Tacitus, Pliny). But it is very improbable that no inner circle of nobler students should remain, to whom their mysteries would be a combination of spiritual exaltation and scientific research. Of such we may suppose those Magi to have been who, expectant of a coming Messiah, found the sign of His coming through their study of the heavenly bodies. This is the general modern view of them, though the majority of the Fathers take an opposite view.

As to the home or nationality of these men, nothing very definite can be said. They came "from the East," but no hint is given as to the particular part. Most have derived them from Arabia (Justin, Tertullian, Epiphanius, Maldonatus, Jansen, Grotius, Lightfoot, Edersheim, Wieseler, Holtzmann), though Arabia is not strictly to the east of Palestine. But others have suggested Persia (Chrysostom, Theophylact, Euthymius, Calvin, Beza, Calovius), Parthia (Hydius), Babylon (Paulus), and even Egypt. On the question whether they were Jews or heathen, the opinion generally held both by ancients and moderns has been that they were heathen. But the reasons given in support are not strong. There is nothing in the expression ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν to exclude Jews of the Diaspora, while as to the form of their question, which is supposed to suggest a heathen origin, it is difficult to see what other form it could have taken. On the other hand, they were evidently interested in the Messianic hope of Israel to a degree which is surprising if they were heathen. While heathen astrologers would be interested in the Messianic significance of the celestial phenomenon, and might comprehend and sympathise with the Jewish hope so far as to be induced to take the long journey to adore the Messiah and present their offerings to Him, it is more probable that Jewish exiles, whose hearts still turned to the Holy Land, and who were identified with its hopes, should act as these men did. The cases of Simon Magus and Bar-jesus show that Jews sought and received admission to the mysteries of the Magi. This door being open, it would be strange if expectant Jews, living for generations in the very home of these practices, did not seek by their means to obtain some sign of the Messiah's coming. These practices were forbidden to Jews, but there were rabbis who prognosticated from the constellations (Edersheim, LTJ. i. 209). We feel that, if not Jews, these men must at least have been proselytes, of whom there were a considerable number in these Eastern lands (Schürer).

Tradition has waxed wanton over this story, and known no restraint in its imaginations and interpretations. We note a few of the more moderate traditions. While Eastern tradition gives the number of the visitors as twelve, three has been more widely accepted as the number. This number was probably suggested by the threefold gift which they presented, and has been interpreted as representing the Trinity, the three continents, the three races which sprang from Noah, on which account one has often been depicted as a black man. The tradition that they were kings is probably due to the influence of such passages as Ps. 68.[29, 31], 72.[10]; Is. 49.[7], 60.[3, 10]; there is no clear evidence of this tradition before the sixth cent. They have been adorned with the names Balthazar, Gaspar, and Melchior. Tradition says that their bodies were recovered in the East in the fourth cent. and removed to Constantinople; thence they were carried to Milan on the consecration of Eustorgius, and to Cologne on the conquest of Milan in 1162. Their festival came to be celebrated on the same day as that of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple.

The uncertainty which attends so many of the details of this visit also prevails in the matter of the star whose appearing prompted their journey. It is impossible to say what the star was. The Magi and the evangelist would not think of the stars as distant worlds, but as points of light at no great distance from the earth. To them fixed stars, planets, comets, meteors, and any other light in the firmament would be stars. Three views have been generally held with regard to this phenomenon. (a) This was a miraculous light created by God for the glory of His Son, and with the object of making Him known to His faithful servants. (b) Some evanescent star or comet appeared which these star-gazers read as the sign of the Messiah. This was Kepler's theory, who in 1604 discovered a new and remarkable star associated with a striking conjunction of Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars. He calculated that a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn occurred in Pisces in the year B.C. 7, with a similar conjunction of the three planets in the following year, and conjectured that the same evanescent star might have appeared at the time of the conjunction. Chinese records note the appearance of a new star in B.C. 4, which Pingré and others claim to have identified as a comet. (c) A certain conjunction of planets was read as the astrological sign of the Messiah. Kepler's conclusion regarding the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in Pisces in B.C. 7 is admitted by astronomers, and the spectacle would be a striking one. In connection with this the statement of the Jewish commentator, Abrabanel, in the fifteenth cent., is interesting, that the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in Pisces betokened most important events, especially for Israel. Prof. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?), while not using Kepler's theory as an argument, finds it an interesting coincidence that Kepler's date should agree with the date at which he had arrived on grounds entirely different.

There was a certain Jewish expectation connecting the Messiah with a celestial appearance. The Messiah Haggadah on the words, "A star shall come out of Jacob" (Nu. 24.[17]), says, "In the fifth (year) . . . the star shall shine forth from the East and this is the star of Messiah . . . and at the close of the seventh the Messiah is to be expected" (quoted by Edersheim, LTJ. i. 211). A similar statement occurs in Jellinek's Beth ha Midrash, iii. 8. These statements, whether due to a tradition earlier or later than the birth of Christ, are of value as connecting the birth of the Messiah with some sidereal appearance. The adoption of the name Bar-Cochba ("the son of a star") by the famous false Messiah, offers further testimony in the same direction. G. P. WALLACE.

WITCH, WITCHCRAFT. See DIVINATION.

WITHERED HAND. See DISEASES AND REMEDIES.

WITHES, AV. WITHS, may be bow-strings of green gut (Jg. 16.[7ff.]). The word yether may mean a cord, or rope; it is the bow-string of Ps. 11.[2], &c. Withe is properly a flexible twig, especially of the willow; or a band of twisted twigs.

WITNESS. See TESTIMONY.

WIZARD. See DIVINATION.

WOLF (Heb. zeʾēb, Gr. lukos), common in Pal., especially in the less inhabited districts. The Pal. wolf is larger and lighter in the colour than the European variety. They do not hunt in such large packs as elsewhere, and are not infrequently found solitary. Singularly enough, the wolf is only mentioned in Scripture in a metaphorical sense, as Gn. 49.[27]; Mw. 7.[15]; Jn. 10.[12]. One of the "princes" of Midian was called ZEEB, "wolf."

WOMAN. I. In OT. times. II. In NT. and Christianity.

I. (1) In ancient Isr., as in the ancient world generally, women were regarded as inferior to men. The husband was the head of the household, and his wife or wives were under his absolute authority, although in cases of cruelty or oppression the relatives of the woman might intervene. However, in earliest times in Isr., women seem to have occupied a much more honourable place than they enjoyed in later times or in surrounding heathen nations. In no period was the inferiority so emphasised as in rabbinical Judaism. We find Sarah, the wife of Abraham, holding a position of authority in Abraham's household, while in the case of Isaac and Rebecca the latter seems to have been the ruling partner. In later times we find Zeruiah, the mother of David's generals, Joab and Abishai, always mentioned instead of the father whose name is unknown. In the kingdoms of Judah and Isr. the queen (1 K. 15.[13]) and the queen-mother (2 K. 8.[18]) often exercised great influence. The fact that polygamy was sanctioned tended inevitably to lower the status of women to little more than that of a slave, who was bought from her parents by the husband. At all periods divorce was an easy matter for the husband but impossible for the wife, and the condition of a wife who had lost her husband's affection was extremely precarious, if she were not backed by powerful relations or had borne him children (see FAMILY, MARRIAGE, DIVORCE).

(2) In the sphere of religion women enjoyed very considerable privileges. This is also the case in other Semitic religions, where female deities often held a very important place, and women acted as priestesses. In the cult of Ishtar of Babylon married and unmarried women were to be found as temple slaves in connection with the immoral rites associated with this worship. Whenever idolatry prevailed in Israel women were found connected with it. Thus the introduction of Baal worship is ascribed to Jezebel in Israel and Athaliah in Judah, while the prophets frequently allude to the place taken by women in idolatrous rites. Thus Jeremiah (7.^{18}) refers to their baking cakes for the Queen of Heaven, and Ezekiel (8.^{14}) tells how he saw women joining in the lament for Tammuz, the Babylonian Nature God, whose birth in spring and death in midsummer were occasions of rejoicing and mourning respectively.

In this way it is not surprising that women took part in the religion of Jehovah. We find that they attended the religious festivals. Women were present at Shiloh (Jg. 21.$^{16-19}$; 1 S. 1.$^{1-4}$, 2.^{19}), and the Israelite was ordered to eat the passover with his "daughter" and "maidservant" (Dt. 12.^{18}). The law required the attendance of men only at the yearly festivals (Ex. 23.^{17}, 34.^{23}; Dt. 12.^{18}), but it did not prevent women from attending, and this seems to have been the custom. Women took part in prayer (cp. Hannah, 1 S. 1.^{19}), sacrifices (cp. wife of Manoah, Jg. 13.^{10}), vows (Nu. 6.^{2}), consulted oracles (cp. Gn. 25.^{22}) and were granted theophanies (cp. Hagar, Gn. 16.$^{7ff.}$, 21.$^{17ff.}$; Sarah, 18.$^{9ff.}$; Manoah's wife, Jg. 13.$^{3ff.}$).

(3) Among the religious offices held by women we find at the lowest stage (a) the witch. The OT. law condemned the practice and inflicted the penalty of death (Ex. 22.^{18}); but in spite of that the practice existed, and women who were supposed to have intercourse with the spirit-world were resorted to (1 S. 28.^{17}). (b) We find women taking part in the semi-religious rites of mourning (cp. Jr. 9.^{17}; Mk. 5.^{38}), while in the tabernacle and temple services women seem to have performed varied duties as servants at the door (cp. Ex. 38.^{8}; 1 S. 2.^{22}), as singers and dancers on the occasion of victories (Ex. 15.^{20}; Jg. 11.^{34}; 1 S. 18.^{6}; Ps. 68.^{25}), and after the exile as members of the temple choir (Ez. 2.^{65}; Ne. 7.^{67}). (c) The prophetic function was also discharged by women, though the word "prophetess" is sometimes applied to the wife of a prophet. Deborah (Jg. 4.$^{4-5}$) is both a prophetess and a judge. Josiah the king consults Huldah the prophetess (2 K. 22.$^{13-20}$), but the appearance of a prophetess was unusual.

II. (1) In Christianity and in the early Church women enjoyed a freedom and independence in marked contrast to the suppression and subjection of the sex in other parts of the East. This is due partly to the influence and development of Jewish ideas, but especially to the attitude of Jesus to women and the general trend of Christian teaching. In the Jewish Church, in spite of many restrictions, women were recognised in the worship of the temple and the synagogue. No doubt their inferiority was definitely recognised. They were prohibited from approaching so near the altar as men, and sat apart in the synagogue, though in such places of prayer as that to which Lydia resorted (Ac. 16.^{13}) the separation of worshippers could not have been so strongly emphasised. Christianity being a religion which made its appeal to the individual soul, whose value it esteemed higher than all else, even than the whole world, broke down minor barriers of distinction. Thus Jesus Himself appeals equally to women as to men. He thought it worth His while to go out of His way to meet an outcast Samaritan woman, and to the surprise of His disciples talked to her of the greatest religious themes (cp. Jn. 4.$^{7ff.}$). Many of His most intimate friends were women. He loved Martha and Mary of Bethany (Jn. 11.^{5}). Considering the susceptibility of women to the deeper influences of religion, it is not surprising that they occupy a prominent place in the NT., and particularly in the life of Jesus. Women brought their children to be blessed of Him (Mw. 19.[13]; Mk. 10.[13]; Lk. 18.[15]); women followed Him on His last journey to Jerusalem and to the place of crucifixion (Lk. 23.[27, 49]). They performed the last rites for the dead (Lk. 23.[55]), and were the first at the grave on the resurrection morning (Mw. 28.[1]; Mk. 16.[1]; Lk. 24.[1]; Jn. 20.[1]). In the same way in the early Church an important part was played by honourable women such as Tabitha of Joppa (Ac. 9.[36]), Lydia of Philippi (Ac. 16.[14, 16]), Priscilla (Ac. 18.[26]), &c. The declaration of Paul (Gal. 3.[28]), that in Christ Jesus there was neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, expressed the principle which guided the Church in her attitude to distinctions of the ancient and Jewish world. At the same time, Paul himself, while giving due place to the dignity of womanhood, held that the wife must be in subjection to her husband (Eph. 5.[22, 23]). In all the sacred rites of Christianity women enjoyed equal privileges with men, sharing in the Agapē and all acts of worship.

A MODERN ARAB WOMAN

(2) Offices held by women. We find no women among the apostles, nor any mention of women among the seventy sent out by Christ. None of the writers of the NT. were women, unless we accept Harnack's suggestion that Priscilla was the authoress of the Epistle to the Hebrews. There were no doubt women among the believers on the day of Pentecost who received the gift of tongues and probably the power to heal. We find it not unknown for women to speak in the church, a practice which Paul condemned at Corinth (1 Cor. 14.[34]). The four daughters of Philip "who prophesied" (Ac. 21.[8, 9]) were likely female missionaries or evangelists. Two offices are referred to in the NT. as being held by women, that of the deaconess and the widow. (a) Phœbe of Cenchrea is called a "servant (deaconess) of the church" (Rm. 16.[1]). Probably her work consisted in caring for the sick and the poor, while the epithet "patroness" (AV. "succourer," Rm. 16.[2]) suggests a woman of wealth and rank who could extend hospitality to her fellow-Christians. The women referred to in 1 Tm. 3.[11] may be deaconesses, but the reference may be to the wives of the deacons. We find mention of deaconesses in the post-apostolic age, but we cannot be sure that they constituted a recognised "order" in NT. times. (b) Widows. The passage 1 Tm. 5.[3, 9, 10] leads us to conclude that widows not only received charity but also held a distinct place and performed a definite function in the Church, as was the case in the second cent. (cp. Tertullian, Origen, &c.). It is not at all clear what their work was, or whether it differed from that of the deaconess. (c) We may also refer to the appearance in the early Church of female ascetics who had taken a vow of chastity and sought to keep it, while living together with men who had taken a similar vow. From the time of the Shepherd of Hermas onwards we have frequent reference to this form of asceticism, in which a man and woman inspired with enthusiasm for the ascetic ideal entered into a so-called spiritual marriage. It is not unlikely that these female ascetics, spiritual brides (syneisaktoi), had already made their appearance in NT. times, and the reference in 1 Cor. 7.[36] seems best explained as a case of spiritual marriage which had turned out a failure. Paul advises both, or at least the woman, to put an end to the precarious situation by marriage.

W. F. Boyd.

WOOL (Heb. tzemer, gēz, "fleece") was highly valued by the Jews for the manufacture of clothing (Pr. 31.[13]; Ho. 2.[9]). The tribute wh. Mesha k. of Moab paid to Jehoram was the W. of 100,000 lambs and of the same number of rams (2 K. 3.[4]). When thoroughly bleached its shining whiteness made W. a symbol of purity (Is. 1.[18]; Dn. 7.[9]; Rv. 1.[14]); flakes of snow are compared to W. (Ps. 147.[16]); the "white W." of Damascus was highly prized (Ek. 27.[18]). The Israelites were forbidden to wear clothing made fm. a mixture of linen and W. (Lv. 19.[19]; Dt. 22.[11]); the reason appears to have been wholly symbolic. Over against the injunction to the priests to wear only linen Ezekiel placed a prohibition of wearing anything woollen as causing sweat (Ek. 44.[17, 18]). The writer of Hebrews regards the "scarlet" of Ex. and Lv. as "scarlet wool" (He. 9.[19]), a statement wh. implies the knowledge of the process of dyeing W. on the part of the Jews.

WORD. This term, as employed by the Bible writers, is exceedingly varied in its import. It signifies (1) a single word; (2) a number of words, composing a sentence or saying; (3) an emphatic saying, e.g. a proverb, a command, a proclamation; (4) language in general; (5) the creative word of God; (6) a Divine revelation, as in the prophetic formula, "the word of the Lord came unto me"; (7) the sum of revelation, as contained in Old Testament Scripture; (8) the Christian Gospel. To these usages, all more or less frequent, there must be added (9) the peculiar usage in the prologue of the fourth Gospel, where Christ Himself is described as the Word made flesh. Not only is the term employed in this wide variety of meaning, but it carries with it a pregnant significance which is wanting to it in our own language. A "word" to the Hebrew mind was something more than an articulate utterance conveying some idea. It was invested with a kind of reality. It was not merely the sign of a thing, but an inseparable part of the thing itself.

The importance thus attached to spoken or written words is ultimately due to a primitive mode of thinking, from which the Hebrew mind never entirely freed itself. Primitive man is unable to distinguish accurately between a symbol and the fact which it represents. A name is identified with the person who bears it, so that he himself is supposed to exert an influence when his name is uttered. A word, likewise, is essentially bound up with the thing denoted by it: some portion of the reality is present in the word. It is significant that in the Hebrew language the same term (dābār) has the meaning both of " word " and " thing," and this confusion in language helped, no doubt, to perpetuate the confusion in thought. A word, to the Old Testament writers, had something of a concrete existence. It occupied an intermediate place between the bare conception of a thing and its realisation in the world of fact.

This peculiar value assigned to words generally is attributed, in an emphatic degree, to words spoken by God. They are regarded as the outgoing of the Divine personality, and as such possess a creative and energising power. Thus in the first chapter of Genesis, the idea is not merely that God called the world into being by the fiat of His will. His word is conceived, rather, as a dynamic agency. It was a power that went forth from God, and caused the various elements of the material world to shape themselves out of chaos. In like manner the word of God that comes to the prophets has for its purpose not only the revealing of future events, but their accomplishment. The Divine threats and promises are of the nature of living forces, which will henceforth take their part in human affairs and work towards their own fulfilment. This idea is expressly set forth in Is. 55.[10, 11]. The word of the Lord is there compared to the fertilising influences of the natural world. It acts on the movements of history, and causes them to bring about the Divine purposes.

The New Testament estimate of words is coloured by the Hebrew conception; and this is especially noticeable in the teaching of Jesus. He attaches a grave importance to even the idle words that men speak (Mw. 5.[22], 12.[36]); and declares that the judgment will turn not so much on actions as on words (Mw. 12.[37]). These difficult sayings are no doubt to be explained in the light of the Hebrew idea indicated above. Words are possessed of a certain reality. Incalculable forces are let loose in them, to work either for good or evil. They contain some portion of the spirit of the man who utters them, so that the judgment on his words is a judgment on himself. This strain of thinking can be discerned, even more clearly, in the references to our Lord's own words. They are not words only but instruments of power and vehicles of Divine influence, like the words of God in the Old Testament. He performs His works of healing and controls the elements by His word. He can say, " My words will not pass away," i.e. they will continue to act until they have wrought their fulfilment. In the fourth Gospel a peculiar emphasis is laid on the words of Jesus as in some measure representing Himself. To receive His word is not merely to accept His message but to enter into union with Him. His words are " spirit and life "; they are instinct with the higher spirit that dwells in Him, and through them He imparts it to His disciples. A suggestion of this kind appears to underlie the description of the Christian message as " the word " (e.g. in the parable of the sower). The message is regarded as a life-giving power. By means of it a new transforming influence has entered into the world.

The Hebrew usage only accounts partially for the conception of Christ as the incarnate Word, which is presented in the prologue to the fourth Gospel. Here also there is a reference to Old Testament ideas of the creative and revealing word; but these ideas are combined with others, derived from the current Greek philosophy. The central doctrine of Stoicism was that of the Logos, or Divine reason, which was immanent in all things; and this doctrine had been accepted, with some modifications, by Philo, the Jewish thinker of Alexandria, who lived about the time of Christ. He availed himself of the twofold significance of the Greek term " logos " (" word " and " reason "); and identified the " reason " of Stoicism with the " word " of the Old Testament. He thus arrived at the theory that within the being of God there was a second Divine principle, which was God's agent in the creation and government of the world. This doctrine of Philo was necessitated by the belief in the transcendence of God which had come to prevail in Jewish thought. As the infinitely holy one, of purer eyes than to look upon iniquity, God could not Himself be in any direct relation to the world. He must therefore act through an intermediary; and this middle being was His " Word " or " logos." The author of the fourth Gospel, in his desire to assert the Divine origin and nature of Jesus, falls back on the philosophical conception which was current in his day. He declares that in Jesus the " Word," that existed from all eternity with God, had become flesh. But while he borrows the term and the conception, his thought is essentially different from that of Philo. To the Alexandrian thinker, the " logos " was little more than an abstract principle; to St. John it is a personal existence. Philo regards it from the Greek point of view, as the immanent reason of the world; St. John reverts to the Hebrew idea of the " word," as the active will and self-revelation of God. Above all, while St. John employs a philosophical term, his mind is directed from the first to the actual revelation in Jesus Christ.

He has no interest in the doctrine of Philo except in so far as it illustrates and interprets the supreme significance of the historical Person. In the body of the Gospel it recedes entirely into the background. Jesus is described no longer as " the Word," but under personal attributes as " the Son," or " the Son of God."

Apart from the prologue of the fourth Gospel there is only one explicit reference to Jesus as " the Word " in the books of the New Testament (Rv. 19.[13]). But the doctrine suggested by the name can be traced more or less clearly in several writings which are probably earlier in date than the Gospel (Col. 2.[15f.]; He. 1.[2, 3]; Eph. 1.[3-10]). It may have been introduced into the theology of the Primitive Church by Apollos and other teachers who had been trained in the schools of Alexandria.

E. F. Scott.

WORLD. World is the rendering in AV. of five Heb. and four Gr. terms.

I. Of the Heb. terms—

(1) 'Erez means the earth, orbis terrarum (Ps. 22.[27]; Is. 23.[17], 62.[11]; Jr. 25.[26]).

(2) Hedel means literally cessation, and occurs only in Is. 38.[11], where the rendering " world " is doubtful, some taking it to mean Hades.

(3) Ḥeled means duration or term of life, thence world (Ps. 17.[14], 49.[1]).

(4) 'Ōlām means an age past, present, or to come, hence this world or the world to come (Ps. 73.[12]; Ec. 3.[11]).

(5) Tēbēl means the fertile and inhabited earth, and occurs only in poetry (1 S. 2.[8]; Jb. 18.[18]; Ps. 9.[8]; Pr. 8.[26]; Is. 13.[11]; Jr. 10.[12], &c.).

II. Of the Gr. terms—

(1) Gē corresponds in meaning to Heb. 'erez, and is rendered by world only in Rv. 13.[3].

(2) Oikoumenē corresponds to Heb. tēbēl, meaning the inhabited earth (Mw. 24.[14]; Lk. 4.[5]; Ac. 11.[28], 17.[6, 31], &c.). In Lk. 2.[1] it means the Roman empire, and in He. 2.[5] it seems to designate the new order of things brought in by Christ.

(3) Aiōn corresponds to Heb. 'Ōlām, meaning the present age or the age wh. is to be inaugurated by the regeneration of all things (Mw. 12.[32]; Mk. 10.[30]; Lk. 18.[30], 20.[34, 35]; Eph. 1.[21]; He. 6.[5]). In 1 Cor. 2.[7]; He. 11.[3], and perhaps also He. 9.[26], the plural seems to convey the idea of the universe, or " the sum of the periods of time, including all that is manifested in and through them " (Westcott). It is chiefly as meaning the present world-age or dispensation that the word is rendered world in AV. Mw. 13.[39, 40, 49], 24.[3], 28.[20]. But there is a development in its significance. In some passages it denotes life in this present age with its complex of interests (1 Tm. 6.[17]; 2 Tm. 4.[10]), which interests may become a source of danger to the Christian (Mw. 13.[22]; Mk. 4.[19]). In other passages it seems to include those who live in this world-age and the spirit that animates them, in other words humanity in its state of alienation from God, reference being made to its sons (Lk. 16.[8], 20.[34]), its rulers (1 Cor. 2.[6, 8]), its wisdom (1 Cor. 1.[20], 2.[6], 3.[18]), and its fashion (Rm. 12.[2]). It is evil (Gal. 1.[4]), and under the dominion of the Evil One (2 Cor. 4.[4]). From the world in this sense of the term Christians are delivered by Jesus (Gal. 1.[4]), they are exhorted not to be conformed to it (Rm. 12.[2]), and whilst living in it they are to avoid its evil ways (Tt. 2.[12]).

(4) But of the words rendered world in NT. kosmos occurs most frequently, and is of most importance because of the wealth of meaning with which it is used. It means literally an apt and harmonious arrangement or constitution. Hence it comes to denote the ordered sum-total of what God has created, i.e. the universe. This is its significance in Jn. 17.[5, 24]; Ac. 17.[24]; Rm. 1.[20]; Eph. 1.[4]; He. 4.[3]; 1 P. 1.[20]. In other passages it means the abode of humanity, or that order of things of which man is the centre (Jn. 1.[9], 6.[14], 16.[21]; Rm. 1.[8]; 2 Cor. 1.[12]; Eph. 2.[12]; 1 Tm. 1.[15], 6.[7]; He. 10.[5], &c.). Hence it comes to denote also humanity inhabiting the world (Mw. 13.[38], 18.[7]; Jn. 12.[19]; Rm. 3.[6, 19]; 1 Cor. 4.[9]). It also includes in certain passages the earthly goods, pursuits, and interests which make up human life in the world (Mw. 16.[26]; 1 Cor. 3.[22], 7.[31, 33]; Js. 2.[5]; 1 Jn. 3.[17]). But human sin has infected the kosmos and converted it into a source of spiritual danger. Its interests and pursuits, though legitimate in themselves, tend to seduce men from God. Hence has arisen that meaning of kosmos wh. is the most characteristic use of the word in NT.—that, namely, wh. denotes the present order of things manifested in and by the human race as alienated from God, or in the words of Westcott, " humanity in its present state, alienated from its Maker, and so far determining the character of the whole order to which man belongs." This meaning is developed especially in the writings of St. Paul and St. John. The kosmos is transitory (1 Jn. 2.[17]). The rudiments of the kosmos are contrasted with the spirituality of the Gospel (Gal. 4.[3]; Col. 2.[8, 20]), and its sorrow is opposed to the sorrow of repentance (2 Cor. 7.[10]). The standard wh. holds good in the kosmos for estimating men and things is not God's standard (1 Cor. 1.[27, 28], 4.[13]; Js. 2.[5]), and its wisdom is a fancied wisdom wh. does not know God (1 Cor. 1.[20, 21], 3.[19]; Jn. 1.[10]). Neither can it receive the Spirit of Truth (Jn. 14.[17]). The spirit wh. animates it is opposed to the Spirit wh. is of God bestowed on believers (1 Cor. 2.[12]), and those who possess this spirit of the kosmos are described as " of the kosmos," and are contrasted with Christ and His disciples (Jn. 8.[23], 15.[19], 17.[11]; 1 Jn. 4.[4, 5]). The state of the kosmos arising from the influence of this spirit is one of dire moral corruption (Eph. 2.[2]; 1 Jn. 2.[15-17]; Js. 1.[27], 4.[4]; 2 P. 1.[4], 2.[20]). Indeed St. John declares that it is dominated by the Evil One (1 Jn. 5.[19]), who is called by Jesus the prince of the kosmos (Jn. 12.[31], 14.[30], 16.[11]). Moreover the kosmos hates the Saviour and His followers, or at least is indifferent to both (Jn. 7.[7], 15.[18], 17.[14]; 1 Jn. 3.[1, 13], 4.[5]), and its hatred tends to take the form of persecution (Jn. 16.[33]). The friendship of the kosmos is enmity with God (Js. 4.[4]). The kosmos is the subject of Divine judgment (Jn. 12.[31]; Rm. 3.[6, 19]; 1 Cor. 6.[2]), which judgment is brought about by Jesus coming into the world (Jn. 3.[19], 9.[39], 12.[31]). It is liable to condemnation (1 Cor. 11.[32]). Nevertheless God loved the kosmos and gave His Son to be its Saviour (Jn. 3.[16-19]); He was in Christ, reconciling the kosmos to Himself (2 Cor. 5.[19]); and the Son took on Him its sin (Jn. 1.[29]). Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the kosmos (1 Jn. 4.[14]); He is the propitiation for its sins (1 Jn. 2.[2]); He has overcome it (Jn. 16.[33]); He imparts life to it (Jn. 6.[51]); and He is its light (Jn. 8.[12], 9.[5]). His disciples have been chosen by Jesus out of the kosmos (Jn. 15.[19]), or according to another way of putting it, they have been given to the Son by the Father (Jn. 17.[6]). On their behalf Jesus prays the Father, not that He wd. take them out of the kosmos, but that He wd. keep them from the Evil One (Jn. 17.[15]). Jesus sends them into the kosmos (Jn. 17.[18]), in wh. they are to shine as lights (Mw. 5.[14-16]; Php. 2.[15]). They are not to love the kosmos (1 Jn. 2.[15]), but to keep themselves unspotted from it (Js. 1.[27]). They are to use the kosmos as not abusing it (1 Cor. 7.[31]). They are also to overcome the kosmos by faith (1 Jn. 5.[4, 5]). Through the Cross of Christ the kosmos was crucified unto St. Paul and he unto the kosmos (Gal. 6.[14]). The Gospel must be preached throughout the kosmos (Mw. 13.[38], 26.[13]; Mk. 14.[9], 16.[15]; 1 Tm. 3.[16]). The Paraclete will convince the kosmos of sin and righteousness and judgment (Jn. 16.[8]), and through the mission of Jesus and the Paraclete the kosmos will come to knowledge and faith (Jn. 14.[31], 17.[21]). As things are at present Christ's kingdom is not of the kosmos (Jn. 18.[36]). But the time will come when it can be said, "The kingdom of the kosmos is become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ" (Rv. 11.[15] RV.).

Lit.: Young's Analytical Concordance to the Bible; Westcott's Commentary on St. John's Gospel, additional note at the end of chap. 1.; articles on "World" in HDB. and DCG.

John W. Slater.

WORM. Sometimes the earth worm, zoḥălē 'eretz (Mi. 7.[17]), but most generally the larva as of the clothes moth, ṣaṣ (Is. 51.[8]); again it is the "maggot" that devours animal remains, especially as devouring the corpses of human beings, rimmāh (Jb. 24.[20]; Is. 14.[11]). There is also tōlā', wh. is also rendered "scarlet" (Is. 1.[18]); fm. this it is deduced that tōlē'āh means the coccus worm fm. wh. the dye is got, but the usage rather points to a maggot of some sort (Is. 66.[24]); the W. that killed Jonah's gourd is called tōlē'āh (Jh. 4.[7]).

WORMWOOD (Heb. la'ănāh). This is the EV. tr. in Dt. 29.[18], &c. In Am. 6.[12] AV. trs. "hemlock." Wormwood also stands for the Greek apsinthos (Rv. 8.[11]), the name of the star which fell upon the rivers at the sound of the third angel's trumpet. La'ănāh is probably a generic term covering the various species of wormwood—Artemisia nilotica, A. Judaica, A. fruticosa, and A. cinerea, which are found in Palestine. It is used metaphorically, as of that which bears bitter fruit of sorrow, e.g. idolatry (Dt. 29.[18], &c.). Orientals speak of the calamities and griefs of life under names of bitter-tasting and evil plants. Wormwood also it is to be disappointed of justice (Am. 5.[7]).

WORSHIP (Heb. hishtaḥăvĕh, Gr. pros-kunes-thai, sebesthai, lat-reu-ein) stands for worth-ship—the state, thence the acknowledgment, of worth. Originally it indicated respect and honour paid to men (Dn. 2.[46]; Mw. 18.[26]) as well as reverence towards God. In the latter sense it may appear in the homage of the individual soul (Ex. 34.[8]; Ps. 5.[7]; Mw. 4.[9f.]; He. 11.[21]), or in the united worship of a throng (1 Ch. 29.[20]; Ne. 8.[6]). OT. worship was always associated with sacrifice (Gn. 12.[7f.]; Ex. 3.[18]; 1 K. 8.[62]; but cp. Is. 1.[11ff.], &c.). Where priests and sacrifices were not available, however, and even alongside of them, there arose the synagogue. Apart from the festivals, it was the services of the synagogue, not of the Temple, that formed the model for Christian W. See Sacrifice, Synagogue, Temple.

(1) The Master-hand of Jesus Christ.—Our Lord taught that true W. is a spiritual thing, not confined to specially sacred places. It must be in accord with the nature of Him who is both God and Father, and with our true relation to Him (Jn. 4.[21-24]). With the notable exception of the Sacraments He has not left any rubric. By open-air preaching and otherwise He has given W. a treatment divinely fresh. Here, as in other things, He did not set up stereotyped organisation, but supplied principles for the free development of the Church as led by His Spirit. Yet He was present at the great festivals, and it was His custom to attend the synagogue (Lk. 4.[16]), including the afternoon or evening service (Mk. 1.[29, 32]). He called the Temple the house of prayer for all nations (Mk. 11.[17]). Thus He acknowledged the obligation and benefit of stated W., and He attached a blessing to every meeting held in His name (Mw. 18.[20]).

(2) Primitive Christian Worship.—We find the earliest account in Ac. 2.[42, 46f.] RV.: "They continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers." "And day by day, continuing stedfastly with one accord in the Temple, and breaking bread at home, they did take their food with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God," &c. The first congregations, then, met in house-churches (v. 46; Rm. 16.[23]; Col. 4.[15]), and the Lord's Supper was dispensed there. This practice continued until about A.D. 200, and prob. much longer, except in the larger towns. Growing numbers, however, wd. require larger accommodation, and in 202–210 appears the earliest trace of buildings being set apart exclusively for Christian W.

At first the Jewish Christians continued to observe the Sabbath and attend the Temple W. (Ac. 2.[47], 3.[1]) as well as Christian meetings. The apostles gladly preached in the synagogues until they were driven out (Ac. 13.[14-16, 50], 19.[8f.]). Besides, they had to provide for Gentile Christians who had no connection with the synagogue. Originally there was a daily service (Ac. 2.[47]), but gradually the Lord's Day became the day of independent W., along with Monday and Thursday, accdg. to synagogue practice, as additional days (prob. afterwards changed to Wed. and Friday). Pliny the Younger (Letter to Trajan, about A.D. 112) describes the meeting of the Christians before daybreak, i.e. before they went to their work. Their singing was evidently antiphonal. He also speaks of another kind of meeting later in the day.

For they had two kinds of worship-meeting. (1) One—correspdg. to the synagogue services—for prayer, praise, reading of the OT. and records of the life of Jesus (logia), also of apostolic letters (not yet called Scripture); and for exhortation (see 1 Cor. 14.). Its characteristic was the freedom of all the members to use the gifts of the Spirit: its drawback was confusion. Prob. the recital of some short belief or creed found a place (1 Cor. 12.[3]; also 1 Tm. 3.[16], unless we call this the fragment of a hymn), like the recital of the Shema in the synagogue. An Amen was uttered by the worshippers at the end of the prayers. Catechumens, penitents, and heathen were also present. (2) A meeting for thanksgiving (eucharistia), which was sometimes conjoined with (1), and sometimes followed immediately upon the Agapé or Love-feast. To this feast the brethren brought portions, so that rich and poor might share alike. The Communion offertory or collection for the poor is a modern survival of this. The Agapé, however, was to be no selfish hustle, but a fitting introduction to the more solemn service of the Holy Supper (1 Cor. 11.[20ff.] RV.). Accdg. to the Didache (Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) the prayers at this eucharistic service were not all in set form. "Let the prophets give thanks as much as they will."

There are no annual Christian festivals in the NT., but the practice apparently has some apostolic sanction, for the early Christians, including the apostles, seem to have continued for a long time to observe the Passover and Pentecost with special reference to the death and resurrection of the Lord, and the gift of the Spirit. The observance of Christmas came much later.

After the time of Justin Martyr (about 150 A.D.) we get only hints of Christian W. until the fourth century, when liturgical usage appears in a much more developed form. Development went on until W. became organised elaborately, and even overlaid and distorted with observances. The question must arise, "Did this proceed at all legitimately accdg. to the teaching of Jesus, NT. ideas, and early practice?"

(3) Principles of Worship.—W. is an instinct of the human heart, and it is a fallacy to sever it from all stated form. The NT., indeed, teaches that all our life is to be dedicated to God (Rm. 12.[1]), and not merely certain places and seasons. Yet this does not take from the value of the thankful and deliberate acknowledgment of God, as in grace before meat (Mw. 14.[19]; Ac. 27.[35]), and in the W. of the home (Ps. 118.[15]; Eph. 5.[19]; Col. 3.[16]), as well as in public worship. W. is the inner shrine of that sanctuary which is co-extensive with life, and without it the practical dedication is ready to vanish away. By direct precept we are told not to forsake "the assembling of ourselves together" (He. 10.[25]). The quick-moving currents of modern life must never submerge the shrine, nor lead to that hurry which is fatal to W.

In W., amidst variety of type, certain things shd. be observed. It must not be stiff and cold, but give living expression to Christian fellowship. Yet it is not a musical entertainment, nor a random outlet for free-and-easy religious talk. Amongst the notes of true W. may be named reverence and adoration (Ps. 95.[6], 99.[9]; Rv. 4.[10f.]), order and beauty (Ps. 96.[9]; 1 Cor. 14.[40]), joyousness (Ps. 100., 105.[3], &c.), peace and communion (Ps. 29.[11]; Mw. 5.[23f.]; Php. 4.[7]; 1 Jn. 1.[3]), of which last the forms of benediction are a continual reminder (Nu. 6.[24-26]; 1 Cor. 1.[3]; 2 Cor. 13.[14]).

Doxologies, and at least brief responses, are entirely Scriptural (Ps. 106.[48]; 1 Cor. 14.[16]; Rv. 5.[11ff.], 7.[9ff.], &c.). The latter infuse a popular element into W. The united recital of belief or creed is also good, but the creed must be living. The worshipping of angels is forbidden (Col. 2.[18]; cp. Ps. 103.[20], 148.[2]). There is no hint whatever directing to the invocation of saints, but frequent thanksgiving for their witness to Christ, and their felicity now, animates the Church (He. 12.[23], 13.[7]).

Without doubt the W. of the Church is being greatly enriched from the hymns and prayers of the Christian centuries, and a limited liturgical element is prob. quite in accordance with the origin and the primitive usages of parts of Christian W. Yet it must be recognised to the full that the best results are likely to be secured by giving scope also for the free development and expression of the Church's life by the lips of Spirit-taught men in every age (1 Cor. 12.[1-12], 14.[1, 26, 39]; 2 Cor. 3.[17]; Gal. 5.[1]). Nor can we fail to observe also that in and above all, Christians must "worship by the Spirit of God" (Php. 3.[3] RV.). Fittingly does Keble pray for the Church—

"Unlock her heart."

W. is to be "unto edifying," but is not a mere nursery for pious culture and comfort. It is a Divine agency for the diffusion of saving truth and the bringing of men to Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 1.[21]). So preaching as a part of W.—the preaching of the Evangel—must have a leading place.

"Catholic" W., in the true sense of that word, should include (a) a full and cordial expression of brotherly fellowship with other worshippers there present, and with all the faithful, to whatever communion they belong (1 Cor. 1.[2f.]; Rm. 8.[14]). (b) A recognition of the sacerdotal or priestly char. of W. The sacrifices are offered by the priesthood of worshipping believers (1 P. 2.[5]; Rv. 1.[6] RV.), while ministers, accdg. to the NT., are not mediating priests, but presbyters or episcopoi "for the edifying of the body of Christ," solemnly ordained to office by apostolic authority (1 Tm. 4.[14]; 2 Tm. 1.[6]). These sacrifices are praise and prayer (Ps. 141.[2]; Jr. 17.[26]; He. 13.[15]), the gift or offertory (Php. 4.[18]; He. 13.[16]), and specially the humble hearts and surrendered wills of the worshippers (Ps. 51.[17]; Rm. 12.[1], 15.[16]; Php. 2.[17]). One of the best things to-day is to train Christians to a high sense of their own priestly calling, to teach them to prepare for W., and in a number of cases to give them some further part, a reverent part, in it. A devotional spirit shd. be suitably fostered in the young. (c) In all her W., and with special vividness in the Holy Supper, the Church carries on before the eyes of men her impressive witness to the infinite saving love of her Lord. Here especially she points men to Him who as the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, and the Eternal High Priest, presents His own perfect sacrifice before the throne, intercedes for His people, and reigns as King (He. 2.–10.; Rv. 5., 7., 13.[8]). Thus she tunes her lyre in harmony with the W. of the Church triumphant and glorified (He. 12.[22f.]; Rv. 4.[9ff.], 5.[8ff.], 7.[9ff.]), and looks forward to her own share in that glory when the Lord shall come (Eph. 5.[25-27]; 1 Cor. 11.[26]). See also Church, Lord's Day, Minister, Praise, Prayer, Preaching.

Lit.: HDB. iv., Worship (in NT.); Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries (1902), Lect. I. (V.), II.; Schaff, History of the Christian Church, first period, II. ix. § 51-7, second period, I. chap. v.; Christian Worship (1897), ten lect. delivered in Union Semin., N.Y.; Bannerman, Script. Doctr. of the Church (1887); Duchesne, Christian Worship (Eng. tr., 1903), ii. § 1.

Robert G. Philip.

WRATH, an emotion caused legitimately by wrong or injustice, but also occasioned by hindrance of plans. This emotion is transferred to the Almighty by anthropomorphism. The Heb. terms used denote the outward signs of this emotion, wh. are ascribed to God: thus āph suggests the distended nostrils and the hard breathing of a man in a passion—this is ascribed to God (Ex. 22.[24]); ḥēmāh, "heat," and ḥārōn, "burning," referring to the flushed and reddened countenance that shows and accompanies human rage; 'ebrāh, "outpouring," the flood of exaggerated and denunciatory language in wh. a man expresses his W.; qetzeph, "splintering," that excess of fury that leads persons to break, to crush, to splinter whatever comes in their way to express their feelings. We cannot speak of Deity except in anthropomorphic terms. This is obvious when the words used imply bodily organs; but this likening of God to man is as really present in attributing human feelings, with all their limitations, to Deity. Yet at the same time that there shd. be some analogy is not only rendered probable, since man is made in the image of God, but is necessary since God has revealed Himself in such terms. With regard to W., human indignation is often Divine wrath finding a human instrument. When, however, we consider any attribute in the Divine Being wh. has a human counterpart, we must free it of all limitations; thus when we speak of Divine love we must free it in our thoughts of everything of caprice or favouritism. So when we speak of the W. of God we must exclude fm. our thoughts everything that savours of caprice or of passionate abandonment to emotion. We reach, when we do this, the idea that W. is the necessary attitude of the Divine nature to Sin—the misuse of the God-given power of self-determination: we know not what Sin really means in its essence and consequence, but God knows, hence the awful meaning of the orgē Theou. We cannot comprehend what it means by piling up epithets; we see it in the sufferings of Christ, but cannot realise more than in the faintest way the anguish that forced from the Sinless One the cry that God had abandoned Him. Yet He bore that W. only as representative of man. We cannot unveil the state of the lost; the figures by wh. our Lord describes it, and those used by John, the apostle of love, make us feel that it is awful. We cannot understand the necessity for this, but necessity there must have been, for the fortuitous has no place in Deity.

WRESTLING. See Games.

WRITING is visible speech. It is the art by which ideas are communicated, committed to suitable materials in significant symbols, and provided with a record for their preservation and publication.

Writing of Primitive Man. —In its most primitive forms writing is found to have been pictorial in character. The picture writing of the American Indians and the cave drawings of the early Bushmen in South Africa are the rude attempts of primitive man to convey to his fellows the conception of material objects in his own mind. It is from such picture writing that the Egyptian hieroglyphic, the ancient Babylonian cuneiform, and the Chinese ideographic forms have been developed. Between this simple pictography and these scripts, not to speak of our highly developed alphabetic writing, there lies a long evolution, the stages of which it is now difficult to trace. The Cretan excavations throw considerable light upon this evolution. There is seen in the clay archives of the palace of Knossos, still undeciphered, evidence of an early pictographic stage, then a hieroglyphic or conventionalised pictographic system growing out of it, and, alongside of this, a linear script much more advanced, to which phonetic values early became attached. In the opinion of Mr. A. J. Evans we have here, if not the actual source of the later Phœnician letters from which the Greek and Roman alphabets have sprung, at least the best illustration of the elements out of which they were evolved.

Ancient Egyptian Scribe

Antiquity of the Art of Writing.—The high antiquity of the art of writing has been established beyond question by the researches and discoveries of the last hundred years. The excavations at Nippur (supposed to be the Calneh of Genesis 10.[10]) have brought to light cuneiform inscriptions belonging to B.C. 3800, which exhibit the art of writing highly advanced, with characters already so far conventionalised that the original pictorial character is entirely lost. Clay tablets more ancient still have been found in the same site, which suggest that writing was practised in Babylonia as early as B.C. 5000 or B.C. 6000. The excavations of Professor Flinders Petrie in the Egyptian royal tombs at Abydos disclosed inscriptions belonging to the earliest dynasties and even earlier, with hieroglyphic writing in archaic forms pointing to B.C. 6000 as their period. It is notable here also that alphabetic signs are already in use, showing that the hieroglyphic system from which these were being evolved was of very ancient date. The discoveries at Knossos include inscribed clay tablets hieroglyphic in character, and they are of special interest as being probably the source of the pre-Phœnician scripts of Greece and the Ægean world.

Of all the discoveries of recent years none is more significant, so far as the scope of this article is concerned, than that of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. They comprise some hundreds of letters found in the mounds of Tel el-Amarna, the ruined site of the temporary capital of Egypt at the close of the eighteenth dynasty, addressed to Amenophis III. and Amenophis IV. of Egypt a whole century before the Exodus. They were written in the cuneiform character by kings, princes, and governors of Babylonia, of Assyria, of Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, who owed allegiance to the Pharaohs reigning on the banks of the Nile. They reveal to us the vastness of the Egyptian empire, which at the time stretched from the Nile to the Euphrates; they show the widespread prevalence of the cuneiform script in the West; and they give interesting indications of the pre-Hebraic, the Canaanite language of Palestine, from which it seems clear that the language of Canaan was essentially identical with the Hebrew. Especially do these letters establish the fact that writing was already in use, not merely for treaties between nations and high concerns of state, but for business and friendship and love, and for all the ordinary purposes of civilised life. They show us writing perfectly developed; the writers not mere professional scribes, but people in varied ranks of life; and the subjects of the letters the intrigues and the gossip of courts, and the quarrels and divisions of officials among themselves. If there were writers there must also have been readers, and the wide prevalence of writing points to considerable literary culture. With such conditions obtaining in Palestine and Western Asia, with the art of writing, though in character different from the Hebrew, so widely practised, the means was already at hand for committing to a written record those family histories and national traditions which are found in Genesis and the other books of the Pentateuch.

Ancient Hebrew Writing.—The Old Testament gives no hint of the time or manner of the introduction of writing among the Hebrews. It would be interesting to know how long the Babylonian cuneiform continued to be the prevalent script in Canaan. It was practised in Jerusalem and elsewhere in the land, as we see from the Tel el-Amarna correspondence, and some have maintained that it held its ground down to the days of Hezekiah. Materials for a decision on the question at present fail us. It is interesting to learn that contract tables in the Assyrian language and character have been found in recent excavations at Gezer. A date has been assigned to them about the middle of the seventh century B.C., in the reign of Manasseh, but they may only point to the Assyrian occupation of Palestine and its influence in Manasseh's day.

The Israelites brought with them when they settled in Canaan no script peculiarly their own, but adopted the Phœnician alphabet which they found already in the land, and which was common to most Semitic peoples—to Moabites and Syrians as well as Hebrews. The origin of the Phœnician or old Semitic alphabet has not been conclusively determined. Some scholars would derive it from the Egyptian in its hieratic form; others from the Assyrian cuneiform; others from the still mysterious Hittite characters; and others maintain its Babylonian origin, ascribing the twelve original consonants to the twelve signs of the Zodiac. We have seen how Cretan excavations have opened up other possibilities of its development.

The earliest appearance of Semitic alphabetic writing of any considerable account is on the Moabite Stone, discovered at Dibon, 25 miles east of the Dead Sea, in 1868, and now among the treasures of the Louvre in Paris. The monument commemorates the victory of Mesha, king of Moab, over Jehoram, king of Israel, and the mention of Mesha corroborates the narrative of 2nd Kings (3.[3]). It belongs to about B.C. 850, and the inscription consists of thirty-four lines, the form of the letters being already cursive. From Palestine proper there is the Siloam inscription discovered in the wall of the tunnel connecting the Virgin's Fountain with the Pool of Siloam, some 19 ft. or 20 ft. from its outflow into the Pool. As the construction of the tunnel has been ascribed to king Hezekiah (2 K. 20.[20]), and as the inscription is believed to refer to its completion by his builders, the writing may belong to the end of the eighth or the beginning of the seventh century B.C. Until the present year (1909), these were the only inscriptions of any considerable length bearing witness to the form of the old Hebrew script. Now from the excavations at Gezer there comes what is agreed to be a calendar inscription, discovered by Mr. R. A. S. Macalister in the course of 1908, and written in the same type of Hebrew script as the Siloam inscription and that of the Moabite Stone. The fortunate discoverer places the date in the sixth century B.C., but Prof. Lidzbarski, a careful and learned epigraphist, takes it to be much older, and reckons it perhaps the oldest Hebrew inscription extant—at all events one of the oldest of the Semitic inscriptions. But modifications from an early period are found taking place in the characters. This is observed in the inscriptions obtained in the excavations at Sinjirli, believed to date from the eighth century, which exhibit partly the archaic type represented by the Moabite Stone and partly the Aramaic type of the Semitic alphabet. The old Hebrew script has been found also in pre-exilic times on seals and weights and jar handles discovered at Jerusalem, Tell eṣ-Ṣāfi, Tell Zakarīya, and other places where excavation has been carried on.

SILOAM INSCRIPTION

Quite recently a new chapter has been added to the story of the Old Hebrew by the discovery in 1904 of several rolls of Aramaic papyri at Assouan, far up the Nile. As they are dated, they are decisive witnesses. They cover a large part of the fifth century B.C., from B.C. 471 to B.C. 411. The documents afford proof that within a century after the death of Jeremiah a colony of Jews had found their way to Assouan, and had acquired houses and other property, and were engaged in trade as bankers and money-lenders. The historical and religious interest of these papyri is great, and scarcely less is their palæographic and literary interest. By this find, Professor Sayce affirms, new words and meanings are added to the Aramaic dictionary, and new forms or idioms to Aramaic grammar, while the origin of Biblical Chaldee is at length explained to us. While the language is Aramaic, the written characters are of the Old Hebrew type, only assimilated somewhat to the ordinary square characters with which we are familiar.

The square character, according to Jewish tradition, followed by the early Christian fathers, and by many scholars still, is to be attributed to Ezra, who brought the new forms of the letters with him on his return with the company of exiles in B.C. 458. It is more likely that the transition from the archaic script to the square character came gradually. Very likely it began among the Jews of Mesopotamia and Babylon, and then spread over the Aramaic-speaking world, including Egypt. After the Maccabæan persecution and the destruction of copies of the law by the Syrian oppressors of Israel, the manuscripts produced to replace the lost copies may have been written in the square or Aramaic character. Judas Maccabæus gathered together "all those writings that had been scattered by reason of the war that befell, and they are still with us," is the testimony of the Maccabæan chronicler (2 M. 2.14). The Samaritans, however, adhered to the archaic characters, and their Pentateuch is the only literary representation of the Old Hebrew script which survives. The transition from the old script to the square type was complete by the Christian era, for the reference to yodh as the smallest letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Mw. 5.18) would have no significance as applied to the older form, which is not by any means diminutive.

From the time of Ezra, who is described as "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ez. 7.6), attention to written Scripture undoubtedly increased, and the work of the scribes in copying and transmitting the sacred books became of great importance. In the synagogue rolls the writing is in unpointed Hebrew—that is, Hebrew without the vowel points—to this day. But when Hebrew as a living language was passing away, those who were in possession of "the tradition" (Heb. Massora), called the Massoretes, devised a system of punctuation by which to represent the proper vowels and continue the correct pronunciation. The Hebrew text thus supplied with vowel signs is called the Massoretic text. Manuscripts containing the Hebrew text, which were fit for synagogue use only when written on the skins of clean animals and in the square character, are not to be found earlier than the ninth century A.D. Of the New Testament there are manuscripts as early as the fourth century; but despite the lack of early copies, so carefully has the Hebrew text of the Old Testament been preserved, that the revisers of 1884 thought it most prudent to adopt the Massoretic text as the basis of their work, and to depart from it, as the Authorised Version did, only in exceptional cases.

Ancient Greek Writing.—It has long been held that the Greek and Roman alphabets were derived from the Phœnician, and the legend of Cadmus claims for Bœotia the glory of having been the birthplace of the Greek alphabet. The Cretan excavations, however, have discovered evidence that forms identical with many of the later Greek letters were in use for technical purposes in the Ægean world centuries before the introduction of the Phœnician alphabet. Cadmus and the Phœnician writings, it is now suggested, may only be one of the earliest Greek traditions of men who used the script of Knossos. The letters of the original Greek alphabet are the same in number as the Phœnician and Hebrew, and agree with them in name, arrangement, and form. As the Semitic languages were written from right to left, so it was with the earliest Greek. This was followed by the style called boustrophedon, alternately from right to left and from left to right, as the ox draws the plough. The earliest Greek inscriptions to which a date can be assigned, the inscriptions cut on the gigantic figure of Rameses II. at Abu Simbel on the Nile by Greek mercenaries in the Egyptian army about B.C. 600, show writing from left to right, and this method by-and-by became universal. Inscriptions on monuments were engraved in capital letters, called Uncials, a form in which the letters were not joined together but set down side by side. This form of writing was also employed for books, and from the third century before Christ, to which recently recovered papyri go back, we can trace its peculiarities in notable examples. Alongside of the uncial characters, even before the Christian era, the Cursive and smaller form, in which the letters were joined, arose. This running hand becomes common in manuscripts of the New Testament from the ninth century onwards.

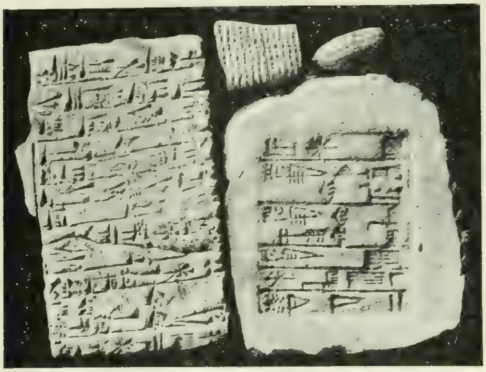
Materials used to receive Writing.—Stone and rock must have been among the earliest writing materials. The Moabite Stone and the Rosetta Stone are examples of a multitude of such. The Rock of Behistun, with its three different types of cuneiform, played an important part in the decipherment of the script by Grotefend and Rawlinson seventy years ago. There are indications of the Egyptian origin of the book of Job, and it may be one of them when he prays that his words may be "graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever" (Jb. 19.24). From the mounds that cover the ancient cities of Babylonia and Assyria it is estimated that there have come not less than 160,000 clay tablets inscribed with cuneiform characters. Cylinders, vases, and bricks of the same material bearing inscriptions of considerable length, or only an explanatory docket, or a royal name, survive in abundance. It was possibly clay tablets of which Isaiah (8.1) and Jeremiah (17.1) were thinking when they wrote; and the tile on which Ezekiel (4.1) was to portray Jerusalem would be a brick of clay not yet dry. Wood was largely in use in the form of tablets before the introduction of papyrus (Is. 30.8; Hb. 2.2). We have an instance of wood in the "writing table"—a wooden tablet smeared with wax—on which Zacharias (Lk. 1.63) wrote the name of the infant John the Baptist. Of recent years quite a literature has been gathered from ostraca—shells, tiles, potsherds, on which accounts and business documents were written in the common Greek spoken in the Delta from the



INSCRIBED BRICKS · ANCIENT BABYLONIA

2nd cent. B.C. onwards. No traces, however, of NT. Lit. have been found on them. Linen and leather were also in use in Egypt, Assyria, and Persia.

The two materials which have carried down to us the greatest treasures of ancient literature are papyrus and parchment. Papyrus was a product of Egyptian growth (Is. 18.[2] RV.), and papyrus writing, which in any other soil or climate would have been sure to perish, has been preserved in the tombs and the sands of Egypt from a very high antiquity. The Papyrus Prisse in the National Library at Paris was originally written in Egyptian hieratic script in the reign of Assa (B.C. 3580-3536), and copied on to the papyrus now in existence some time in the Twelfth Dynasty (2778-2565). The Assouan papyri, to which reference has been made, are the oldest representatives of Aramaic or Hebrew in this material. The Greek papyri recovered from the sands of Egypt, from Memphis and Saqqāra, from Akhmim, Oxyrhynchus, and the Fayoum, are numerous and precious. They include fragments of the Phædo of Plato (copied, it is believed, within a hundred years of the death of the author), of the lost Antiope of Euripides, and of other notable works. Most remarkable of all was the recovery of Aristotle's treatise on the Constitution of Athens, a work which had been lost to scholarship for a thousand years. Papyri containing Biblical passages are comparatively rare. The originals of the New Testament books, and copies direct from them, would from frequent use have perished early. From Oxyrhynchus there has come quite recently a papyrus of the fourth century containing about a third of the Epistle to the Hebrews; and there are fragments of Old Testament books, of the Gospels, and of St. Paul's epistles, amounting in all to a few hundred verses. Even these, however, are of value for the determination of the text of the New Testament books. "The Sayings of the Lord," the New Sayings, and a Fragment of a lost Gospel—an Apocryphal writing brought from Oxyrhynchus by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt—are believed to be of the third century, and are also of interest and value. Whilst thus far the Egyptian papyri have preserved only fragments of the Christian Scriptures, they have immensely enlarged our acquaintance with the common Greek of the times of the Lord and His apostles, and with its peculiarities of verbal usage and grammar and syntax. They have thus furnished most helpful illustrations of the language of the New Testament writers, and provided additional and important aids to the interpretation of our sacred books. Papyrus is referred to in 2 Jn.[12], where the Greek word is translated "paper."

Parchment, being of greater durability and being more generally procurable, and being, moreover, adopted by preference for Jewish and Christian books, obtained ultimately the supremacy for all literary purposes. Down to the beginning of the fourth century Bibles were to be found on papyrus rolls as well as in parchment codices or books. Even then, however, codices were more numerous and held to be of greater value. When Constantine instructed Eusebius of Cæsarea to prepare for him fifty Bibles for use in Christian Churches now that Christianity was the religion of the empire, it was on parchment that they were written, and our two great manuscript Greek Bibles, the Sinaitic and the Vatican codices, are with good reason believed to be two of the fifty. From that time onwards the parchment codex became the rule, and held its ground till the invention of printing and the use of paper superseded it. Parchment was prepared from the skins of goats, sheep, calves, asses, antelopes. The Sinaitic manuscript is written on very fine parchment or vellum, believed to be from the skins of antelopes, though this is questioned in view of the difficulty of obtaining them in sufficient number for such a large book. The difficulty is seen when it is remembered that each sheet of two leaves would have required a single skin. Parchment owes its name and its wide diffusion as a writing material before our era to the encouragement of Eumenes II. of Pergamum (B.C. 197–159), who being prevented by the jealousy of the reigning Ptolemy from obtaining papyrus for his literary enterprises from Egypt, set himself to manufacture parchment and called it pergamené. Whilst parchment under this name dates from the second century before Christ, the use of vellum prepared from skins was of much greater antiquity. It was early adopted by the Jews. Josephus mentions a splendid roll of the law written upon vellum in letters of gold, which was sent from Jerusalem to Ptolemy Philadelphus about B.C. 285. For the synagogue rolls it was strictly enjoined that the skins of clean animals and no others were to be prepared. The books copied and multiplied by the scribes from the time of Ezra downwards must have had much the same appearance as the rolls of the law still in use in the synagogue. There are references to the roll in various Biblical passages: the roll written within and without of Ezekiel's prophecy—written on both sides, which was customary in documents prepared solely for preservation (Ek. 2.[9]); the roll of a book written with the words of God against Israel by Baruch as Jeremiah's amanuensis, and afterwards contemptuously cut in pieces and cast into the fire by Jehoiakim the king of Judah (Jr. 36.[2, 23]), although here the mention of leaves suggests papyrus as the material; the scroll rolled up (Rv. 6.[4]); the roll of the book (Hb. 10.[7]). The parchments (2 Tm. 3.[13]) asked for by St. Paul besides the books may have been clean, unused sheets.

MODERN EGYPTIAN WRITING MATERIALS

1, Egyptian Scribe writing on Tablet; 2, 3, Cases for Writing Materials

Of writing implements there is mention. The iron pen, or stylus, was used when the writing was on stone (Ex. 32.[16]), or the rock (Jb. 19.[24]), or clay. But the reed pen (kalamus) is used when parchment or papyrus is the substance receiving the writing (Jr. 36.[2, 23]; 2 J.[13]). The ink used was generally black (Jr. 36.[18]; 2 Cor. 3.[3]; 2 J.[12]; 3 J.[13]), but in MSS. of the NT. and in some of the versions, red, blue, green and yellow inks are found. Ezekiel (9.[2, 3, 4]) tells us of the ink-horn, a case for holding the reed pens, with an ink-holder attached near the mouth of the case, wh. hung from the girdle. It has been suggested that "the cloke" urgently required by St. Paul (2 Tm. 3.[13]) was the leather case for holding his rolls, but it was more likely a wrap to cover him in his rigorous imprisonment.

Writing in the Old Testament.—From what has been said of the prevalence of writing in Canaan and in the countries bordering upon it from an antiquity much higher than the days of Moses, it can scarcely be doubted that writing was practised from the earliest days of Israelitish history. There is, indeed, no reference to writing at the purchase by Abraham of the cave of Machpelah (Gn. 23.), but not far from Hebron was Debir, known of old as Kirjath-Sepher, Book-Town, or Scribe-Town, where there may have been a library. The frequency with which the verb to write (kāthabh) occurs in the Hebrew Scriptures—over two hundred times—suggests that the art was widely known and was not confined to a professional class. That there were official or professional writers we know from the frequent mention of such functionaries. The "officers" (shoṭĕrim) mentioned in Exodus (5.[6, 10, 14, 15, 19]), Numbers (11.[16]), Deuteronomy (1.[15], 29.[10], &c.), Joshua (1.[10]), and elsewhere, appear to have had secretarial as well as other duties. At the court of David, and at a later time, there was a recorder, or official annalist, as well as a scribe, or secretary, to whom were entrusted the drafting and keeping of official documents. The practice of the art is assumed in what is said of the Tables of the Testimony "written on both their sides," "the writing of God graven upon the tables," "written by the finger of God" (Ex. 31.[18], 32.[15]), given to Moses and containing the Ten Commandments. The knowledge of the art is implied in the blotting of the name out of God's book (Ex. 32.[32, 33]), and in the priest blotting out the curses with the water of bitterness (Nu. 5.[23]), and such like. The book of Jashar (Jo. 10.[13]; 2 S. 1.[18]) and the book of the Wars of the Lord (Nu. 21.[14]) were undoubtedly early written documents. Joshua (8.[31]) wrote a copy of the law of Moses in the presence of the children of Israel. The young man whom Gideon caught at Succoth "wrote down for him" (Jg. 8.[14]) the officials of Succoth and its elders. Samuel, when he had told the people "the manner of the kingdom," wrote it in a book (1 S. 10.[25]). We read of a letter from David to Joab (2 S. 11.[14]) containing the death-warrant of Uriah, and of a letter from the king of Syria to the king of Israel (2 K. 5.[5]), and of the letter of the Assyrian conqueror which Hezekiah spread before the Lord (2 K. 19.[14]). By the time we reach the earliest of the writing prophets we read of a written Torah or Law (Ho. 8.[14]), and Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel are all familiar with writing and gifted with the art. Ezra is "the scribe" by pre-eminence, and from his day onward reading and writing became an essential part of the "education" of Jewish youth. For Lit. see Addenda, p. lx.

Thomas Nicol.

X

XERXES. See AHASUERUS.

Y

YARN. This word appears twice in AV. (1 K. 10.[28] = 2 Ch. 1.[16]), and in RV. twice (Pr. 7.[16]; Ek. 27.[19]). We are told that king "Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn: the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price." The word here is miqweh, wh. we should almost certainly understand as RV., and read "received them in droves, each drove at a price." In Pr. 7.[16] the word is 'ēṭūn, of unknown etymology. It can hardly be "fine linen" (AV.); it probably means thread or yarn (RV.). In Ek. 27.[19] the rendering "with yarn" cannot be defended. See UZAL; also SPINNING and WEAVING.

YEA AND NAY. In old English "yea" and "nay" answered questions which were framed in the affirmative; "yes" and "no," those framed in the negative. From ancient times in the East the simple response has not been deemed sufficient for assurance; it must be strengthened by some form of oath. But where a man's simple word is not trusted, this impairs the sense of sincerity in common speech; and the unhappy fact is that familiarity with even the most solemn forms of oath breeds a sort of contempt, and they are played with as lightly as the terms they were designed to strengthen, so that confidence in men's truthfulness tends to disappear. Of this there is ample evidence in the East to-day; where oaths are upon every lip in abundance, but where none will trust his fellow's word. This helps us to understand the necessity for Christ's exhortation (Mw. 5.[37]), and that of James (5.[12]). Whatsoever is more than "yea" or "nay" "cometh of sin," i.e. is due to the wicked looseness as to the obligation of truthfulness, which shakes man's confidence, making necessary an appeal to a higher power, to vindicate the truth if falsehood is spoken.

YEAR. As all our measurements of time are really founded on motions of the earth—supplemented in regard to the month by those of the moon—we can begin the study of these measurements most naturally with the year, the longest of motions. Genetically the first measure of time recognised wd. necessarily be the "day"—the space of time fm. one sunrise or sunset to another. The revolution of the earth on its axis gave the first period, with its succession of "day" and "night," wh. was endlessly repeated. The next repetition with wh. men wd. become acquainted wd. be the phases of the moon. The splendour of the moon in Egypt and SW. Asia cd. not fail to attract any one who was abroad at night; this wd. lead speedily to observing its waxing and waning, its disappearance in the radiance of the sun, and its reappearance as a thread-like crescent. This supplied a second shānāh, or "repetition." To those living beyond the tropics the succession of summer and winter wd. be as observable as day and night; even within the tropics there are other seasons, but not as noticeable. This wd. be reinforced by the observation of the stars. In Egypt and the hither East the stars are much more striking objects than they are in cloudier climates, and very early they were grouped in constellations. The stars that occupied the region of the heaven at night through wh. the sun passed during the day were regarded as of special significance. The sun's course among the stars as they reckoned it, the earth's revolution round the sun as we recognise it to be, marked off the year. When men passed fm. the nomadic to the agricultural stage, the operations of husbandry gave an additional meaning to the "Year."

The Year.—The relation in wh. these various units stood to each other one can easily imagine wd. soon compel consideration. It is possible that the Babylonians, with that fondness for a duodecimal system of numeration wh. they handed down to us, divided the Zodiac into twelve "houses," irrespective of the fact that twelve lunations or lunar months nearly coincided with the time occupied by the sun's cycle in the heavens. Though borrowing so much fm. Babylon, the Jewish Y. was fundamentally a lunar one; to the Jews the Y. was an aggregate of months, the month was not a section of a year. In Ex. 12.[2] the Israelites were commanded to observe the Passover on the 14th day of the month Abib (afterwards Nisan), and it was to be to them "the beginning of months, the first month of the year." Such a command appears to imply that before this the Y. had begun at another date. The presumption wd. be that this command was obeyed throughout the history of Israel. Though the passage (Ex. 12.[1-20]) is credited by certain critics to P. and declared to be post-exilic, yet no priestly writer wd. be able to presume that the fifty years in Babylon had obliterated fm. the memory of the scores of survivors how they had been accustomed to reckon the months of the year.

Professor Marti asserts: "There is absolutely no evidence for any such system before the Exile" (EB.). His sole evidence for his belief that the year began with Tishri is the phrase in Ex. 23.[16], "the end of the year," referring to the "Feast of Ingathering," wh. was otherwise called the "Feast of Tabernacles," and a similar phrase in Ex. 34.[22]. The whole passage has reference to the operations of husbandry. On the other side Solomon "began to build the house of the Lord in the second month, the month Zif." No one in Pal. wd. begin building in November, whereas May wd. be quite natural; further, Zif is the month of flowers: no flowers can be gathered in November. Again, Jeroboam made a feast on the 15th of the eighth month (1 K. 12.[32]), "a month wh. he had devised of his own heart," "like unto the feast that is in Judah"; the feast was on the 15th of Tishri, wh. in regard to the feasts was called the seventh month: Jeroboam had reckoned fm. April. In Jeremiah 36.[22] we are told of king Jehoiakim that he "sat in the winter house in the ninth month, and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him." If the ninth month were December, we can understand the winter house and the brazier, but not if it is the month of June. Comment is superfluous.

As they seem to have known the average length of the solar Y., there must have been some method of adjusting the year of twelve lunar months to it. The Jews have a cycle of nineteen years, in the course of wh. they introduce in seven of these years an intercalary month, Veadar (lit. "and Adar"). There are traces of a division into seasons: God promises, after the Flood has passed away, that "seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease" (Gn. 8.[22]); here "cold and heat" appear to suggest a twofold division of the Y. according to the prevalent lower or higher temperature. There remain four seasons that are here named consecutively: "seed-time" (zera') and "harvest" (qātzīr) mean respectively November to the end of January, and fm. then to the end of April or the beginning of May. Then follows "summer" (qītz) with its numerous varieties of soft fruits, June and July; "winter," or perhaps "vintage" (ḥoreph), September and October: it may be that the qor wa ḥom, the "cold and heat," refer to the months of February and August, respectively the coldest and hottest months of the year in Pal.

We have further to consider the way in wh. separate years were determined. There were no "eras" in general use in SW. Asia during the period embraced in OT. history, hence years were designated by their place in the reign of each successive sovereign. This method of dating involved several difficulties, when regarded as a general system; one of the most obvious was the difficulty of determining how to designate the year of a king's accession. To reckon his regnal year as counting fm. the day he ascended the throne wd. involve practically a new calendar with each reign; in Israel, however small a portion of a year was to run on his accession, that whole year was reckoned the first of the given king. In this way every year in wh. a change of sovereign occurred was counted twice. It was the last year of the late king, and the first year of the new. The Babylonians remedied this by calling the months wh. had to elapse till the first New Year after a king's accession "the beginnings of his reign." In Maccabæan times the era of the Seleucids was the one generally in use. There were attempts made to form a purely Jewish era, starting fm. the Creation, reckoned by "weeks of years" and by "jubilees." There are traces of this in Enoch, chap. 92.; and the whole chronology of the book of Jubilees is built up on it. There is, however, no evidence of its use beyond the Apocalyptic school. There is an interesting if somewhat amusing exposition of the length of the year and the cause of the lengthening and shortening of the day in Enoch, chap. 79.; the year is reduced to 364 days, so that there mt. be exactly fifty-two weeks in it. As to the lengthening and shortening of the day, the writer declares "that in midsummer the day is to the night as ten is to eight, and that in winter it is the converse."

Month.—To a nomadic people the phases of the moon were very important, so it was but natural that there shd. be feasts at New Moon and at Full Moon. Fm. the week of seven days being in use in Babylon as well as among the Jews, it wd. seem that the month was reckoned as having twenty-eight days, each phase having seven days. The next hypothesis, also emanating fm. Babylon, seems to have been to make it consist of thirty days; twelve of these months wd. go to the year. It wd. soon be found that if twenty-eight days was too short, thirty days was too long; it was found that twenty-nine days and a half was a close approximation. It was thus arranged that the months shd. be alternately twenty-nine and thirty days. The lunar year thus reached was found to be much too short. As the Jewish festivals had a close connection with agriculture, a purely lunar year soon was at variance, so we have seen they adopted a system of intercalary months. While the months are often spoken of numerically as first or second, they had also names. There were first names the Israelites shared with the Canaanites, of wh. some four have been recorded in Scripture—Abib, Zif, Ethanim, and Bul: some of these are found on Phœnician inscriptions, e.g. Bul in the Eshmunazar inscription and Ethanim in that unearthed in Cyprus. With the Exile they became acquainted with the Babylonian names of the months and adopted them. Of these seven are mentioned in the Bible: Nisan (Ne. 2.[1]; Est. 3.[7]), Chisleu (Ne. 1.[1]), Sivan (Est. 8.[9]), Elul (Ne. 6.[15]), Sebat (Zc. 1.[7]), Tebeth (Est. 2.[16]), Adar (Ez. 6.[15]); the remaining five, though not found in Scripture, occur in the Talmud; Iyyar, Tammuz, Ab, Tishri, Marḥesvan. Anciently the month began when some one cd. testify that he had seen the New Moon, but later, when the various elements of uncertainty were fully appreciated, it was fixed by calculation.

The following table may be found useful :—

NAMES OF MONTHS

Names mentioned in Pre-exilic Times	Names after the Exile*		Macedonian Names used in Seleucid Era	Approximately corresponding to
	Hebrew	Assyrian
Abib (Ex. 13.4) . .	Nisan	Nisannu	Lōos	April
Zif (1 K.6.1) . . .	Iyyar	Airu	Gorpiæus	May
	Sivan	Sivanu	Hyperberetæus	June
	Tammuz	Dusu	Dius	July
	Ab	Abu	Apellæus	August
	Elul	Ululu	Audynæus	September
Ethanim (1 K.8.2) .	Tishri	Tasritu	Peritius	October
Bul (1 K.6.38) . . .	Marḥesvan	Arah-samna	Dystrus	November
	Kisleu	Kisilivu	Xanthicus	December
	Tebet	Debitu	Artemisius	January
	Sebat	Sabatu	Dæsius	February
	Adar	Addaru	Panēmus	March
	Intercalary month, Veadar; Assyrian Mahru sa Addaru. The Assyrians, accdg. to G. Smith, sometimes had a second Nisannu, or a second Ululu, instead of Mahru sa Addaru.		Dioscorinthius is named in 2 M. 11.30, 33, 38. Scaliger and Ideler thought this the intercalary month before Xanthicus. Some have thought it a mistake for Dystrus.

* The names not mentioned in the Bible are derived from Talmudic sources.

Week.—Though at first sight this appears not to be founded as are the month and the year, this, as we saw above, was only apparent; it was regarded as the quarter of the month. The group of seven days was emphasised to the Babylonians by being associated with the seven planets; to the Jew it was sanctified by the seven days of Creation. As we have seen, there was an attempt to group the years in "weeks" of seven; seven of these plus one is a jubilee of half a century.

Day.—The revolution of the earth gave, as we have already said, the earliest measure of time. With the Israelites, as with several other Semitic peoples, the day was reckoned fm. evening to evening. This mode of reckoning is seen in Gn. 1.5, 8, 13f.; singularly Nowack sees in this, and the fact that the Passover lamb was slain in the evening, an evidence that a mode of counting fm. morning to morning was also used: it is difficult to see wherein the evidence consists. The primary division of the twenty-four hours was naturally into day and night. While the Babylonians divided both day and night into hours, the Hebrew divisions were much simpler and vaguer. The night was divided into three watches ('ashmuroth); it is impossible to discover by what means they found the beginning or end of the middle "watch." In NT. times the Roman division of the night into four watches, "evening," "midnight," "cock-crowing," and "morning," was in use. In the same way the day was divided into three, "morning," "midday," "evening." In the later times under Roman rule, the day was divided into twelve hours. This hour, however, was not, like the Roman hours, the twenty-fourth of the time of the earth's revolution, but the twelfth part of the space between sunrise and sunset (cp. Jn. 11.9, "Are there not twelve hours in the day?"): the hours thus varied in length.

YELLOW. See Colour.

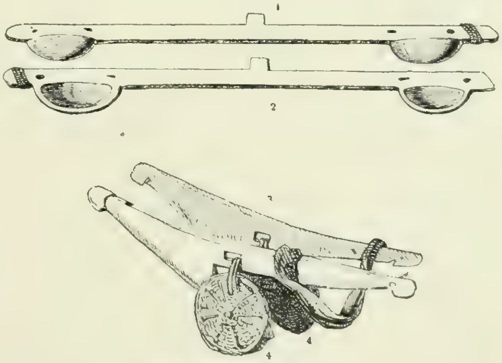
YOKE. Of the Heb. terms so trd. mōṭ or moṭah is the bar of the yoke which is laid across the necks of the oxen, so called probably from the shaking or springing motion to which it was subjected (Na. 1.13; Is. 58.6, &c.). 'Ōl refers especially to the attachment, where the necks of the beasts are "thrust into" the yoke (Gn. 27.40, &c.). Tzemed, "a pair," was applied to the "span" of oxen,



Yoke of Ancient Plough
1, 2, back and front of yoke; 3, shoulder pieces; 4, 4, matting to prevent friction of shoulders coupled together by the yoke, hence called a "yoke" of oxen (1 S. 11.[7], &c.). To this corresponds the Greek zeugma (Lk. 14.[19]). It also corresponds to the Arabic feddān, being applied to the area of land which might be ploughed by a yoke of oxen in a season (1 S. 14.[14]). The yoke consists of the bar with hollows in its under surface, laid across the necks of the animals, a hollow resting upon the neck of each, with bows going down each side of the neck, in front of the shoulders, by which it is tied in position. The pole of the plough is attached to the middle of the cross bar, and the team is ready for work. That the yokes should fit easily, so as not to fret the necks of the patient animals, was of the greatest importance. Jesus had learned this from practical experience in the workshop at Nazareth. With the well-fitting yoke even a heavy draught had no terrors (Mw. 11.[29f.]). Yoke is often used figuratively for subjection (1 K. 12.[4], &c.), an "iron yoke" being an oppression of an unusually bitter and hopeless kind. St. Paul uses it in the sense of burdensome requirements unnecessarily imposed upon Christians (Ac. 15.[10]), and also of the bondage endured by those who limit the freedom of Christ (Gal. 5.[1]) by legal restrictions.

YOKEFELLOW (Gr. sunzugos). Some have thought that this word, occurring in Php. 4.[3], should be taken as a proper name. It is, however, found nowhere else; and the ordinary meaning, "yokefellow," may rather point to a disciple who was distinguished as having been a co-worker with the apostle in some field of labour. As he is asked to use his good offices to secure the reconciliation of Euodias and Syntyche, he may possibly have been the chief ruler in the church at Philippi. Renan suggested that possibly Lydia was meant, she having become the wife of St. Paul, but there is nothing to support the suggestion.

Z

ZAANAIM, THE PLAIN OF, RV. ZAANANNIM, THE OAK OF (Jg. 4.[11]). RV. is the correct rendering. It points to an oak, apparently conspicuous, and probably a sacred tree, where Heber the Kenite had pitched his tent. It was near Kedesh, and Sisera, fleeing from the battle in the plain of Esdraelon, was able to reach it on foot. Kedesh was therefore not the famous city of refuge, KEDESH NAPHTALI, on the heights to the W. of the WATERS OF MEROM, but probably the town which is represented by the mod. Kedes, on the SW. of the Sea of Galilee. Possibly the name should be read Bezaanannim; and Conder has suggested that it may be found in the mod. Khirbet Bessum, c. three miles NE. of Mount Tabor.

ZAANAN, a town in the Judæan Shephelah, mentioned by Micah (1.[11]), with a punning play upon its name. "The inhabitants of Tza'anān, went not forth" (yātzĕ'āh), i.e. stayed in through fear of the enemy; as if the name were derived from yātzā, to go, or come out. It is probably the same place as ZENAN.

ZAAVAN, a Horite chief descended from Seir (Gn. 36.[27]; 1 Ch. 1.[42]; AV. "Zavan"), the name-father of a tribe which has not been identified.

ZABAD. This name, and derivatives from it, occur thirty-six times in the OT., most frequently in the books of Chronicles (twenty-three times). They are found also in Nabatæan and Palmyrene inscriptions. It is a shortened form of ZEBADIAH, ZABDIEL, and means "he hath given," or "gift." The occurrences are mainly in the later books of the OT. (1) Zabad, son of Nathan, son of Ahlai the daughter of Sheshan, who had married Jarha, the Egyptian slave of her father (1 Ch. 2.[36]). The genealogy as it stands in this chap. is interesting, and may be drawn out as an illustration of such documents. It begins with 1, Judah, and proceeds: 2, Pharez; 3, Hezron; 4, Jerahmeel; 5, Onam; 6, Shammai; 7, Nadab; 8, Appaim; 9, Ishi; 10, Sheshan; 11, Ahlai (married Jarha); 12, Attai; 13, Nathan; 14, Zabad; 15, Ephlal; 16, Obed; 17, Jehu; 18, Azariah; 19, Helez; 20, Eleasah; 21, Sisamai; 22, Shallum; 23, Jekamiah; 24, Elishama. This seems to place Zabad about the time of David, fourteen generations from Judah. We are therefore led to identify him with David's hero, Zabad the son of Ahlai, i.e. her descendant (1 Ch. 11.[41]), of whose exploits, however, nothing is known. As a further confirmation, AZARIAH, son—i.e. descendant—of Obed, lived in the time of Athaliah's usurpation (2 Ch. 23.[1]). He was the fourth from Zabad, as Jehoram was the sixth from David.

It is further of interest to observe that he is called the son—i.e. descendant—of his ancestress Ahlai, not of Jarha. Perhaps this is because she had married a foreigner, who might not lightly be introduced into a genealogy. Thus David's nephews, Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, are always called sons of Zeruiah, who also had married a foreigner. There are, however, other cases of men who are called "sons" of their female progenitor—sons of Keturah (Gn. 25.[4]), sons of Adah (Gn. 36.[12]), sons of Basemath (Gn. 36.[17]). (2) An Ephraimite (1 Ch. 7.[21]). (3) Son of Shimeath, an Ammonitess, one of the murderers of king Joash (2 Ch. 24.[26]). The name is given as JOZACHAR, which is probably the correct form, in 2 K. 12.[21]. He was executed by AMAZIAH, son of Joash, along with his companion in guilt, but their children were spared, in obedience to the law of Dt. 24.[16]. (4), (5), (6) Israelites who had married foreign wives (Ez. 10.[27, 33, 43]).

ZABBAI. (1) A member of the family of Bebai, who had married a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ez. 10.[28]). In 1 Es. 9.[29] he is called "Josabad." (2) Father of Baruch, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[20]). In Heb. the Qerē gives "Zaccai," with which in some scripts it might easily be confused: זבי for זכי. The latter name is found in Ez. 2.[9]; Ne. 7.[14]. From this comes the name ZACCHEUS.

ZABBUD, a son of Bigvai, who returned from exile with Ezra (8.[14]). Here Qerē has "Zaccur"—זכור for זבוד. In 1 Es. 8.[40] this name is curiously transformed into "Istalcurus."

ZABDI, "my gift," or perhaps "gift to me." (1) Ancestor of Achan, son of Zerah, the son of Judah (Jo. 7.[1, 17, 18]). His name is given as "Zimri" in 1 Ch. 2.[6]. (2) One of the sons of Shimhi, a Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.[19]). (3) The Shiphmite, i.e. probably a native of Shapham, an otherwise unknown place. He was David's officer, having charge of the produce of the vineyards for the wine cellars (1 Ch. 27.[27]). (4) A Levite, son of Asaph (Ne. 11.[17]). Possibly we should read "Zichri" as in 1 Ch. 9.[15]. The name is also given as Zaccur in Ne. 12.[35].

ZABDIEL, "my gift is God." (1) Father of Jashobeam, the captain of the first course of David's guards (1 Ch. 27.[2]). (2) Son of Haggedolim (RV.), a prominent Hebrew in the time of Nehemiah. He had charge of 128 of his brethren, "mighty men of valour," after the return from Babylon (Ne. 11.[14]).

ZABUD, son of Nathan (1 K. 4.[5]) = ZABAD (1).

ZACCHÆUS. A "chief publican" or tax-collector, whose station was at Jericho. The story of his meeting with Jesus is told only by St. Luke (19.[1-10]). His profession was lucrative, but being a Jew (v. 9), his wealth did not protect him from the contempt in which all his class was held (see PUBLICAN). He was no doubt accustomed to the black looks and disdain of Israel's religious leaders, and hoped for no kindness from them. His interest in Jesus was probably aroused by hearing of the call of Matthew. It was a strange new thing that a Jewish teacher should care, even a little, for a publican. He would fain see this Man. He would not care to risk himself in a Jewish crowd, where, in any case, being short of stature, he might easily fail of his purpose. Jesus was passing with the Galilee caravan of pilgrims going up to Jerusalem. Knowing the path to be followed, Zacchæus went in advance, and concealed himself in the foliage of a SYCOMORE TREE, the branches of which probably overhung the road at no great height. Here he was seen by Jesus, and the ever-memorable interview took place. Zacchæus wd. not venture to invite Him under his roof, but Jesus invited Himself, to the publican's great joy; and actually sat down to eat with him—an act of greater significance in the East than among us. The Jews noted the fact, with censure. Jesus defended this action. If Zacchæus was a sinner, it was to seek and to save such that the Son of Man came.

We need not regard the account given of himself to Jesus as boastful (v. 8). It was possibly designed to show that even a publican could have some regard to the requirements of Divine law, and could respond to the appeal of humanity. The evidence that Jesus expected some good of him woke up all the best elements in the man, preparing him to receive the greatest gift (v. 9). Nothing further is recorded regarding Zacchæus.

ZACCUR. (1) Father of Shammua, who represented the tribe of Reuben among the spies (Nu. 13.[4]). (2) A Simeonite, son of Hammuel, and father of Shimei (1 Ch. 4.[26]). (3) Son of Jaaziah, a Merarite Levite (1 Ch. 24.[27]). (4) A son of Asaph, leader of the third division of singers in the Temple (1 Ch. 25.[2], &c.). (5) Son of Imri, one of those who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[2]). (6) A Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[12]). (7) A Levite, father of Hanan, one of those who had charge of the tithe of the corn and the wine and the oil, who, accounted faithful men, were entrusted with distribution to their brethren (Ne. 13.[13]). He may be identical with (6). (8) See ZABBUD.

ZACHARIAH, RV. ZECHARIAH. (1) Son of Jeroboam II. of Israel, who succeeded his father on the throne (2 K. 14.[29]). He was the fourteenth king of Israel, and the last monarch of the house of Jehu. That dynasty, therefore, came to an end earlier, apparently, than Hosea had expected (Ho. 1.[4f.]; cp. 2 K. 10.[11]). His reign was short and evil: it lasted only six months, and was brought to an end by the hand of the rebel Shallum, who, having headed a conspiracy against him, put him to death, and reigned in his stead (2 K. 15.[8ff.]). His fall introduced a troubled period in the history of the Northern Kingdom, the beginning of the end. (2) Father of Abi (2 K. 18.[2]), or Abiah (2 Ch. 29.[1]), the mother of king Hezekiah.

ZACHARIAS. (1) The reference of our Lord in Mw. 23.[35]; Lk. 11.[51] is probably to ZECHARIAH, son of Jehoiada the priest (2 Ch. 24.[20]). His martyrdom is the last mentioned in the Scriptures as they then stood, Chronicles closing the Canon. From Abel, the first martyr, to Zacharias, the last, all righteous blood unrighteously shed was included. He is called by Matthew, "son of Barachaias," it may be owing to a scribe confusing him with ZECHARIAH, son of Jeberechiah, mentioned in Is. 8.[2], or with the prophet ZECHARIAH, son of Berechiah (Zc. 1.[1]). Josephus, however, mentions the murder of a Zecharias, the son of Baruch, in the Temple, by the hands of the Zelots (BJ. IV. v. 4).

This may possibly have misled some later copyist. (2) The husband of Elisabeth, and father of John the Baptist. He was a priest, belonging to the course of Abijah, one of the twenty-four into which the priestly families had been divided, to take service in order in the Temple (1 Ch. 24.[7ff.]; Lk. 1.[5]). This course, the eighth, was performing its week of service, and to Zacharias fell the duty of going into the Temple to burn incense (Lk. 1.[8f.]). While officiating there, the angel Gabriel appeared to him, standing on the right side of the altar of incense, and announced that, in answer to the prayers of himself and his wife, a son would be born to them, whose name shd. be called John. Upon this child the conditions of the Nazirite were to be imposed from his birth; and a great career was promised him. Disbelieving the news, wh. seemed to him "too good to be true," Zacharias was stricken dumb until the angel's word should be fulfilled; and so on coming out he could communicate with his friends only by signs. In his house in the city of Judah, in the hill country, Mary, the mother of Jesus, spent some three months with Elizabeth, her kinswoman, before the Baptist's birth (vv. 39ff.). When the son was born, not until the eighth day, when at his circumcision he received his name, his father writing it upon a tablet, did Zacharias regain his speech (vv. 57ff.). Then in his joy and gratitude, "filled with the Holy Ghost," he "prophesied," giving utterance to the exalted poetry, the Benedictus, contained in vv. 68–79. Origen says Z. was murdered in the Temple, but the statement is without corroboration.

ZACHER, one of the sons of Jehiel or Jeiel (RV.), who was the father, or founder of Gibeon (1 Ch. 8.[29, 31]; in 9.[37] he is called ZECHARIAH).

ZADOK. (1) According to the genealogies in 1 Ch. 6.[4ff., 50ff.], 24.[6], a descendant of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, who became the founder of an influential priestly family in Jrs. He appears first as joining David at Hebron with twenty-two captains of his father's house (1 Ch. 12.[28]). Possibly hitherto he may have been attached to the house of Saul. But from this time his loyalty to David was unshaken. When David fled at the revolt of Absalom, Zadok and the Levites carrying the ark went with him, returning to the city only at the royal command. There along with Abiathar he was invaluable to the cause of David, arranging for communication, as to events transpiring in the capital, with the absent monarch. At the conclusion of that rebellion, at the instance of Z. and Abiathar, moved by the king (2 S. 19.[11]), the elders of Judah took the lead in inviting David to return. Abiathar favoured the claim made by Adonijah to the throne (1 K. 1.[7f.]), but Zadok had the good fortune to keep clear of that unfortunate prince, and David, made aware of what his eldest surviving son was doing, and urged by Nathan and Bathsheba, sent Zadok to anoint Solomon, and have him proclaimed king over Israel (vv. 32ff.). He reaped the reward of his fidelity in being made High Priest by Solomon, while Abiathar, the lifelong friend and helper of David, for his one lapse, which could perhaps hardly be called disloyalty, was banished to his farm at Anathoth (2.[26]). Zadok's son Ahimaaz married a daughter of Solomon, and received an important appointment, in charge of the commissariat department in Naphtali (4.[15]). Up to this time Zadok's position had probably been inferior to that of Abiathar, which was natural, owing to the latter's older connection with David. He is not mentioned in the account of the dedication of the Temple. Probably he did not live to see it completed. From the time of Solomon his family takes precedence among the families of the priests. To it belonged Azariah, "chief priest" in the days of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 31.[10]); and from it the High Priests were taken till the time of the Maccabees. For Ezekiel (40.[46], 43.[19], &c.), "the priests the Levites" are only of "the seed of Zadok." (2) Father of Jerusha, the mother of Jotham, king of Judah (2 K. 15.[33]; 2 Ch. 27.[1]). (3) Son of Baana, who repaired a portion of the wall in Nehemiah's time (Ne. 3.[4]); probably identical with Z. of 10.[21], one of those who sealed the covenant. If so, he was not a priest, but possibly of the tribe of Judah (cp. 2 S. 23.[29]). The name Zadok may have come through intermarriage with a priestly family. (4) A priest, son of Immer, who repaired a part of the wall over against his own house (Ne. 3.[29]). (5) The scribe, probably a priest, and possibly identical with the foregoing, whom Nehemiah appointed one of the treasurers (Ne. 13.[13]). (6) In the genealogies (1 Ch. 9.[11]; Ne. 11.[11]) appears a Zadok, son of Meraioth, son of Ahitub. In 1 Ch. 6.[7] Amariah is named as the grandfather of Zadok, Ahitub being, as elsewhere, his father. The text is doubtful.

ZAHAM, son of Rehoboam by Abihail, daughter of Eliab (2 Ch. 11.[19]). Eliab was David's eldest brother. Abihail was therefore probably his granddaughter.

ZAIR. In 2 K. 8.[21] it is said that "Joram passed over to Zair, and all his chariots with him," on his way to fight with the Edomites. The parallel passage (2 Ch. 21.[9]) reads, "Jehoram passed over with his captains." This is probably a copyist's error. The place cannot be identified with certainty. Some have thought ZOAR may be intended. If this lay, as appears probable, to the SE. of the Dead Sea, then an army invading Edom might have passed that way.

ZALAPH, father of Hanun (Ne. 3.[30]).

ZALMON. (1) One of David's valiant men, the Ahohite (2 S. 23.[28]); identical with Ilai (1 Ch. 11.[29]), which is probably the correct reading

(2) Mount Zalmon, a height in the neighbourhood of Shechem, where Abimelech cut down wood with which he burned down the stronghold—prob. the citadel—of El-Berith, in which the men of Shechem had taken refuge. There may possibly be a reminiscence of the old name in Jebel Sūlēmīyeh, the modern Arabic name of Mount Ebal. The mountain is again alluded to in Ps. 68.^{14}, AV. Salmon, RV. "Zalmon." The passage is exceedingly difficult. The mention of Bashan in the following verse led Sir Charles Wilson to look for Zalmon in that region (HDB. s.v.). Snow is naturally associated in the native mind with Mt. Hermon, where it may be seen all the year round. But snow-storms in winter are not infrequent in the higher districts, and the mountains in Ephraim are often white, although the snow seldom lies long. The poet may mean that the kings are scattered like snowflakes before the wind on Mount Zalmon. Or there may be an allusion to the whitening bones of the slaughtered host strewing the ground like snow.

ZALMONAH, a station of the Israelites after leaving Mt. Hor on their final march round Edom, to begin the conquest of Canaan (Nu. 33.$^{41ff.}$): unidentified.

ZALMUNNAH, ZEBAH AND. These were the "kings" of Midian, as distinguished from the "princes," Oreb and Zeeb (Jg. 8.$^{5-21}$; Ps. 83.^{11}). They led the multitudinous hordes of the "children of the East" across the Jordan to the rich lands for their flocks and camels, saying, "Let us take to ourselves in possession the pastures of God," i.e. the excellent pastures. This one can understand if they came by the way their successors came for many a century, up the vale of Jezreel, to the vast fertile breadths of Esdraelon. Often, until comparatively recent years, the dwellers in these districts saw swarms of nomads from beyond Jordan, with herds innumerable, to whom no rights of property were sacred, settle for months upon the land, leaving it stripped bare. The terms "kings" and "princes" indicate probably a higher state of organisation than prevails among the nomads to-day; they recognise no higher officer than the sheikh, and no higher authority than that of "the elders." The victory won by Gideon over the enormous hosts led by the two kings of Midian made a deep impression on the mind of the people, and is spoken of long after as a signal work of God (Is. 9.^{4}, 10.^{26}). The two kings with part of their troops, in the general rout seem to have passed over Jordan at a ford higher up than that held by Gideon's men, and made their way to KARKOR. Little expecting to be followed hither, discipline was relaxed, and the unready host of 15,000 fell an easy prey to the attack of Gideon's company of weary but resolute men. The kings were taken captive. Then it transpired that there was blood feud between them and Gideon, for at Tabor they had slain his brothers, noble men apparently, "each one resembling the children of a king." But for this their lives might have been spared. Blood called for blood. He called on JETHRO, his first-born, to avenge the murders of his kinsmen. But the youth shrank from the grim task, and Gideon himself performed it. The spoils of the vanquished fell to the victors, not, unhappily, to be well used (Jg. 8.$^{24ff.}$).

ZAMZUMMIM, a primitive people expelled by the Ammonites (Dt. 2.$^{20-52}$). They are said to be giants (REPHAIM), and are compared to the ANAKIM. When thus a race has disappeared there is a tendency, viewing them through the mists of the past, to endow them with gigantic stature. They may have been of the kindred of those whose remains have been found in the lower stratum of the mound at GEZER.

ZANOAH. (1) A town in the Judæan Shephelah, mentioned with Zoreah and Jarmuth (Jo. 15.^{34}). OEJ. identifies it with "Zanua" on the road from Eleutheropolis to Jerusalem. It may with certainty be placed at the mod. Zanu'a, to the SE. of Zoreah. It was inhabited after the Exile (Ne. 11.^{30}), and its people gave assistance in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (3.^{13}). (2) A town in the uplands of Judah, mentioned with Ziph, Jokdeam, and Kain (Jo. 15.^{56}), probably identical with Zanūtā, a hill with considerable ruins, about 12 miles S. of Hebron. We may take the statement of 1 Ch. 4.^{18} to mean that Jekuthiel was the founder of this town.

ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH, the name given to JOSEPH by Pharaoh. There is considerable difficulty in interpreting this name, as it may have undergone transformation to an indefinite extent. The form it assumes in the LXX, Psonthomphanech, rather suggests this. Of the many interpretations perhaps that of Lieblein (Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archæology, May 1898) is the most plausible; that it represents efnti pa-anḥ, "who gives the nourishment of life"; at all events it suits the function performed by Joseph in regard to Egypt.

ZAPHON, a city in the territory allotted to Gad, east of Jordan (Jo. 13.^{27}). It lay well to the north, as the mention of the Sea of Chinnereth shows. At the mouth of Wādy er-Rujeib, not far from the Jordan, stands the isolated hill Tell 'Amate. It marks the site of the ancient fortress Amathus, wh. lay, according to Josephus, on the Jordan—according to Eusebius, 21 Roman miles from Pella. It was captured by Alexander Jannæus, and later it was made by Gabinius capital of one of the five great administrative districts. According to the Talmud, Onnatha was identical with Tzaphon (Jo. 13.^{27}). But this town occurs in Josephus as Asophon, wh. tells against the identification (Buhl, GAP. 259). In Jg. 12.^{1}, instead of "northward," Tzaphōnah should be trd. "to Zaphon."

ZARAH, son of Judah by Tamar (Gn. 38.[20], 46.[12]), ancestor of Achan (Jo. 7.[24], &c., "Zerah").

ZAREAH, ZOREATHITES = ZORAH, ZORATHITES.

ZARED = ZERED.

ZAREPHATH was the city belonging to Zidon, where ELIJAH resided with the widow during the latter days of the great famine (1 K. 17.[9f.]). It is mentioned as a Canaanite or Phœnician town by Obadiah (v. 20); and it appears in the NT. in the Greek form, Sarepta (Lk. 4.[26], RV. "Zarephath"), where it is described as "in the land of Sidon." Josephus (Ant. VIII. xiii. 2) places it between Tyre and Sidon. Jerome (Onomasticon, s.v. Sarefta) says it was situated on the public road, i.e. the road along the shore. All point with sufficient clearness to Surafend, a village which lies on the promontory, about 13 miles N. of Tyre, wh. divides the plain of Tyre from that of Sidon. The remains of what must have been a considerable town are scattered along the shore to the south. The town was at first Sidonian, but fell to Tyre after the invasion of Shalmaneser IV., B.C. 722. It was taken by Sennacherib, B.C. 701. The spot identified by the Crusaders with the site of the widow's house, and on which they erected a chapel, is probably that near the shore where the mod. Wely stands, consecrated to el-Khudr, the "Evergreen," who is at once Elijah and St. George.

ZARETAN, ZARTANAH, ZARTHAN. This place is mentioned in connection with the arresting of the waters of Jordan, which rose high "at Adam, the city that is beside Zaretan" (Jo. 3.[16], RV. "Zarethan"). The commissariat district of Baana, under Solomon, included "all Bethshean, which is beside Zartanah" (1 K. 4.[12], RV. "Zarethan"). The castings of "burnished brass," for the Temple of Solomon, were made "in the clay ground between Succoth and Zarthan" (1 K. 7.[46], RV. "Zarethan"). The same place is intended by Zererath (Jg. 7.[22], RV. "Zererah"), in the direction of which the Midianites fled; by Zereda (1 K. 11.[26], RV. "Zeredah"), the birthplace of Jeroboam I.; and Zeredathah (2 Ch. 4.[17], RV. "Zeredah" = 1 K. 7.[46]). Everything points to a position on the west side of Jordan, not far from the ford at ed-Dâmieh, just below the confluence of the Jabbok and the Jordan. In the matter of position Qarn Sarṭabeh might suit. The change in the name, however, is linguistically impossible.

ZARETH-SHAHAR, RV. ZERETH-SHAHAR, a city in the territory allotted to Reuben, "in the mount of the valley," mentioned with Kiriathaim and Sibmah (Jo. 13.[19]). No trace of this site has yet been found.

ZATTHU, ZATTU. The sons of Zattu were a family who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[8]; Ne. 7.[13]). Some men among them married foreign wives (Ez. 10.[27]). The "chief" of this family signed the covenant along with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[14]).

ZAZA, a Jerahmeelite, son of Jonathan (1 Ch. 2.[33]).

ZEBADIAH. (1) A Benjamite, of the sons of Beriah (1 Ch. 8.[15]). (2) A Benjamite, of the sons of Elpaal (1 Ch. 8.[17]). (3) One of the men who joined David during his stay at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[7]), son of Jeroham of Gedor. (4) A Korahite doorkeeper in the Tabernacle, of the family of Asaph, son of Meshelemiah (1 Ch. 26.[2]). (5) One of David's captains, son of Asahel the br. of Joab (1 Ch. 27.[7]). (6) One of the Levites who went through the cities of Judah, teaching the law in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 17.[8]). (7) An officer of Jehoshaphat, "ruler of the tribe of Judah," son of Ishmael (2 Ch. 19.[11]). The Levites and the priests were entrusted with the settlement of disputes among their brethren in the cities of Judah. Zebadiah divided with Amariah, the chief priest, the oversight of this work, Amariah taking special note of "all matters of the Lord," i.e. religious questions; and Zebadiah attending to the "matters of the king," i.e. civil questions. (8) Son of Michael, of the family of Shephatiah, who, along with eighty of his clan, returned with Ezra, in the second caravan (Ez. 8.[8]; in 1 Es. 8.[34] he is called "Zaraias"). (9) One of the sons of Immer, a priest who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[20]).

ZEBAH. See ZALMUNNAH.

ZEBAIM. In Ez. 2.[57] RV., Z. stands as the residence of Pochereth. RV. takes it as part of the name, Pochereth-hazzebaim.

ZEBEDEE, a Galilean fisherman, husband of SALOME, and father of JAMES and JOHN, the apostles (Mw. 4.[21], 27.[56], &c.). The company of which he was a member were able to employ "hired servants" (Mk. 1.[20]). His son John was acquainted with the High Priest in Jerusalem (Jn. 18.[15]), and his wife was among the women who ministered to Jesus out of their substance (Mw. 27.[55f.]; Lk. 8.[3]). The inference is that he must have been in good circumstances. This of course would not prevent him from engaging in manual toil; as in those days every Jew, no matter how rich, was expected to have a trade, and to work. He is often referred to in the Gospel narrative, James and John being called "the sons of Zebedee," to distinguish them from others bearing the same names. Only once do we get a glimpse of the man himself. Then he is busy, with his sons and his servants, mending their nets (Mw. 4.[21]; Mk. 1.[19f.]). He does not seem to have been a follower of Jesus, but he raises no objection to his sons accepting the Master's invitation. He was probably too old a man to enter on that way of life. And in any case the business of the fishing company required some responsible person in charge. This may account for the fact that he does not again appear in the history.

ZEBOIM, ZEBOIIM, a city mentioned as on the border of the Canaanites, along with Sodom, Gomorrah, and Admah (Gn. 10.[19]). It was one of the five cities of the plain which rebelled against Chedorlaomer, the name of its king being Shemeber (Gn. 14.[2, 8]). It shared in the destruction which overwhelmed Sodom and Gomorrah (Dt. 29.[23]). It is referred to again in Ho. 11.[8]. It was situated in the VALE OF SIDDIM; but no identification of the site is as yet possible.

ZEBOIM, VALLEY OF (gē ḥatztzĕbō'īm, "ravine of the hyenas"), is mentioned in describing the direction followed by a company of "spoilers" who set out from the camp of the Philistines at Michmash (1 S. 13.[18]). It is one of the deep gorges which break down eastward to the Jordan valley. Quite possibly we have here the ancient name of Wādy el-Qelt. The hyena is found in the district, and has given its name to Wādy abu Ḍaba', which falls into Wādy el-Qelt from the S., and also to Shakhkh eḍ-Ḍaba', on the north bank of that wady. It is prob. referred to in Ne. 11.[34].

ZEBUDAH, RV. ZEBIDAH, daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah, and mother of Jehoiakim, king of Judah (2 K. 23.[36]).

ZEBUL, the officer whom Abimelech left in charge of Shechem, against whom "the men of Hamor," the native Canaanites, rebelled, under the leadership of Gaal. Stung by the contemptuous language of Gaal, and apparently without a sufficient force to hold the city, he fell back on stratagem, secretly sending for Abimelech, who, with his troops, arrived by night. The conversation reported between Gaal and Zebul, when the former perceived the enemy, sets the latter in a clear, individual light. Gaal leading his men out against Abimelech, Zebul shut the gates, cutting off their retreat, and making the subsequent capture of the city comparatively easy (Jg. 9.[26ff.]).

ZEBULUN, the tenth son born to Jacob, the sixth by Leah (Gn. 30.[20], &c.). The name is of uncertain meaning. Two explanations are suggested in Gn. 30.[20]. It may be derived from zābal, "to exalt," or "to honour" (cp. Asyr. zabālu, "to carry," or "to exalt"). "Now will my husband honour me" gives a satisfactory sense. This meaning is illustrated in the phrase bēth zĕbul (1 K. 8.[13] = 2 Ch. 6.[2]), where "lofty house" expresses the idea of a dwelling of God; so also in Is. 63.[15], zĕbul qodshĕka, "the high abode of Thy holiness."

Zebulun is the reputed ancestor of the tribe of Israel bearing his name. Nothing is known of his personal life. An old tradition makes him the first of the five brethren presented to Pharaoh by Joseph (Tg. PJ. on Gn. 47.[2]). Three sons were born to him before the migration to Egypt (Gn. 46.[14]): Sered, Elon, and Jahleel. From these men descended the three main divisions of the tribe.

The place of Z. in the wilderness was in the camp of Judah, along with Issachar, to the E. of the Tabernacle. They formed the van of the cavalcade on the march (Nu. 2.[7f.]). For the strength of the tribe see NUMBERS. The chief or "prince" was Eliab, son of Helon (Nu. 1.[9], &c.).

Zebulun was represented among the spies by Gaddiel, son of Sodi (Nu. 13.[10]), and among those who divided the land by Elzaphan, son of Parnach (Nu. 34.[25]).

Zebulun was fortunate in the territory that fell to the tribe. While the boundaries cannot be traced exactly, they sufficiently indicate the general tract of country that belonged to Z. (Jo. 19.[10ff.]). It includes all the variety of mountain and plain, rough hill country, shady wood, and fruitful valley. It lay to the N. of Issachar, with the lot of Asher on the W. and NW., and that of Naphtali on the E. and NE. The march seems to have run from Tabor northward to Kefr Anān (Hannathon), then westward to the border of Asher, possibly by the vale of Abilīn; from this point it ran southward to the Kishon, opposite Tell Kaimūn (Jokneam). The S. boundary may have run along the N. edge of the plain of Esdraelon to Debūrieh (Dabareth), which belonged to Issachar (Jo. 21.[28]); but the attempt to follow this boundary is hopeless. One thing is clear, viz., the lines indicated leave Zebulun no access to the sea. Such access seems to be implied in the blessing of Jacob, a document not later than the early days of the monarchy. "Zebulun, towards the strand of the sea he settles, he himself towards the strand of the ships, and his rear to or towards Zidon" (Gn. 49.[13], Dillmann). This is also the view of Josephus (Ant. V. i. 22; BJ. III. iii. 1). Possibly at some time it may have been true. But Delitzsch would translate, "Zebulun, near to the coast of the sea shall he dwell, yea he, near to the coast of the ships, and his side leans on Zidon." Zidonians is a term in Scripture covering all Phœnicians. These were not expelled from Acre, and the land held by them wd. naturally be called Zidonian. The phrase may not mean more than that the boundary approached Zidonian territory. Certainly Zebulun never came near the city of Zidon. On Delitzsch's interpretation it was not necessary for Zebulun to be actually in touch with the sea; but only that he should be in a position to profit by maritime trade. This he certainly was, and the great artery of trade and traffic of all kinds, the via maris (Is. 9.[1]), ran through his valleys to the sea. He was thus in contact with the trade of the world, and able to "suck the treasures of the sea" (Dt. 33.[19]).

The name is preserved of only one "judge" sprung from Zebulun, Elon (Jg. 12.[11, 12]). His authority lasted for ten years. The men of Zebulun seem always to have been forward to do their duty in war, in defence of their country. It produced leaders—"those who carry the muster-master's staff" (Jg. 5.[14]). They are commended for their zeal and prowess in the battle against Sisera (Jg. 5.[14, 18]). They responded to Gideon's summons against Midian (Jg. 6.[35]). Fifty thousand single-hearted men of Zebulun joined David at Hebron carrying acceptable gifts (1 Ch. 12.[33, 40]). In the time of Hezekiah his messengers who called the people to the Passover in Jerusalem met with scorn and mockery in Zebulun. "Nevertheless divers . . . of Zebulun humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem" (2 Ch. 30.[10f.]). Some of them, not cleansed "according to the purification of the sanctuary," yet ate the Passover, Hezekiah praying that they might be pardoned (vv. 18ff.). Z. was included in the district overrun by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. 15.[29]; Is. 9.[1]). In later days the men of Zebulun retained their martial ardour and skill. The peasant farmers from the uplands formed the backbone of the Jewish army in the war of independence. Sepphoris (mod. Saffûrieh) became the headquarters of the Roman administration. It was the seat of the Jewish Sanhedrin for a time, before its settlement in Tiberias (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1; BJ. III. ii. 4; Jost. Judenthum, ii. 16ff.).

Nazareth, the home of the childhood and young manhood of Jesus, lay in a hollow among its hills.

Zebulunites are members of the tribe (Nu. 26.[27]; Jg. 12.[11f.]).

ZECHARIAH. (1) One of the chief of the Reubenites, when their genealogies were reckoned (1 Ch. 5.[7]). (2) A Korahite Levite, son of Meshelemiah, a gate-keeper in the tabernacle in David's time (1 Ch. 9.[21], 26.[2, 14]). (3) A Benjamite of the family of Jeiel the founder of Gibeon, brother of Kish and Ner, and uncle of Saul (1 Ch. 9.[37]): called "Zecher" (8.[31]). (4) A Levite musician in the Tabernacle, of the second order, who was also a door-keeper (1 Ch. 15.[18], &c.). (5) A priest in David's time, one of those who blew "with the trumpets before the ark of God' (1 Ch. 15.[24]). (6) A Kohathite Levite, son of Isshiah (1 Ch 24.[25]). (7) A Merarite Levite, son of Hosah, a gate-keeper in the Tabernacle (1 Ch. 26.[11]). (8) The father of Iddo, who was chief of the half tribe of Manasseh E. of the Jordan (1 Ch. 27.[21]). (9) One of the "princes" sent out by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch. 17.[7]). (10) A Levite, father of Jehaziel, who encouraged Jehoshaphat and his army against Moab (2 Ch. 20.[14]). (11) Son of king Jehoshaphat, who received as gifts from his father silver and gold and precious things, and fenced cities in Judah. He was not permitted long to enjoy them, as Jehoram, on his accession to the throne, put Z. and his other brothers to death (2 Ch. 21.[2]). (12) Son of Jehoiada the priest, cousin of Joash, king of Judah (2 Ch. 24.[20]). When the influence of Jehoiada was removed, Joash seems to have been easily turned aside by the princely sycophants around him, and fell into idolatrous ways. Z., who probably succeeded his father in the priestly office, denounced the sin, and prophesied God's vengeance upon the transgressors. In his anger the king ordered him to be stoned to death in the court of the royal residence. He died exclaiming, "The Lord look upon it, and require it," an appeal soon and terribly answered (vv. 24f.). In the NT. he is called Zacharias (Mw. 23.[35]; Lk. 11.[51]). (13) A prophet with whom king Uzziah was wont to take counsel, who is described as having "understanding in the vision of God" (2 Ch. 26.[5]). (14) One of the Levites of the sons of Asaph who assisted Hezekiah in the cleansing of the Temple (2 Ch. 29.[13]). He may be identical with Z. son of Jeberechiah (Is. 8.[2]), one of the two "faithful witnesses" chosen to attest the prophetic tablet. (15) A Kohathite Levite, one of those having oversight of the work of repair in the Temple in Josiah's time (2 Ch. 34.[12]). (16) A "ruler of the house of God" in the days of Josiah (2 Ch. 35.[8]). (17) The prophet—see following article. (18) A son of Parosh, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ez. 8.[3]). (19) Son of Bebai, who also returned with Ezra (8.[11]). (20) One of those sent by Ezra from the river to Iddo "at the place Casiphia," to bring ministers for the service of the Temple (Ez. 8.[16]). (21) One who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[26]). (22) A prince who stood by Ezra at the reading of the law (Ne. 8.[4]). (23) A descendant of Pharez son of Judah, whose family dwelt in Jerusalem (Ne. 11.[4]). (24) The son of the Shilonite (AV. "Shiloni"), whose descendants settled in Jrs. (Ne. 11.[5]). (25) The son of Pashhur, whose descendant, Adaiah, was a priest in Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Ne. 11.[12]). (26) A priest in the days of Joiakim son of Jeshua (Ne. 12.[16]). (27) A priest, son of Jonathan, of the family of Asaph, who assisted at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Ne. 12.[35]). (28) One of the trumpeters on that occasion (Ne. 12.[41]). See also Zachariah. (29) See (14).

ZECHARIAH, eleventh of the Minor Prophets, was a contemporary of Haggai, whom he supported in urging the people to rebuild the Temple. He is described in the title as s. of Berechiah, s. of Iddo, and again in Ez. 5.[1], 6.[14] as s. of Iddo. It is supposed that his fr. died young, and that Z. was brought up by Iddo, his grandfr. Nothing further is known of him, except the dates of his prophecies.

The book which goes by his name is clearly divided into two parts of very dissimilar char. The first part, consisting of chaps. 1.–8., is admitted by all to be the work of Z., and to belong to B.C. 520 and 518, the second and fourth yrs. of Darius Hystaspes. Z. has a larger outlook than Haggai, and while insisting on the duty of rebldg. the Temple and of obeying the ordinances of worship, he speaks with an even greater emphasis of the necessity of moral obedience as of supreme importance in the service of J″. Hist., wh. tells of the evils wh. came upon their frs. for neglecting the teaching of the earlier prophets, is used as a warning to repent (1.[1-6]). Next follows a series of eight visions, given to encourage the people and to reveal the purpose of J″. In the vision of the horses, the messengers of J″. report that the whole world is at peace. The angel of the Lord intercedes for Jrs., and the prophet is told to proclaim that the Lord will be gracious to Jrs., and His Temple will be built in the city (1.[7-17]). The second vision is of four horns, wh. are about to be shattered even as the nations opposed to Isr. will be destroyed (1.[18-21]). The next vision teaches that Jrs. will have no need of walls, because of the multitude of its inhabitants; the Lord will be its defence, and it will be the centre of worship for many nations (2.). The fourth vision is of Joshua, the High Priest, the representative of the people, accused before J″. by Satan. J″. rebukes the adversary and pronounces pardon. New garments are put upon Joshua, and the old prophecy of the Branch is repeated (3.; cp. Jr. 23.[5]). The fifth vision is given as an encouragement to Zerubbabel, the governor of Judah, not to lose heart in the day of small things, for his strength is in J″. of Hosts. In figurative language the restoration of Isr. is declared, the obstacles in Zerubbabel's path will be removed, and his hands shall finish what he has begun (4.). The next two visions deal with the purifying of the corruptions of the land. A flying roll is seen going forth to destroy the sinners (5.[1-4]), and a woman, personifying wickedness, is carried off to Bab. to be set there in her own place (5.[5-11]). The eighth vision is of four chariots going forth to execute the judgment of J″. upon various nations, the chariot with black horses being specially noted as going to the north country, Bab. (6.[1-8]). The prophet next tells how he received the command to crown Joshua, the High Priest, and to give him once more the promise of the Messiah (6.[9-15]).

After a silence of two yrs. Zechariah again speaks, in answer to the question, whether the fast in memory of the fall of Jrs. should still be kept. His answer is that J″.'s requirements are ethical, as the story of the past shd. have taught them; and he points to the time when the nation shall be altogether happy and prosperous in obeying the will of J″.; and other nations shall eagerly seek to worship the God of the Jews (7., 8.).

The whole of the second part of the bk. (9.–14.) is placed by most critics after the Exile, and considerably later than the date of Z. It is poss. that these six chaps. come fm. the same unknown hand, having been written at difft. times, and in view of very difft. circumstances. Some consider this the most prob. view, while other critics see evidence of four difft. hands. But the data are insufficient for any cert. conclusion in the matter. Some of the latest writers on the subject still maintain the pre-exilic char. of this whole second part—chaps. 9.–11. belonging to the time of Amos and Hosea, before the fall of Samaria in B.C. 722, chaps. 12.–14. being dated immediately before the fall of Jrs. in B.C. 586. All admit that chaps. 9.–11. have many signs of pre-exilic origin, but the difficulty of setting the whole passage, as it stands, in the framework of that time is very great. Therefore it is usual to consider these chaps. post-exilic, some even relegating them to the middle of the fourth century B.C. It is cert., at least, that before that date the Greeks cd. not be referred to in the manner of 9.[13]. The critics are unanimous in thinking that the second part of the bk. of Z. is not from the hand of Z., but their unanimity goes no further.

The prophecy in chaps. 9.–11. begins with the announcement of judgment upon surrounding nations, J″. encamping round Jrs. to protect it. The Messiah will come and establish a reign of peace. The captives in exile are invited to return; J″. will give them the victory over their enemies, and the nation will be established by Him in prosperity and gladness. They are exhorted to turn to the Lord for help and not to idols and diviners. J″. will give them worthy rulers, the exiles will return, and Egp. and Asyr. will be defeated. This dream is broken in upon by the actuality of war. "There is a voice of the howling of the shepherds (rulers), for their glory is spoiled." The prophet is commanded to tend the shepherdless flock, but they refuse his authority and he casts them off. For wages, they give him in scorn the price of a slave, and he declares that the brotherhood of Judah and Isr., wh. he had hoped for, is for ever doomed.

Chaps. 12.–14. consist of two visions of a siege of Jrs. Many nations, Judah among them, are fighting agst. Jrs. Judah, perceiving that J″. is on the side of the city, turns on the allies, Jrs. is delivered, and the Lord pours upon the city a spt. of grace and supplication. The people repent of their sin, and idolatry and false prophecy are put away. The second vision is of a renewed assault upon Jrs., but this time the city falls, and half of the people are taken captive. But now again the Lord fights agst. the nations, and, working wonders, brings in the new age of Messiah. The whole land is made a plain, and only Jrs. stands high above all. The conquered nations come every yr. to worship the God of Jrs. If they disobey they will be visited with a curse. Jrs. is to be the centre of worship for all the world, and everything in Jrs. and in Judah shall be holy unto the Lord. JOHN DAVIDSON.

ZEDAD, a place the name of which occurs in Nu. $34.^{8}$, in the definition of the boundaries of the land promised to Israel; and again in Ek. $47.^{15}$, in his sketch of the ideal boundaries. Wetzstein and others have favoured identification with Ṣadad, on the road between RIBLAH and Qaryatein. This, however, appears to be too far to the north and east. It is possible that the true reading is not tzĭdād, but tzĕrād, in which case the place may be identified with Khirbet Serādā, to the W. of Nahr el-Ḥasbāny, in Merj ʿAyūn.

ZEDEKIAH, the last king of Judah and Jerusalem. He was the youngest son of Josiah, by his wife Hamutal, and so full brother of JEHOAHAZ (2 K. $24.^{18}$; cp. $23.^{31}$). His name originally was Mattamiah. When his nephew Jehoiachin was carried away to Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar set Mattaniah on the throne with the name of Zedekiah. He was set as the vassal of the Babylonian king, to rule over the humbler people who had been left in the land. During his troubled reign of eleven years Judah was only a pawn in the great game for empire between Egypt and Babylonia. Coming to the throne in these circumstances, at the age of twenty-one, he manifested no energy or decision of character, and speedily fell completely under the influence of the princes of his court. He says himself, addressing them, "The king is not he who can do anything against you" (Jr. $38.^{5}$). Encouraged, it may be, by the natural strength of Jerusalem, and by the faith that Jehovah would protect His Temple, he listened favourably to the prophets who posed as patriots, over against Jeremiah, who fully understood the situation and saw its necessary development. Z. thought it might be possible to break the yoke of Babylon. Among the exiles also there was a party, led by false prophets, inspired by the same hope. Z. was thus induced to take the steps which proved fatal to himself and brought final disaster upon his people. For a time he sought to maintain the appearance of loyalty to Babylon; but his capital was the centre of intrigue against the suzerain power. Once, in the fourth year of his reign, ambassadors were present from Tyre, Sidon, Edom, and Moab, endeavouring to arrange a common rising. Of this project Nebuchadnezzar seems to have got intelligence, and Z. was called to Bab., where he succeeded in allaying for the time the suspicion regarding his intentions, which had been aroused (Jr. $51.^{59}$). Jeremiah's steady opposition to all proposals in the direction indicated made a certain impression upon Z., but brought upon him the hearty ill-will of the princes, who sought by all means to reduce him to silence. Once or twice Z. intervened to mitigate the severity of the treatment to which he was subjected ($37.^{21}$, $38.^{10}$). In spite of the most vehement protestations of Jeremiah, an alliance was at last entered into with Egypt (2 K. $24.^{20}$; Ek. $17.^{15}$, &c.). This brought Nebuchadnezzar forthwith into Judæa, to besiege Jerusalem. His headquarters were established at Riblah, and measures were taken for securing the subjection of the whole country. The approach of the Babylonian army filled both king and people with alarm. Some hoped that, as of old, God might intervene with signal deliverance (Jr. $21.^{2}$). In this hope, the covenant with the Lord was renewed, and slaves were set free; this last possibly with a view to their more cordial co-operation in the defence of the city (Jr. 34.). The advance of an Egyptian army under Pharaoh-hophra drew off the Chaldæans for a time; and it seemed to the overjoyed people of Jerusalem as if the hopes of the wildest dreamer had been realised. They revoked the liberty granted to their slaves, and seemed to think all danger past. They were doomed to swift and bitter disappointment. The Egyptians were dispersed, and the siege resumed in earnest. The defenders, to do them justice, were no cowards. But their courage only prolonged the agonies inseparable from a state of siege. For a year and a half they kept the enemy at bay, fighting with the utmost heroism. Jeremiah with no less heroism performed his appointed task, which must have been all the harder because it seemed so unpatriotic. His exhortations to submit, and his predictions of coming disaster, brought upon him heavy punishment. Z. seems to have credited the prophet's message, but lacked the manhood to follow his counsel. Superior force told in the end. A breach was made in the wall. Z. with a few followers attempted to escape. Their movements were discovered. They were pursued and captured in the Jordan valley. Clearly Z. hoped to find asylum in the desert wastes beyond Jordan. He was carried to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. His sons were slain before him, their dying agonies being the last sight he was to behold on earth. His eyes were immediately thrust out, and he was carried in fetters to Babylon, where, in captivity, he was destined to end his days. Josephus shows how in this two apparently contradictory prophecies were fulfilled: "Thine eyes shall behold the eyes of the king of Babylon, and he shall speak with thee mouth to mouth, and thou shalt go to Babylon" (Jr. $34.^{3}$); and "I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldæans, yet he shall not see it, though he shall die there" (Ek. $12.^{13}$; Ant. X. viii. 2).

Zedekiah appears to have been a man personally amiable, but without individual initiative or resolution, easily influenced by those around him. Had he fallen into the hands of wise counsellors, instead of the headstrong, short-sighted zealots of his court, the existence of Judah's throne might have been indefinitely prolonged. He was, in the words of Ezekiel, "no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule" (Ek. 19.[14]). His secret consultations with Jeremiah, and his interference more than once in his interest, betray a conviction that Jeremiah was right. Upon that stern censor his personal qualities seem to have made a favourable impression. The prophet introduces no harshness in his words regarding Z.; he is to die in peace, and is to be buried as a king (34.[4]). Perhaps personal contact might have modified the fierce judgment of Ezekiel, who calls him the "deadly wounded wicked one" (Ek. 21.[25]).

ZEEB. See OREB.

ZELAH (Heb. Tzēlā'), a city in the territory of Benjamin named with Taralah and Eleph, the latter of which may be the mod. Liftā, W. of Jerusalem. It contained the ancestral burying-place of the family of Saul (2 S. 21.[14], RV. correctly "Zela"). Unidentified.

ZELEK. One of David's mighty men, an Ammonite (2 S. 23.[37]; 1 Ch. 11.[39]).

ZELOPHEHAD, son of Hepher, of the tribe of Manasseh. He died during the desert wanderings, leaving only daughters behind him (Nu. 26.[33], &c.). The appeal of his five daughters to Moses and Eleazar, the princes and the congregation, met with instant success, a portion being assured to them in their father's name, so that his memory should not perish. It also resulted in the issue of regulations affecting cases of the same kind in future (Nu. 27.[1ff.]). Their inheritance was to be preserved to the tribe by marriage within it. This condition was fulfilled by these young women (Nu. 36.).

ZELZAH, a place mentioned in Samuel's directions to Saul (1 S. 10.[2]), where he was to meet two men "by Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah" (Heb. bĕtzeslzah). The LXX evidently points to a different text, wh. is rendered "leaping mightily," or "in great haste" (Ewald). Many think that the mention of Rachel's tomb sufficiently defined the spot, making unnecessary the further definition "at Zelzah," and therefore conclude that Zelzah cannot be the name of a place. In that case there was also no need for the mention of the boundary of Benjamin. No place has been discovered with a name resembling Zelzah. But the position of Rachel's sepulchre is also unknown. A comparatively easy change from בצלצח to מצלע, "from Zela," i.e. the ancestral burying-place of Saul's family, is suggested by H. P. Smith (Samuel, p. 69).

ZEMARAIM, a city in the territory of Benjamin, mentioned before Bethel, apparently coming from the east. It is generally identified with es-Samra, a ruined site over four miles N. of Jericho. Mount Zemaraim, on which Abijah stood to address the army of Israel under Jeroboam, is said definitely to be in "Mount Ephraim" (2 Ch. 13.[4]). If there is any connection between the two, as seems likely enough, then Zemaraim must be sought somewhere in the uplands, west of es-Samra, which lies in the bottom of the Ghōr.

ZEMARITE, the name of a Canaanite community mentioned in Gn. 10.[18] = 1 Ch. 1.[16], between the Arvadite and the Hamathite. This furnishes an indication of its position. It probably corresponds to the Ṣumur which appears several times in the Tel el-Amarna tablets, along with Arvad. The city from which the community was named may be represented by the mod. Sumra, between Tripoli and Ruād, on the north Phœnician seaboard, a little way to the north of Nahr el-Kebīr.

ZEMIRA, a Benjamite, son of Becher (1 Ch. 7.[8]).

ZENAN = ZAANAN.

ZENAS (contraction fm. Zenodorus), a lawyer whom with all diligence (spoudaiōs) TITUS is requested to further on his journey to Paul (Tt. 3.[13]); he is accompanied by Apollos. The title, nomikos, "lawyer," may either mean that he had been a Jewish scribe who had become a convert, or that he was a Roman juris peritus. The former supposition is the more probable fm. the usage of Scripture. His heathen name, wh. means the "gift of Zeus" (Jupiter), may have been a translation of "Jonathan," wh. means "gift of Jehovah"; his association indicates that he was probably an Alexandrian.

ZEPHANIAH. (1) A Kohathite Levite, an ancestor of the prophet Samuel (1 Ch. 6.[36]). (2) Son of Maaseiah the priest (Jr. 21.[1]). He succeeded Jehoiada as priest in Jerusalem, and was appealed to by Shemaiah the Nehelamite to punish Jeremiah. The letter from Babylon containing this appeal he read to Jeremiah, who there and then pronounced doom upon the Nehelamite (Jr. 29.[24ff.]). He is called "second priest" as subordinate to Seraiah (2 K. 25.[18]). He was taken to Riblah by Nebuzar-adan, the captain of the guard, who destroyed and burned Jerusalem, and there he was put to death by Nebuchadnezzar. (3) Father of Josiah (Zc. 6.[10, 14]). (4) The prophet. See next article.

ZEPHANIAH, ninth of the Minor Prophets, has left a short but most valuable prophecy. Nothing is known of him except what is contained in the title of his bk. There his ancestry is given to the fourth generation, and as it is usual to name only the fr. of a prophet, it is conjectured that the Hezekiah mentioned in the title was the k. of that name, and that Z. was of the royal house. This will give special point to his condemnation of the foreign manners of the princes and their followers, and to his denunciation of sin in high places. It is evident that he lived in Jrs., for he speaks of the city as "this place," and he is familiar with its localities and various inhabitants. Z. prophesied in the reign of Josiah, k. of Judah, B.C. 639–608, and it is almost cert. that he flourished before the discovery of the Bk. of the Law in 621, for many of the evils wh. he attacked were removed then by the action of Josiah.

The prophecy has two main divisions: (1) A threatening of judgment (1.[2]–3.[8]), and (2) a promise of salvation (3.[9-20]). The bk. opens with the announcement of a universal judgment, wh. will fall most heavily upon the irreligious and false worshippers. The Lord will search Jrs. with lanterns, that none shall escape (1.[2-13]). The Day of the Lord is a day of wrath fm. wh. there is no escape, therefore the meek are warned to seek J″. now. It may be they will be hid in the day of His anger (1.[14]–2.[3]). Judgment is to be passed upon five nations wh. are named, and the prophet again turns to Jrs., wh. is utterly corrupt, and, along with all the nations, will be devoured with the fire of His jealousy (2.[4]–3.[8]). The second part of the bk., 3.[9-20], consists of a promise of salvation. It is made to all nations, wh. are to be taught to worship J″. (3.[9, 10]). In a beautiful passage a picture is presented of a renewed Isr., when pride and oppression are put away, and men trust only in the Lord (3.[11-13]). The people are invited to sing and rejoice in the Lord, who will remain for ever in the midst of them.

"The value of the bk. of Z. is not to be estimated by its size. In two respects it is of great importance: first, for the revelation wh. it gives of the religious and social condition of Jrs. in the yrs. preceding the Exile; and secondly, on act. of the profoundly earnest moral tone by wh. it is pervaded. Perhaps not less remarkable is the prophet's comprehensive view of hist. The hist. of the nations is but another name for the operations of J″. among them; and the goal wh. all these operations pursue is not the redemption of Isr. merely but of mankind" (A. B. Davidson). JOHN DAVIDSON.

ZEPHATH. See HORMAH.

ZEPHATH, VALLEY OF, the place where the great battle was fought between Asa, king of Judah, and Zerah the Ethiopian (2 Ch. 14.[9ff.]). It is said to be "at Mareshah." Some would place it at Tell eṣ-Ṣāfī, but that seems too far away. The LXX reads "in the ravine to the north of Mareshah." If this is the correct reading, as seems probable, Wādy el-Afranj may be intended.

ZEPHI (1 Ch. 1.[36]), ZEPHO (Gn. 36.[11, 15]), grandson of Esau and one of the "dukes" or phylarchs of the Edomites.

ZEPHON = ZAPHON.

ZER, a fortified city in the territory of Naphtali. In the list of Joshua (19.[35]) it follows Ziddim, wh. may perhaps be identd. with Ḥaṭṭīn. Zer must therefore be sought somewhere to the W. of the Sea of Galilee. No name resembling Ṭsēr has yet been discovered.

ZERAH. (1) A grandson of ESAU (Gn. 36.[13]). (2) The younger of the twin sons of Judah by Tamar his daughter-in-law; the ancestor of Achan; his descendants are called Zarhites (Zerahites, RV.) in Nu. 26.[20]. (3) The son of Simeon and the progenitor of another family of Zarhites (Nu. 26.[13]). Two Levites bore this name (1 Ch. 6.[21, 41]). (4) A Cushite or Ethiopian monarch who invaded Judah with an immense army of a million men; he was encountered and defeated by ASA (2 Ch. 14.[9f.]). He has been identified with Osorkon II., who claims to have subdued the Ru-tennu: it is difficult to understand why he shd. be called a Cushite. The suggestion that it may have been a sovereign of South Arabia who made a raid seems not improbable. It is needless to say the numbers are exaggerated.

ZERAHIAH. (1) A priest, the son of Uzzi, of whom Ezra the scribe was a descendant (1 Ch. 6.[6, 51]; Ez. 7.[4]). In 1 Es. 8.[2] he is called "Zaraias," and in 2 Es. 1.[2], "Arna." (2) Father of Eliehoenai, of the family of PAHATH-MOAB (Ez. 8.[4]). In 1 Es. 8.[31] he is called "Zaraias."

ZERED, THE BROOK, is taken to mark the limit of the desert wanderings (Nu. 21.[12]; Dt. 2.[13f.]). Robinson proposed to ident. it with Wādy el-Aḥsā, as forming the S. boundary of the land of Moab. It opens towards the SE. corner of the Dead Sea. But Nu. 21.[11] seems to show that Israel had entered the wilderness to the east of Moab before crossing the Zered. It must therefore be sought further to the north. It is now generally agreed that one of the tributaries of Wādy Kerāk is intended.

ZEREDA, ZEREDATHAH, ZERERATH. See ZARETAN.

ZERESH, wife of Haman the Agagite (Est. 5.[10]). It was she who advised the erection of the lofty gallows for the contumacious Mordecai (v. 14). When she learned that her husband's enemy was a Jew she was assured of Haman's doom (6.[13]).

ZERETH-SHAHAR = ZARETH-SHAHAR.

ZERI, son of Jeduthun (1 Ch. 25.[3]), called Izri in v. 11.

ZEROR, a Benjamite, great-grandfather of Saul (1 S. 9.[1]).

ZERUAH, the mother of Jeroboam son of Nebat (1 K. 11.[26]). In the LXX addition to chap. 12., between verses 24 and 25, she is called "Sarira," and is described as gunē pornē.

ZERUBBABEL. This name is usually derived from two Hebrew words meaning "born or begotten in Babylon." More probably, however, the name is of Babylonian origin, and means "seed" or "offspring of Babylon." The person Zerubbabel is described as the son of Shealtiel or Salathiel (Ez. 3.[2-8]; Hg. 1.[1]; Mw. 1.[12], &c.), and thus the grandson of Jehoiakim, the exiled king of Judah (cp. 1 Ch. 3.[17]). One passage in the Hebrew text, 1 Ch. 3.[19], calls him "the son of Pedaiah" (br. of Shealtiel), but as the LXX reads Salathiel, the reading Pedaiah is likely a scribal error. Zerubbabel played an important part at the return of the exiles from Babylon. In Ez. 3.[8] he is said to have laid the foundation of the house of the Lord, along with Jeshua the High Priest, in the second year after the return, i.e. B.C. 537. He refused the assistance of the "people of the land" (Ez. 4.[3]), who retaliated by securing letters from the Persian court to put a stop to the work. Seventeen years later the Temple was proceeded with by Zerubbabel and Jeshua, encouraged by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (cp. Ez. 5.[1, 2]; Hg. 1.[12], 2.[4]; Zc. 4.[9, 10]). In Ez. 5.[16], however, the laying of the foundation is ascribed to Sheshbazzar, who as well as Zerubbabel is described as "governor of Judah." Were, then, Zerubbabel and Sheshbazzar identical? Instances of men bearing two different names occur not infrequently (e.g. 2 K. 23.[34], 24.[17]; Dn. 1.[7], &c.). But this does not seem to be a case in point, nor is it demanded by a comparison of Ez. 3.[8] and 5.[16]. Both men may have returned from Bab. together, and while Sheshbazzar was the ruling official, Zerubbabel may have been the moving spirit in building the Temple. Ez. 3.[8] gives the Chronicler's own account of the work, while Ez. 5. purports to be an official report, and would naturally mention the official head of the community as responsible for what happened under his rule. The fact that both names are of foreign origin makes it unlikely that both were borne by the same individual (cp. Dn. 1.[7]), while as a rule the Chronicler is careful to note any such identification—e.g. Daniel whose name was Belteshazzar. In all probability Sheshbazzar was identical with Shenazzar of 1 Ch. 3.[18], a son of Jehoiachim, and would thus be the uncle of Zerubbabel, by whom he was succeeded as governor of Judah as early as the reign of Darius Hystaspis, B.C. 520 (cp. Hg. 1.[1, 14], 2.[3]). It is likely the younger man, Zerubbabel, took the leading part in the work of restoration, and as a result his uncle's memory fell into the background.

The history of Zerubbabel after the founding of the Temple is unknown. A Jewish tradition states that he returned to Babylon. In recent years various theories have been propounded regarding him. The view has been put forward that after the founding of the Temple he was raised to be king of Judah as head of the Messianic kingdom, and thereafter put to death by the Persians.

Professor Kosters, admitting Zerubbabel's share in building the Temple, supposes the whole work was done not by returned exiles, but by the Jews left in the land, and Zerubbabel need never have been in Bab. at all. However, his name, if nothing else, excludes such an idea. The view that Zerubbabel represented the suffering servant of Is. 53. is also mere conjecture. W. F. Boyd.

ZERUIAH is known to history as the mother of three famous warriors, two of whom played a leading part in the wars of David, the third falling a victim to his own zeal, at the hands of Abner: Abishai, Joab, and Asahel. Who their father was none can tell; Josephus (Ant. VII. i. 3) calls him "Souri." They are always called "sons of Zeruiah." It may be that Z. had married a foreigner, whose name might not appear in the genealogy of the Israelites. Or her name, as that of a near kinswoman to the reigning king, may have seemed to befit the dignity of these great captains. Z. and Abigail are called "sisters of the sons of Jesse" in 1 Ch. 2.[16]. It has been inferred from this that they were not the daughters of Jesse; and the inference is thought to be confirmed by 2 S. 17.[25], where Abigail is called the daughter of Nahash. Stanley suggested that this Nahash may have been the Ammonite king of that name, and formerly husband of Jesse's wife. But "Nahash" in this passage is prob. an error for "Jesse"; so that we may reasonably suppose Z. to have been full sister of David.

ZETHAM, a Gershonite Levite, son of Laadan (1 Ch. 23.[8]).

ZETHAN, a Benjamite, son of Bilthan (1 Ch. 7.[10]).

ZETHAR, a eunuch in the court of Ahasuerus, one of those sent to bring Vashti into the royal presence (Est. 1.[10]).

ZEUS, RVm., in Ac. 14.[12f.] See Jupiter.

ZIA. Head of one of the Gadite families (1 Ch. 5.[13]).

ZIBA is introduced to David as having been the servant of Saul, and likely to have information about the family of his master. Possibly he had secured his freedom at the death of Saul. At all events he had a considerable household, "fifteen sons and twenty servants." It is possible that he had been making use of Saul's property for his own interest. Acting on information given by Ziba, David restored to Mephibosheth his father's property, including Ziba, who was to be his servant, and, with his sons, to till the land for Mephibosheth (2 S. 9.). Z. appeared to succour the king with timely gifts, when he fled from Absalom. He then accused his master of treason and treachery. His story was believed, and Mephibosheth's property made over to him. This doubtless was what he aimed at (2 S. 16.[1ff.]). Mephibosheth seems to have convinced the king on his return that Ziba had falsely accused him. It was not easy, however, for David to go back upon his hasty judgment, but Ziba had to be content with half of what he had so unworthily gained (2 S. 19.[24ff.]).

ZIBEON, a Horite chief, grandfather of Aholibamah, the wife of Esau (Gn. 36.[2], &c.), brother of Seir (Gn. 36.[20], &c.) and father of Anah, who, it is said, "found the hot springs [AV. mules] in the wilderness" while he was tending the asses of his father (Gn. 36.^{24}).

ZIBIA, a Benjamite, son of Shaharaim, by his wife Hodesh, apparently born in the land of Moab (1 Ch. 8.^{9}).

ZIBIAH, a native of Beersheba, mother of Joash, king of Judah (2 K. 12.^{1}; 2 Ch. 24.^{1}).

ZICHRI. (1) A Kohathite Levite, son of Izhar (Ex. 6.^{21}). In AV. ed. 1611, it is given correctly; but some mod. edd. mis-spell "Zithri." (2) A Benjamite of the family of Shimhi (1 Ch. 8.^{19}). (3) A Benjamite of the family of Shashak (1 Ch. 8.^{23}). (4) A Benjamite of the family of Jeroham (1 Ch. 8.^{27}). (5) A Levite, son of Asaph (1 Ch. 9.^{15}), also called Zabdi, and Zaccur. (6) A descendant of Eliezer, son of Moses (1 Ch. 26.^{25}). (7) The chief of the Reubenites in the reign of David, who was succeeded by his son Eliezer (1 Ch. 27.^{16}). (8) Father of Amasiah, who commanded 200,000 "mighty men of valour" in Jehoshaphat's army (2 Ch. 17.^{16}). (9) Father of Elishaphat, who conspired with Jehoiada for the downfall of Athaliah (2 Ch. 23.^{1}). (10) A heroic soldier in the army of Pekah, the son of Remaliah, who, in battle with Judah, "slew Maaseiah the king's son, and Azrikam the ruler of the house, and Elkanah that was next to the king" (2 Ch. 28.^{7}). (11) A Benjamite, father of Joel (Ne. 11.^{9}). (12) A priest belonging to the family of Abijah (Ne. 12.^{17}).

ZIDDIM, a fortified city in the territory of Naphtali, identified in Tlm. Jerushalmi with Ḥaṭṭīn, a vill. fully five miles NW. of Tiberias, at the NE. base of what is called the Mount of Beatitudes, Qurūn Ḥaṭṭīn (Jo. 19.^{35}).

ZIDON. See Sidon.

ZIKLAG, a town in the territory allotted to Judah (Jo. 15.^{31}), mentioned among the "uttermost cities . . . toward the border of Edom in the south," along with Hormah, Madmannah, &c. It is included in the part of Judah assigned to Simeon (19.^{5}). It had fallen into the hands of the Philistines, and the outlawed David received it as a residence from Achish, king of Gath (1 S. 27.^{6}). It was raided by the Amalekites during his absence before the battle of Gilboa (30.$^{1ff.}$). On his return he pursued and defeated them, recovering all the spoil and the captives. Here he received tidings of Saul's death, and slew the Amalekite who claimed to have given that king his death-blow (2 S. 1.^{15}, 4.^{10}). Z. was then left for Hebron. Lists of those who joined David before the removal are given i Ch. 12. The town appears as occupied by the children of Judah after the Exile (Ne. 11.^{28}). Identifications have been suggested with places as widely ap. rt as 'Aṣlūj, 16 miles south of Beersheba, and Zuheilīqa, about 11 miles east by south of Gaza, and 19 miles SW. of Beit Jibrīn. The latter seems on the whole best to meet the requirements of the text.

ZILLAH and ADAH, wives of Lamech. The former was the mother of Tubal-cain and Naamah, the latter of Jabal and Jubal (Gn. 4.$^{19ff.}$). The names seem to be contrasted in meaning: Adah = "morning," or "brightness"; Zillah = "shadow."

ZILPAH, a Syrian maid given to Leah by her father Laban (Gn. 29.^{24}), and given by Leah to Jacob as a concubine. She was the mother of Gad and Asher (Gn. 30.$^{9ff.}$, &c.).

ZILTHAI, RV. ZILLETHAI. (1) Son of Shimhi, a Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.^{20}). (2) One of the Manassite captains who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.^{20}).

ZIMMAH. A Gershonite Levite family (1 Ch. 6.$^{20, 42}$; 2 Ch. 29.^{12}).

ZIMRAN, the eldest son of Keturah by Abraham (Gn. 25.^{2}; 1 Ch. 1.^{32}). Grotius suggests identification with the Zamareni, a tribe in the interior of Arabia (Pliny, NH. vi. 32), and Knobel with Zabram, to the W. of Mecca, on the Red Sea (Ptolemy, VI. vii. 5). This, however, is far from the region occupied by the Keturite tribes. The name may be derived from zemer, an animal allowed for food (Dt. 14.^{5}), probably some kind of mountain sheep or goat, wh. may have been the clan totem.

ZIMRI. (1) Son of Salu, a prince of the tribe of Simeon, who, with the Midianite princess Cozbi, was slain by Phinehas (Nu. 25.^{14}), in punishment of a peculiarly flagrant offence. (2) A son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. 2.^{6}, "Zabdi" in Jo. 7.^{1}). (3) Son of Jehoadah, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch. 8.^{36}, 9.^{42}). (4) A people, probably North Arabian, whom Jeremiah threatens with destruction along with those of Elam and the Medes (Jr. 25.^{25}). No certain identification is possible. (5) See next article.

ZIMRI, the fifth monarch of the Northern Kingdom. His reign lasted for seven days (1 K. 16.$^{9ff.}$). He had command of half the chariots in Israel's army. Conspiring against Elah, son of Baasha, he slew him in the house of Arza, the royal steward at Tirzah, where he found him indulging in a drunken revel. He exterminated the family of the murdered king. The army, then besieging Gibbethon in Philistia, on the news reaching them, elected Omri king, and he speedily avenged Elah's assassination. Unable to defend Tirzah against him, Zimri retired to the citadel, and, setting fire to it, perished in the flames. His case was quoted by Jezebel to Jehu: "Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?" (2 K. 9.^{31}).

ZIN, a place named on the south boundary of Judah (Nu. 34.^{3}; Jo. 15.^{3}), where it is mentioned between the Ascent of Akrabbim and Kadesh-barnea. It is to be sought, therefore, in the highlands occupied by the 'Azāzimeh Arabs. So far it is unknown. (2) The Wilderness of Zin. This is the division of the great waste which took its name from the above place. In Nu. 33.[36] it is identified with Kadesh, wh. in other passages (Dt. 32.[51]; Nu. 20.[1], 27.[14]) is said to be in the Wilderness of Zin. It lay in the extreme south of Judah, on the boundary of Edom (Jo. 15.[1]). It formed the southern limit of the land explored by the spies (Nu. 13.[21]). It apparently must be identd. with the uplands of the 'Azāzimeh Arabs, to the N. or NW. of the Wilderness of Paran. The Wilderness of Zin witnessed the lapse on the part of Moses, wh. led to his exclusion from the promised land (Nu. 27.[14] = Dt. 32.[51]).

ZINA. See Zizah.

ZION. See Jerusalem.

ZIOR, a town in the mountain of Judah (Jo. 15.[54]), named with Hebron. OEJ. places it (s.v. Siōr) between Ælia (Jerusalem) and Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrīn). It is prob. identical with Sa'ir, a village c. five miles N. of Hebron.

ZIPH. (1) A man of Judah, son of Jehallelel (1 Ch. 4.[16]). (2) A city in the south of Judah, named between Ithnan and Telem (Jo. 15.[24]). The site has not been recovered. (3) A city in the uplands of Judah, the name of which occurs between Carmel and Juttah (Jo. 15.[55]). Some of the adventures of David during his experience of the wastes are associated with the wilderness called by this place (1 S. 23.[14], &c.). It was one of the cities fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[8]). It corresponds to the modern Tell ez-Ziph, c. four miles SE. of Hebron. The inhabitants are called Ziphites (1 S. 23.[19], 26.[1]; Ps. 54., title).

ZIPHAH, a man of Judah, son of Jehalleleel (1 Ch. 4.[16]).

ZIPHION, a son of Gad (Gn. 46.[16]), called Zephon in Nu. 26.[15].

ZIPHRON, a place on the northern frontier of Canaan, as drawn in Nu. 34. (v. 9). Socin (Bædeker's Palästina und Syrien,[2] p. 397) suggests identification with Za'ferāneh, on the way between Ḥomṣ and Ḥamā. Possibly, however, it is the same place as Sibraim of Ek. 47.[16].

ZIPPOR, father of Balak, king of Moab (Nu. 22.[2], &c.). The name signifies "twitterer," and perhaps here means "sparrow," referring, it may be, to the totem of his tribe.

ZIPPORAH, wife of Moses, daughter of Jethro priest of Midian (Ex. 2.[21]), and mother of Gershom (2.[22]) and Eliezer (18.[4]). She seems to have had no sympathy with her husband in his zeal for the God of Israel. It was probably her aversion to the rite of circumcision that, yielded to by Moses, occasioned the scene in the khan on the way fm. Midian to Egypt (Ex. 4.[26]); after this she seems to have returned to her father. Her mother may have been an Ethiopian; that wd. form excuse enough in the heat of a family quarrel for Miriam to call her an Ethiopian.

ZIZ. By the "ascent of Ziz" the army of the allies, the "children of Ammon and Moab and Mount Seir," advanced against Jerusalem, for the overthrow of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 20.[16]). They assembled at Hazazon-tamar, which is identified with En-gedi (v. 2). The ascent of Ziz, therefore, led up from En-gedi towards Tekoa (v. 20). Probably there is a survival of the old name in that of Wādy Ḥaṣāṣah, along which ran the Roman road from En-gedi, through the wilderness of Tekoa, by way of Jebel Fureidis, to Bethlehem.

ZIZA. A chief of the tribe of Simeon, son of Shiphi, one of those who, in the days of Hezekiah, raided the Hamite shepherds of Gedor (1 Ch. 4.[37]). (2) Son of Rehoboam; his mother was Maacah, grand-daughter of Absalom (2 Ch. 11.[20]).

ZIZAH. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (1 Ch. 23.[11]). It is written Zinah in v. 10, prob. a clerical error.

ZOAN, a city of Egypt on the most easterly mouth of the Nile. It was regarded as one of the most ancient of Egyptian cities, hence it is reckoned an evidence of special emphasis in regard to the antiquity of Hebron that it was built "seven years before Z. of Egypt" (Nu. 13.[22]). This note wd. seem to imply that some race of immigrants on their way to Egypt built Hebron. Zoan was the first city of real importance that one entering Egypt fm. the E. came in contact with, and hence to the Jews it became in a way the representative of all Egypt. Isaiah, in denouncing the judgments of God upon Egypt, singles out the princes of Z. as become "fools" (Is. 19.[11, 13]), and places them on a level with the princes of Noph (Memphis). The plagues inflicted on Egypt are in Ps. 78.[12, 43] regarded as done in Z., and in the parallelism it is put as equivalent to Egypt. In Ezekiel the burning of Z. is mentioned as one of its crowning disasters (Ek. 30.[14]). The LXX call Z. Tanis, an identification wh. seems generally admitted to be correct. The modern name is San; it is on the side of Lake Menzaleh, a large stretch of shallow water which is close to the northern end of the Suez Canal. Mariette and Petrie made explorations there, and found remains that dated back to the Sixth Dynasty, about B.C. 3200. Brugsch thinks that when Ramses II. made Z. one of his capitals he changed its name to Pi-Ramessu, and that this is the Raamses of Ex. 1.[11]; but Egyptologists have not agreed, as a rule, to this identification.

ZOAR is mentioned as one of the cities in the "round" of Jordan which attracted Lot (Gn. 13.[10]). It appears in the account of Chedorlaomer's campaign, where we are told that its ancient name was Bela (Gn. 14.[2]). It escaped destruction when Sodom and Gomorrah were overwhelmed, and there Lot found a temporary shelter (Gn. 19.[20ff.]). It is here indicated that Z. was spared because of its insignificance—"Is it not a little one?" (v. 20); and on this account it was called Tzo'ar, i.e. "little." It occurs again in the description of the view granted to Moses (Dt. 34.^{3}). In Is. 15.^{5} it is spoken of as a city of Moab: so also in Jr. 48.^{34}. The name occurs nowhere else in Scripture. The last two references show that it was on the southern boundary of Moab. Clearly it was not situated in the VALE OF SIDDIM, with the other cities of the plain, or nothing could have saved it from destruction: nor yet was it on the mountain, or Lot would not have been in such haste to leave it. All this points to a position in the SE. of the Dead Sea, on a level somewhat higher than that of the VALE OF SIDDIM. A site in or near Ghōr eṣ-Ṣāfiyeh would meet all the requirements. This is a richly wooded and fertile stretch of country along the E. edge of the mud flat of es-Sebkha, about six miles long, and from one to three miles broad. The name, "Hollow of the smooth (cliff)," is taken from the smooth sandstone range that frowns over it. Wādy el-Aḥsā, "Wady of the sand wells," furnishes it with water. Here the nomads pitch their tents, and only a small gathering of reed huts, surrounded by a stockade of the same material, represents the more settled life. The choice of this district is confirmed by what is known from extra-Biblical sources of the site of Zoar. Josephus (Ant. I. xi. 4; BJ. IV. viii. 4) knows it by the name of Zoara, and says the Dead Sea extends to it, a distance of 580 furlongs, plainly between Jericho and Zoara. OEJ. corroborates, stating also that it was famous for balsam and date palms. Muqaddasi, the Arab geographer (A.D. 985), says it lay on the trade route from Aila (Elath), by el-Ghamr (near Petra) and Hebron, to Jerusalem. It was two days' journey from Jerusalem, and four from Aila, and was situated in a district adjoining the Dead Sea, very hot and unhealthy, but yielding indigo, dates, and bananas in abundance. King Baldwin I. of Jerusalem, on his march against Petra, passed Hebron, the salt mountain by the Dead Sea, i.e. Jebel Usdum, and Zoar, before ascending the Arabian mountains. The path in each case must have been round the S. end of the Dead Sea. No road is possible along the eastern shore.

The site need not have been actually within Ghōr eṣ-Ṣāfiyeh. It may have been a little higher for the sake of health and comfort. There are considerable ruins in Wādy el-Aḥsā, not far to the SE. Khirbet Labrush doubtless represents el-Burj, and may be the ruin of the Roman castle, wh. according to OEJ. furnished quarters for a Roman garrison.

We may glance briefly at two arguments used against the identification suggested above:—

(1) Lot saw "all the plain of Jordan . . . as thou goest unto Zoar" from his look-out in the mountain near Bethel (Gn. 19.^{10}). From that position the S. end of the Dead Sea is not visible. One would hardly speak of a plain in this position as the plain of Jordan.

It is to be noted that Lot could not have seen even the whole of the plain to the north of the Dead Sea. Further, the word kikkār denotes, not "plain," but "circle," or round; and would naturally apply to the whole of the lower part of the great depression, of which Zoar marked the south-eastern limit.

(2) Gn. 14.$^{7ff.}$ brings Chedorlaomer from the south to Hazazon-tamar (En-gedi), before the allied kings of the cities of the plain set the battle in array against him in the vale of Siddim. This implies that the vale of Siddim, with the five cities, were in the north.

The road from 'Ain Jidy to either end of the sea is difficult; but it would be much easier to take a body of men to the south than to the north. Possibly also Hazazon-tamar should be sought, not at 'Ain Jidy, but at Tamar, of wh. Ezekiel speaks, on the trade route between Elath and Hebron.

ZOBAH appears first as the enemy of Israel in the days of Saul, who is said to have fought against and vexed it (1 S. 14.^{47}). Next we hear of David defeating the king of Zobah unto or at Hamath, taking from him 1000 chariots, 700 horsemen, and 20,000 footmen, and reserving horses for 100 chariots. The Syrians of Damascus came to succour Hadadezer king of Zobah, and were utterly routed. Great and rich spoil fell to David, and Toi or Tou, king of Hamath, relieved of a troublesome foe by the fall of the king of Zobah, sent blessings and gifts to David (2 S. 8.$^{3ff.}$; 1 Ch. 18.$^{3ff.}$). The Syrians of Zobah next appear, with those of Beth-Rehob and Maacah, as allies of Ammon. The division of David's army under Joab utterly discomfited the Syrians. Hadadezer then made a great rally, gathering the Syrians from far and near, and under Shobach, the captain of his host, they met David, commanding his army in person, at HELAM. The Syrians were defeated with terrible slaughter, Shobach being among the slain (2 S. 10.$^{6ff.}$; 1 Ch. 19.$^{6ff.}$). From Hadadezer, weakened by this defeat, fled Rezon, who organised a raid upon Damascus, with such success that he became king of Damascus, and proved a bitter enemy to Israel for many years (1 K. 11.$^{23ff.}$). At a later time Solomon is said to have gone to HAMATH-ZOBAH and to have prevailed against it (2 Ch. 8.^{3}).

Such are the meagre details of history regarding Zobah as they stand in the records. That it was a power to be reckoned with is evident; but materials are lacking for any satisfactory account of their organisation and power, and even of the territory they occupied. Their strife with Hamath, and their assembly at Helam, point to possessions N. of Damascus and Hamath. The cuneiform inscriptions mention a Ṣubiti or Ṣubutu in this direction.

On the other hand they seem to have held territory between Beth Rehob and Maacah. These lay to the SW. of Damascus; and the inscriptions speak of a Subiti also in this quarter. It is impossible with our present information to come to any sure conclusion.

ZOHAR. (1) Father of Ephron the Hittite, from whom Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah (Gn. 23.[8], 25.[9]). (2) Son of Simeon (Gn. 46.[10]; Ex. 6.[15]), called Zerah in 1 Ch. 4.[24]. (3) A family of the sons of Judah (1 Ch. 4.[7] RVm.—AV. "Jezoar," RV. "Izhar").

ZOHELETH, "crawling thing," perhaps "serpent." Accdg. to 1 K. 1.[9], the stone of Z. was beside En-rogel. To furnish an opportunity for his proclamation as king, Adonijah made here a feast for his adherents. Prob., therefore, Z. was the sacrificial stone of a high place. The serpent may have been the symbol of a divinity (cp. Nu. 21.[8]; 2 K. 18.[4]), perhaps belonging to the spring, wh. also may have been called the "dragon's spring" (Ne. 2.[13]). The high place Tophet cd. not have been far away. As En-rogel is not the mod. ʿAin umm ed-Daraj (see Gihon), Z. has nothing to do with the steep incline now called saḥwēle, "sliding place," on the path to this spring fm. the rock-terrace of the vill. Silwān. The stone was near En-rogel, and therefore hardly in the king's garden, as Jos. says (Ant. VII. xiv. 4), but rather on the mod. threshing floor of Silwān, between the gardens and En-rogel.

G. H. Dalman.

ZOPHAI. A Kohathite Levite, son of Elkanah, an ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch. 6.[26]; "Zuph," 1 S. 1.[1]; "Ziph," 1 Ch. 6.[35]).

ZOPHAR, one of the three friends of Job, called "the Naamathite," and described by the LXX as "king of the Minæans" (Jb. 2.[11], &c.), probably chief of his tribe.

ZOPHIM, THE FIELD OF, one of the spots to which Balak took Balaam to see Israel, with a view to having them cursed (Nu. 23.[14]). It is probable that Zophim is not a proper name. The phrase may be translated literally "field of watchers." As a "place of outlook" it would naturally be on some height commanding an extensive prospect. Such places were familiar in days when men had to depend on observation to protect them against surprise. For Ramathaim-Zophim see Ramah.

ZORABABEL (Mw. 1.[12, 13]; Lk. 3.[27]) = ZERUBBABEL.

ZORAH, a town in the Shephelah, at first given to Judah (Jo. 15.[33]), then named as in the territory of Dan (Jo. 19.[41]). Samson's birth and burial are both placed between Zorah and Eshtaol in Mahaneh Dan (Jg. 13.[25], 16.[31]). It appears to have been colonised from Kirjath-jearim (1 Ch. 2.[53], 4.[2]). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[10]) and reoccupied after the Exile (Ne. 11.[29]). It is represented by the mod. Ṣurʿah, N. of Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār, c. 15 miles W. of Jerusalem. The inhabitants are called Zorathites (1 Ch. 4.[2]; 1 Ch. 2.[53], AV. "Zareathites," RV. "Zorathites"; 2.[54] for "Zorites" read "Zorathites").

ZUPH, a Kohathite Levite, ancestor of Samuel (1 S. 1.[1]; 1 Ch. 6.[35]). See Suphai.

ZUPH, THE LAND OF, a district reached by Saul and his servant when out searching for his father's asses, after passing through the lands of Shalishah and Shaalim (1 S. 9.[5]). No trace of such a name has been found, and there is nothing to guide us to an identification. It may have taken its name from the descendants of Zuph, if they settled there.

ZUR. (1) A prince of Midian slain by the Isarelites, at the time when Balaam was put to death (Nu. 31.[8]). He was father of Cozbi (Nu. 25.[15]). (2) Son of Jehiel, the founder of Gibeon (1 Ch. 8.[30], 9.[36]).

ZURIEL, a Merarite Levite, son of Abihail, chief of the clan at the time of the Exodus (Nu. 3.[35]).

ZURISHADDAI, father of Shelumiel, chief of the tribe of Simeon at the Exodus (Nu. 1.[6], 2.[12], &c.).

ZUZIM, a prehistoric people conquered by Chedorlaomer (Gn. 14.[5]). Fm. the resemblance of Z. to Zamzummim, and fm. the mention of Emim and Rephaim in the same connection (Dt. 2.[10, 12, 20, 21]), it is natural to suggest that the two are identical. Dr. Sayce has argued that the difference is due to a scribe writing w for m in copying fm. the cuneiform, as m and w resemble each other in Babylonian. They are said to have dwelt in Ham, a place that has not been identified. Dr. Driver (HDB.) suggests a connection with a place Ziza near Heshbon, but this seems unlikely. It is to be observed that the LXX, the Psh., the Tg. of Onkelos, and the Sam. Tg. all render "the strong people among them," as if they had read עוים בָּהֶם, ūzīm bāhem, instead of zūzīm bĕhām.

KHU-ATEN ADORING THE SUN

SLAUGHTER OF THE SEVEN MARTYR CHILDREN AND THEIR MOTHER

APOCRYPHA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The books that go by the name of Apocrypha in our English and Protestant German Bibles, when they occur at all, stand in a compartment by themselves, frequently with a separate title-page. Readers are therefore apt to fancy that the books so segregated were collected much in the same way as the books of the NT., by the authoritative decisions of councils. Few Protestants, except those who are in a manner experts, realise that, as originally collected in the LXX, they were mingled with the books of the Canon accepted by the Jews. The LXX arranged the books into the classes Historical, Poetical, Prophetical, in that order, and practically this is the order followed in the Vulgate and the Douay. The books that we call Apocrypha occur in the class to wh. they logically belong, and approximately in the chronological position in the class which fits their assumed date ; except the books of the Maccabees, which are generally, though not always, placed at the end. Tobit and Judith stand between Nehemiah and Esther ; the Wisdom of Solomon and Ecclesiasticus follow the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes ; and Baruch follows Jeremiah. The Additions to Esther and the stories of Bel and the Dragon, and of Susanna and the Elders, and the Song of the Three Holy Children, all are arranged in the books to which they are attributed. The English Reformers, while separating those books fm. those acknowledged to be authoritative, yet retained them in a deutero-canonical position, and in the early prayer-books a very much larger proportion of the Apocrypha was ordained to be read than is at present. In one respect the Council of Trent went further than the Reformers, as they relegated the Prayer of Manasses and 3rd and 4th Esdras to the end of Revelation, as of very doubtful acceptation.

The history of the term "Apocrypha" is interesting. To begin with, those books were called Apocryphi which contained doctrines that were hidden fm. the commonalty. An example of this is to be seen in 2 Es. 14.[44-48], in wh. Esdras is commanded to write ninety-four books, to deliver twenty-four to all, but to retain seventy for the wise. Heretical sects were always resting their peculiar doctrines on secret books that had been written by this or that ancient saint or prophet. This is not restricted to Christian books, for Clemens Alexandrinus credits Prodicus with the possession of the Biblous Apokruphous, "apocryphal books," of Zoroaster. The Gnostics and other heretics so frequently appealed to esoteric books, which it was pretended had been hidden (Libri Apocryphi), that the term soon came to mean what was unsound. Part of the answer of the orthodox to these heretics was that these secret esoteric books were forgeries : so the term came to mean false in claim and contents ; Irenæus (adv. Hær. i. 20) makes "apocryphal" equivalent to nothos, "spurious" ; so too Tertullian, when he wishes to decry the authority of the "Pastor" of Hermas, declares it to be one of the writings apocrypha et falsa. When the Canon had become fixed, and there was little danger of spurious books finding their way to general acknowledgment, a new application was given to the term, and a new explanation to suit this new use advanced. It was applied to the books now known by that name, so Jerome says of Judith that the Jews regarded it as apocryphal. Augustine uses the term much in its modern sense, as applicable to any book not in the Jewish Canon, but he explains it to mean, not that the books had been hidden or were intended to be hidden, but that their origin was unknown ; this implied that they were "pseudepigrapha," a reproach that is not deserved by at least Ecclesiasticus. During the Middle Ages there was considerable diversity of meaning attached to the term, but meantime the books wh. constitute our Apocrypha were generally acknowledged as received by the Church. Even in the earlier period, when there was more scholarship, and by divines who held that the only binding Canon was that of Palestine, the books themselves were quoted freely as if Scripture in the highest sense of the term, and defended against assault ; thus Origen maintained the authenticity of Susanna and the Elders.

The Extent of this Canon of Apocryphal Books.—Roughly speaking, it meant the books wh. were in the Canon of Alexandria, but not in that of Palestine. We have said it means this "roughly," because certain books appear only in some codices : e.g., the Psalter of Solomon is found only in the Codex Alexandrinus ; on the other hand, 2nd (4th) Esdras is not found in the Alexandrian Canon at all.

Josephus has announced the principle on wh. he and the Jews of his age understood the Palestinian Canon to have been framed. Those books alone were reckoned canonical and authoritative whose claim to prophetic authorship was admitted, and wh. were understood to be dated not later than the end of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus. Notwithstanding that the weight of critical opinion is adverse to the correctness of this view, yet the fact that it explains in the simplest and most natural way at once the inclusions and the exclusions of the Jewish Canon, the books received and those refused, we are inclined to admit its accuracy. Josephus was a learned Jew who had received his theological education within a century and a half fm. the date at wh., according to critical theories, the Canon was closed, he himself belonging to a race that specially reverenced tradition, and living in a country that had not within the period in question—i.e. from the death of Simon the Maccabee to the outbreak of the Jewish war—suffered any such revolution as mt. break the continuity of that tradition. In forming his opinion he had many advantages over even the most learned man of to-day, who is removed by more than twenty centuries fm. the transaction. Important sources of information, open to him, are no longer accessible. So far as can be ascertained, the principles on wh. the Alexandrian Canon was determined were very different. It wd. seem as if it were a received opinion that every religious work wh., having been written in Hebrew or Aramaic, was translated into Greek, ought to be admitted into the Canon. At the same time, in the prologue to his translation of his grandfather's work, Ecclesiasticus, the younger Ben Sira recognises the Canon of Palestine, and its division of the sacred books into the Law, the Prophets, and the other books (the Kethubim). It is said we have no certainty that the third class was closed; but no more have we any certainty that the "Law," in the three instances in wh. it is mentioned, meant the five books of Moses, or that the "Prophets" indicated any of the books we know by these designations. We must bear in mind that to a large extent the books wh. constitute the Septuagint were translated separately, and as translations published separately. The Pentateuch appears to have been first translated, though Margoliouth (Lines of Defence) indicates the probability that the Song of Solomon had before this been rendered into Greek, then the various books wh. made up the Canon of Jerusalem. These each wd. be written on a papyrus roll, and in turn placed in the scrinium that formed the library of the different synagogues in Alexandria or elsewhere in Egypt. When other moral and religious treatises of Palestinian origin were translated, they too were added to the libraries in the synagogues. The scrinia of the synagogues passed over to the churches, and when the habit arose of uniting all the sacred books in one large vellum codex, all the contents of these receptacles were published indiscriminately. Hence some codices contained more and some fewer of these deutero-canonical books. In regard to the books of the NT. there was a fringe of apocryphal writings; the presence of wh., in some of the more important codices, as Clement I. and II. in the Codex Alexandrinus, the Epistle of Barnabas and of Hermas in the Sinaiticus, is thus explicable. The books are very different in character and value. First Esdras, the book which stands first in our English Apocrypha, is made up of the two concluding chapters of 2 Ch. with portions of the canonical books of Ezra and Nehemiah; the midrash on the greatness of truth is interpolated. In some codices where it occurs it is headed "I. Esdras," and the canonical books of Ezra and Nehemiah are united to form "II. Esdras"; in pre-Tridentine editions of the Vulgate it is "III. Esdras." In those editions our 2 Esdras is called "IIII. Esdras"; it is really an apocalyptic book, and will be considered elsewhere along with other Apocalypses; it is not found in Gr., but has been trd. fm. a Latin version. The book of Tobit, or, as it is called in the Vlg., Tobias, purports to be the history of a pious Israelite of the tribe of Naphtali (who had been carried captive fm. Saphed by Salmanassar, king of the Assyrians, Vlg.); our version is made fm. the Greek, but Jerome says he made his—the Vlg.—fm. a Chaldee MS. Neubauer, about thirty years ago, published a Chaldee version of this story extracted fm. the Midrash Rabba Rabbatha, wh. in several points agrees more closely with the Vulgate than with the Greek. It probably had a Hebrew original. The book of Judith tells how a Jewish widow used her beauty to ensnare to his destruction Holofernes, the Assyrian general, who was besieging Bethulia, and so delivered the city. The havoc it makes of history and geography evidences the vagaries of Jewish imagination when it wd. imitate history.*

The next portion of the Apocrypha, the Rest of Esther, narrates visions of Mordecai, and gives an ornate version of some things stated in the canonical book. It may be noted that AHASUERUS becomes Artaxerxes. These are the historical books of the Apocrypha. The Wisdom books follow, corresponding to the Hagiographa of the Canon. The first of these is the Wisdom of Solomon; such is the English title of the book, but the writer himself makes no such claim. There are passages of great beauty and eloquence in this work. Traces of Greek thought have been found in it, but some have regarded it as early, but a paraphrase rather than a tr. The longest and to some extent the most valuable of the apocryphal books is Ecclesiasticus, as it is called in the Vlg. and the English; Ben Sira, as it is called in the Talmud. It is an imitation of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. The prophetic books are represented by Baruch, to which is appended the Epistle of Jeremiah. This seems to have been written in Judæa during the supremacy of the Lagids. Then follow the Additions to Daniel. Of these only the Song of the Three Holy Children appears to have been written in Hebrew. The Prayer of Manasses, wh. in pre-Tridentine Vulgates was appended to 2 Ch., is now relegated to the end of the NT. with 1st and 2nd Esdras. The two books of the Maccabees follow, of very different historical value; a third and fourth book are sometimes admitted, but not generally.

* Dr. Driver and Dr. G. A. Smith declare the geography of Judith immaculate (Authority and Archaeology, p. 148; HGHL. p. 108), yet, not to speak of such wild travesties of geographical fact as making Holofernes march from Nineveh to the W. of Cilicia, a distance of 600 miles, in three days, and, having crossed the mountains of Asia Minor, to emerge in Algiers, the High Priest Joachim charges the inhabitants of Bethulia to guard the passes toward Judaea against Holofernes (Jth. 4.[6]), but Bethulia is represented as on the edge of the plain of Esdraelon, while the flank of the invaders' army was at Geba (Jth. 3.[10]), directly between any possible position of Bethulia and Jrs. This wd. be true even if Bethulia be identified with Sanûr. It is true this immaculate geographer places the camp of Holofernes—wh. he also says is between Scythopolis (Beisan) and Geba (Jeba)—in the plain of Esdraelon.

The Value of the Apocrypha.—None of the writers makes any claim to inspiration. Indeed by implication the translator of Ecclesiasticus disclaims this for his grandfather in his prologue, when he informs his readers that it was his acquaintance with the Law, the Prophets, and the "other books of the Fathers" that led him to write what he did. That, with the exception of 1st Maccabees, the narratives are historically worthless, does not necessarily exclude the possibility of inspiration, as the writers mt. have been inspired to compose prolonged parables for the edification of the people of God. The "morals" of Tobit and Judith are merely those of the time when they were written, not the eternal morality of God as we find it in the Prophets and the Psalms. If we regard Jonah as a midrash, we find that it teaches that God is merciful to all men, and further that there is that in all men wh. makes them worthy, despite all their defects, that God shd. be merciful to them. Compare this with "Judith," in wh. a woman is represented as trading with her beauty that she may become a murderess. Jael, a barbarian in a wild, barbarous age, slew Sisera by treachery, but she did not allure him by playing on his lowest passions to get him in her power, as Judith did with Holofernes. Tobit may be better; but almsgiving, burying the dead that wd. otherwise be devoured, attending the feasts at Jrs., are not the loftiest features of a holy life. Ecclesiasticus is purely prudent worldliness, without hope for a Messiah for the nation, or a future life for the individual. Wisdom is certainly loftier, and may be looked upon as a preparation for Christ and Christianity. Baruch is an imitation of Daniel. The Additions to Daniel and Esther have little value morally. Something may be said for 2nd Maccabees, with all its rhetoric; the heroism under suffering narrated there not improbably helped to nerve the Christian martyrs of a later day. As history, 1st Maccabees is of the highest value. In these circumstances the opinion of the Reformers that these books shd. not be used for the proof of any doctrine was a wise one. They have a value of their own wh. is only now being appreciated. Formerly it was regarded as enough when a work was proved to be apocryphal to show it was unworthy of any further study; it was not evidence concerning the time at wh. it professed to be written, therefore it was looked upon as utterly valueless.

While the books of the Apocrypha are to this extent certainly of no value, yet in other ways their value is very great. Contemporaries are impressed by a man's individuality; those separated fm. him by a long space of time recognise much more his likeness to his contemporaries. Individuality counts for much, but environment for much more. As every man is thus to a great extent the product of his age and surroundings, his literary productions will reflect the character of that age and kin. This is the value of the Apocrypha. If we look into 1st Esdras and neglect what is merely another version of the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah, there remains the unhistorical episode of the three friends and Darius. It is clear that the original apologue contained only wine, the king, and women; the whole thing is on a low cynical plane; but an Elihu comes in and, recognising the low view of what really had influence, declares that mightier than all else is Truth. When this is analysed in the light of the wording of the answer we find that, in the thought of the speaker, behind Truth is Righteousness as the reason of its strength, and behind this again is God Himself, who is a God of Truth and Righteousness. At the time when the Greek Esdras was compiled there was a belief in the Divine Providence of God and its essential righteousness. There is further the belief that such a doctrine wd. be understood and accepted by Darius. 2nd Esdras is considered among the apocalyptic books. When the reader comes to the book of Tobit he enters a private region, an account of a private individual's history; a kind of composition of wh. the only example in the canonical Scripture is the story of Ruth. The lessons to be read fm. it are the views prevalent among the Jews as to the efficacy of prayer and almsgiving. The angelology of the book is worthy of note; Raphael declares himself one of the seven holy angels of God; in the canonical Scriptures only two angels are mentioned, Michael and Gabriel. We see the steps taken towards the more elaborate angelology of the book of Enoch. In Judith, a book that with all its geographical absurdities was quoted by Clement of Rome, the power of prayer comes into the region of the magical. Special value is attached to ascetic observances; Judith is held up to admiration because she lived in a tent on the roof of her house, wearing sackcloth, and fasting except on the feast days. This view of things, if it did not prompt, wd. tend to promote the great respect shown to solitaries and Stylites in later days. The Additions to Esther show traces of the effect produced by the oppressions endured at the hands of the Syrian monarchs, in making Aman (Haman) a Macedonian. The belief in the Divine method of revelation by dreams, in which the truth was made known in symbol, is also prominent. The Wisdom of Solomon, full of interest for its beauty, is also interesting for the revelation it gives of the thoughts prevalent among the Jews of from 50 to 100 B.C. The writer attempted to bridge the gulf that separated Hellenic from Greek thinking; this attempt was carried further by Philo. The praise of Wisdom, wh. occupies so large a space in this book, prepares the way for the "Logos" of Philo, as it again does for the "Word" of the fourth Gospel. Its theology is a preparation for that of Christianity: this is true also of its anthropology. The account it gives of man's original condition fits that of Christianity: "God created man to be immortal and made him to be an image of His own Eternity ('proper Being,' RV.): nevertheless through envy of the devil came death into the world" (Ws. 2.[23, 24]). This is the same account of the origin of moral evil as that wh. lies at the back of the parable of the "Tares and the Wheat." Another point to be observed is the clear, unhesitating assertion of personal immortality: "The righteous shall live for evermore and their reward also is with the Lord" (Ws. 5.[15]). The verses that immediately follow this appear to be the prototype of the Pauline passage, "Put on the whole armour of God" (Eph. 6.[11-17]). The figure of the potter with his power over the clay, used by St. Paul to make clear God's free choice, is used also by the writer of Wisdom, though in another connection. This book is in many respects the most important of those in the Apocrypha, as exhibiting most clearly the preparation for Christ that was going on in Judaism in the century immediately preceding the Advent. The value of the "Wisdom of Ben Sira," to give Ecclesiasticus its more ancient name, is of a different kind; while Wisdom looks forward, Ecclesiasticus looks back. It has been nurtured in Pal., and is full of reminiscences of Proverbs, Psalms, and Ecclesiastes; we see the attitude of mind wh. formed and consecrated the Canon of OT. Scripture. The mind of Siracides was prevented by his date fm. being Sadducean, but it has in it all the elements of what afterwards characterised that sect—shrewd worldliness without much spiritual outlook. He is not prepared to deny the existence of angel or spirit, but they are in the background of his thoughts. This very descent towards the spiritual bankruptcy wh. overtook Israel at the time our Lord was on the earth was preparative; the empty formalism of the Pharisees, the worldliness of the priests, the hypocrisy of the teachers of the law, all prepared the longing heart to receive the fulness that was in Christ. At the same time, if we may take Ben Sira as a sample, the people had still a profound trust in God which enabled them to maintain high hopes of Messianic times and Messianic glories. Something of this may be seen in the closing chapter of Ecclesiasticus, wh. assumes the form of a psalm, and this despite the Pharisaic self-complacency that characterises it. As we have indicated above, while Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus represent the Hokmah Literature, the book of Baruch is an imitation of the prophetic. The characteristic of this book wh. most impresses the reader is its dependence on the older Scriptures, especially in the "prayer" wh. occupies the first part, Daniel being chiefly drawn upon. The note of this first portion of the book is penitence mingled with hope of deliverance. The second portion, the praise of Wisdom, is full of hope of Messianic times, when Israel shall be restored to glory and privilege. The presence of these hopes reveals a spiritual soil fitted for the upspringing of the "kingdom of heaven." The Epistle of Jeremy, usually reckoned as chap. 6. of Baruch, is a denunciation of idolatry, an evidence of how far removed the Jews were fm. the position of their fathers, who were so prone to the worship of idols. The Additions to Daniel have different values. The Prayer of Azarias appears to be the authentic work of some later Azariah who wrote during the time of distress under Epiphanes, who recognises the sin of his people in their punishment. It is to be noted as an evidence of date that, though confessing sin, Azariah says nothing of the idolatry which had been so markedly the crying sin of Israel in the times before the Captivity. The Benedicite is a somewhat verbose imitation of the more liturgic portion of the Psalms; thus, e.g., the fact that the "spirits and souls of the righteous" are called upon to bless the Lord (Ps. 103.[1]). The Story of Susanna is an evidence of the hypocrisy of those who claimed a religious authority. The other two, Bel and the Dragon, are directed in mockery against idolatry. The Prayer of Manasses has little value in any way; it is merely an exercise prompted by 2 Ch. 33.[12f., 19]: it certainly exhibits a sense of the majesty and holiness of God wh. reveals the principle that kept the Jews true to God in their post-exilic history. 1st Maccabees is plain, unobtrusive history, and reveals the courage of the Israelites in the most trying circumstances, but at the same time, as mt. be expected, there is little expression of religious thought or feeling. The victories of Judas certainly preserved Judaism fm. sinking beneath the attacks of heathenism. They enabled the nation to look the world in the face with a sense of self-maintained independence. The fruit of this was seen in the contest against the Romans in A.D. 69–70. All through the Roman empire the Jews were proudly maintaining their isolation fm. the rest of the subject nationalities, and their brotherhood among themselves. This gave the apostles of the new faith a standing point in every city whither they went. 2nd Maccabees, though of very little value historically, is full of evidences of Jewish religious thought and feeling. Fm. the Apocrypha we are enabled to apprehend the preparation God was making for the coming of His Son into the world, and for the setting up of a spiritual kingdom in the world. If we wd. understand the influences at work when Christianity was introduced into the thought of humanity we must study the deutero-canonical writings, the Apocrypha. The Psalter of Solomon, wh. has been reckoned to the Apocrypha by Swete, we shall consider under Apocalyptic.

Tobit and the Angel

A

AALAR. See ADDAN.

ABADIAS, son of Jehiel, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Es. 8.^{35}), called "Obadiah" in Ez. 8.^{9}.

ABDIAS, the name given to the prophet Obadiah in 2 Es. 1.^{39}.

ABISEI, RV. ABISSEI, son of Phinehas (2 Es. 1.^{2}), called "Abisue" in 1 Es. 8.^{2}, and "Abishua" in 1 Ch. 6.^{4}.

ABISUE, AV. ABISUM = ABISEI.

ABSALOM. (1) Father of MATTATHIAS (1 M. 11.^{70}), who fought with Jonathan against the Syrians at Hazor. Another son of A. was Jonathan, whom Simon sent to secure Joppa (1 M. 13.^{11}; Ant. XIII. vi. 4). (2) One of the ambassadors sent to Lysias, the governor of Cœle-Syria, when, after the battle of Bethsura, he was in a conciliatory mood (2 M. 11.^{17}). He may poss. be ident. with (1).

ABUBUS, the father of PTOLEMY, who was son-in-law of Simon the Maccabee, and captain of the plain of Jericho (1 M. 16.$^{11, 15}$).

ACATAN, RV. AKATAN (1 Es. 8.^{38}), head of a family who returned from Babylon, called "Hakkatan" in Ez. 8.^{12}.

ACCABA, AV. AGABA (1 Es. 5.^{30}), head of a family of "Temple servants" who returned with Zerubbabel, called "Hagab" in Ez. 2.^{46}, and "Hagaba" in Ne. 7.^{48}.

ACCARON, RV. EKRON (1 M. 10.^{89}). It was given by Alexander Balas, along with "the borders thereof," to Jonathan Maccabæus.

ACCOS, grandfather of Eupolemus, one of the ambassadors sent to Rome by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 8.^{17}). The name represents the Heb. "Hakkoz."

ACCOZ, RV. AKKOS, head of a family of priests who returned with Zerubbabel, whose genealogy had been lost (1 Es. 5.^{38}); called "Hakkoz" in Ez. 2.^{61}.

ACHAR. ACHAN (AV.) is so called in 2 Es. 7.^{38} (RV.).

ACHIACHARUS, an officer of Sarchadonus—i.e. Esarhaddon—his "cup-bearer, signet-keeper, steward, and overseer of accounts" (To. 1.$^{21f.}$). He was the son of Tobit's brother Anael, and cared for his uncle in Nineveh while he was blind (2.^{10}, &c.).

ACHIAS, son of PHINEES, ancestor of Ezra (2 Es. 1.^{2}), not named in 1 Es. and Ezra.

ACHIOR, "captain of all the sons of Ammon," who sought to dissuade Holofernes from attacking the Israelites (Jth. 5.$^{5ff.}$), and who in consequence was bound by order of Holofernes and handed over to the Israelites at Bethulia (6.^{10}, &c.). Later he became a proselyte (14.^{10}).

ACHIPHA, AV. ACIPHA, head of a family of "Temple servants" who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{31}), called "Hakupha" in Ez. 2.^{51}.

ACHITOB, the High Priest AHITUB (1 Es. 8.^{2}; 2 Es. 1.^{1}).

ACITHO, an ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.^{1}).

ACRA (1 M. 1.^{33}, &c., AV. "stronghold," RV. "citadel"). See JERUSALEM in Canonical Section.

ACUA, RV. ACUD, head of a family of "Temple servants" who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{30}), called "Akkub" in Ez. 2.^{45}.

ACUB, head of a family of "Temple servants" (1 Es. 5.^{31}), called "Bakbuk" in Ez. 2.^{51}.

ADASA, the place where Judas Maccabæus encamped before the battle in which Nicanor fell (1 M. 7.$^{40, 45}$). Nicanor's camp was at Beth-horon, from wh. Adasa was 30 stadia distant (Jos. Ant. XII. x. 5). OEJ. places it near Gophna, i.e. Jifneh. We may, therefore, ident. it with Khirbet 'Adaseh, c. eight miles S. of Jifneh, above Wâdy ed-Dumm, "the vale of blood." The name of this valley may enshrine some memory of the great victory won by Judas.

ADDAN, an unidentd. town in Babylonia called Aalar (RV. Allar) in 1 Es. 5.^{36}, Addan in Ez. 2.^{59}, Addon in Ne. 7.^{61}.

ADDI. "The sons of Addi" were among those who had married strange wives, and who put them away with their children (1 Es. 9.^{31}).

ADDO, the father of Zacharias = IDDO (1 Es. 6.^{1}).

ADDUS. (1) Head of a family of "servants of Solomon" (1 Es. 5.^{34}). (2) Head of a family of priests who had lost their genealogy (1 Es. 5.^{38}, RV. "Jaddus").

ADIDA, a town in the Shephelah, fortified by Simon Maccabæus (1 M. 12.^{38}, 13.^{13}) during his struggle with Trypho. Here Aretas defeated Alexander (Ant. XIII. xv. 2), and Vespasian placed an outpost at the siege of Jerusalem (BJ. IV. ix. 1). OEJ. (s.v. Aditha) places it east of Diospolis (Lydda). It may be identd. with the mod. Hadîtheh, c. 3½ miles NE. of Ludd.

ADIN, head of a family of whom 454 returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{14}; Ez. 2.^{15}) and 251 under Ezra (1 Es. 8.^{32}; Ez. 8.^{6}, the number in Ezra is 51).

ADINUS, RV. IADINUS, one of those who made the people understand when Ezra read the law, a Levite (1 Es. 9.^{48}) corresponding to "Jamin" in Ne. 8.^{7}.

ADORA. See ADORAIM.

ADUEL, a Naphtalite, great-grandfather of Tobit (To. 1.^{1}).

ÆDIAS (1 Es. 9.^{27}), one who had married a strange wife (Ez. 10.^{26}, "Elijah" RV.).

ÆSORA, a town in Samaria, apparently near to Salem (Sālim), poss. ident. with 'Asīreh, to the NE. of Nāblus (Jth. 4.[4], AV. " Esora ").

AGABA, RV. ACCABA, which see.

AGGABA, AV. GRABA, head of a family of " servants of the Temple " (1 Es. 5.[29]), called " Hagabah " in Ez. 2.[45]; " Hagaba " in Ne. 7.[48].

AGGÆUS, AV. AGGEUS, the prophet Haggai (1 Es. 6.[1], 7.[3]; 2 Es. 1.[40]).

AGIA, AV. HAGIA, head of a family of the sons of the servants of Solomon (1 Es. 5.[34]), called " Hattil " in Ez. 2.[57]; Ne. 7.[59].

AHASUERUS, AV. ASSUERUS, a " king of Media," named with " Nebuchadnezzar " as overthrowing Nineveh (To. 14.[15]).

AHITOB. See ACHITOB.

AIRUS, RV. JAIRUS, head of a family of " Temple servants " (1 Es. 5.[31]), called " Reaiah " in Ez. 2.[47].

AKATAN. See ACATAN.

AKKOS. See ACCOZ.

AKRABATTINE, AV. wrongly, ARABATTINE, the district in Idumæa where Judas Maccabæus fought the Edomites (1 M. 5.[3]; Ant. XII. viii. 1). It can hardly be ident. with EKREBEL of Jth. 7.[18]. It is not identified.

ALCIMUS (Gr. Ἄλκιμος, " valiant," formed fm. the Heb. אֶלְיָקִים, " God sets up "), son or sister's son of Jose ben-Joeser. He was a descendant of Aaron, but not of the family of the High Priest. A man of strong Hellenistic sympathies, he commended himself to the Greek masters of Pal. (1 M. 7.[5, 14]; 2 M. 14.[3]; Ant. XII. x. 3). Apparently on the death of Menelaus he was nominated to the High-priesthood by Antiochus Eupator; but this was not accepted by the Jews. Alcimus, therefore, went to Antioch, where men of like sympathies resorted to him. On the accession of Demetrius Soter, Alcimus secured his support. Bacchides was dispatched with an army to establish him in Jerusalem, where the influence of Judas Maccabæus was powerful. No resistance was offered, and but for the treacherous severity practised in putting sixty men of the nationalist party to death, the effort might have succeeded. This turned the thoughts of men to Judas. A force left by Bacchides in Jerusalem protected Alcimus there; but Judas steadily strengthened his hold in the country. Feeling no longer safe, Alcimus again repaired to Antioch. Nicanor, sent by Demetrius in Alcimus' interest with an army, came to an amicable understanding with Judas, contrary to the desire of Alcimus, who appealed once more to Demetrius. Acting under peremptory orders, Nicanor attempted to take Judas, but failed, and himself fell in the battle of Adasa, when his army was almost annihilated. Bacchides was then sent with a strong force, and in battle with him at Eleasa Judas was defeated and slain. The victorious general gave Alcimus the support required, and he exercised the office of High Priest until his death. It is said that he wished to remove " the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary," and " the works of the prophets." It is impossible to say which wall is intended. It may have been the barrier beyond wh. the Gentiles might not pass, wh. tradition described as " the work of the prophets " Haggai and Zechariah. The demolition, however, had only begun, when Alcimus was stricken down with paralysis.

ALEMA, a strong city of Gilead (1 M. 5.[26]). This may be ident. with Kefr el-Mā', a large village on the summit of the western slopes of Nahr er-Ruqqād, c. 13 miles W. of el-Merkez. The natives pronounce the name Kefr Ĕlma (Schumacher, Across the Jordan, p. 83, note).

ALEXANDER BALAS. See SELEUCID KINGS.

ALLAR. See ADDAN.

ALLOM, RV. ALLON, head of a family of the sons of the servants of Solomon (1 Es. 5.[34]).

ALNATHAN, RV. ELNATHAN, one of those sent to secure men who might " execute the priests' office in the house of the Lord " (1 Es. 8.[44]).

ALTANEUS, RV. MALTANEUS, one of the sons of Asom (1 Es. 9.[33]), called MATTENAI in Ez. 10.[33].

AMAN, mentioned as an illustration of ingratitude for his mishandling of Achiacharus, " who had brought him up " (To. 14.[10]).

AMARIAS, father of Ahitub, an ancestor of Ezra (1 Es. 8.[2]), called " Amariah " in Ez. 7.[3].

AMATHEIS, one of the sons of Bebai (1 Es. 9.[29]), called " Athlai " in Ez. 10.[28].

AMATHIS, RV. HAMATH, which see (1 M. 12.[25]).

AMMIDIOI, AV. AMMIDOI, possibly men of Humtah (Jo. 15.[54]) who came from Bab. with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[20]).

ANAEL, brother of Tobit, and father of Achiacharus (To. 1.[21]).

ANAN, head of a family of " Temple servants " (1 Es. 5.[30]), called " Hanan " in Ez. 2.[46].

ANANIAS. (1) Head of a family, some of whom returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[16], RV. ANNIS). (2) Son of Emmer (1 Es. 9.[21]), called " Hanani " in Ez. 10.[20]. (3) Son of Bebai (1 Es. 9.[29]), called " Hananiah " in Ez. 10.[28]. (4) One who stood by Ezra, on his right hand, when he read the law (1 Es. 9.[43]), called " Anaiah " in Ne. 8.[4]. (5) A Levite who explained the law (1 Es. 9.[48]), called " Hanan " in Ne. 8.[7]. (6) " Ananias the great," a kinsman of Tobit, whose son Azarias was impersonated by the angel Raphael (To. 5.[12]). (7) An ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.[1]).

ANANIEL, grandfather of Tobit (To. 1.[1]).

ANDRONICUS. (1) The deputy left by Antiochus Epiphanes in Antioch when he hurried off to allay the disturbance in Tarsus and Mallos (2 M. 4.[31]). He was bribed by MENELAUS to make away with Onias, who was then resident in Antioch. Made aware of the plot, the latter fled for sanctuary to Daphne. Andronicus deceived him with demonstrations of good will, and, having enticed him forth, treacherously slew him. For this infamous conduct he paid with his life on the return of Antiochus (2 M. 14.[32ff.]). (2) The governor left by Antiochus in Garizim to "vex" the Jews (2 M. 5.[23]).

ANNAAS, RV. SANAAS, head of a family who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[23]), called SENAAH in Ez. 2.[35]; Ne. 7.[38].

ANNAS, head of a family who returned with Ezra (1 Es. 9.[32]), called "Harim" in Ez. 10.[31].

ANNIS. See ANANIAS (1).

ANNUUS (1 Es. 8.[48]), a name not found in other lists. It may have arisen through error from אִתּוֹ, "with him," in Ez. 8.[19]—the scribe reading אנו.

ANOS, a son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[34]), called "Vaniah" in Ez. 10.[36].

ANTILIBANUS, the range running along the eastern side of Cœle-Syria (Jth. 1.[7]). See LEBANON in Canonical Section.

ANTIOCHIA (1 M. 4.[35], &c.) is ANTIOCH, which see in Canonical Section.

ANTIOCHIANS, citizens of Antioch. JASON asked, among other favours, from Antiochus Epiphanes, the right to enrol the inhabitants of Jerusalem as "Antiochians," i.e. that they might have the privileges of citizens of Antioch. The request was granted, and a party known by that name was formed in Jerusalem; but what the privileges were we do not know (2 M. 4.).

ANTIOCHIS, a concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 M. 4.[30]).

ANTIOCHUS. One of Jonathan's ambassadors to the Romans was Numenius, son of Antiochus (1 M. 12.[16], 14.[22]).

ANTIOCHUS. See SELEUCID KINGS.

ANTIPATER, son of Jason, one of Jonathan's ambassadors to the Romans and Lacedæmonians (1 M. 12.[16], 14.[22]).

ANUS, a Levite who explained the law (1 Es. 9.[48]), called "Bani" in Ne. 8.[7].

APAME, daughter of Bartacus, concubine of Darius (1 Es. 4.[29]).

APAMEA, through which Holofernes marched (Jth. 3.[10]), may be identical with the Roman district of Northern Syria, Apamēnē, which took its name from the city Apameia, called from the Persian wife of Seleucus Nicator, about six miles east of the Orontes, the mod. Qal'at el-Mudīq.

APHÆREMA, AV. APHEREMA, a district of Samaria added to Judæa by Demetrius Soter (1 M. 11.[34]; Ant. XIII. iv. 9). See EPHRAIM in Canonical Section.

APHERRA, head of a family of the sons of Solomon's servants (1 Es. 5.[34]), not named in the other lists.

APOLLONIUS, a very common name among the Syro-Macedonians. Prideaux (Connection, under the year B.C. 148) distinguishes five of the name connected with Maccabæan history. (1) Son of Thraseas, governor of Cœle-Syria (i.e. Palestine) and Phœnicia under Seleucus Philopator when Heliodorus came to Jerusalem to rob the Temple (2 M. 3.[5]): he supported Simon, governor of the Temple, against Onias the High Priest (2 M. 4.[4]). He was chief minister to Seleucus; but on the accession of that king's brother, Antiochus Epiphanes, he left Syria and retired to Miletus. (2) Son of (1), who resided at Rome with Demetrius, son of Seleucus Philopator, who was then a hostage there. When Demetrius recovered the crown of Syria, A. was made governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, the same government as his father held under Seleucus Philopator. This is probably the A. of 1 M. 10.[69]: continued in his office by Alexander, he revolted to support Demetrius, son of his old master. (3) Son of Menestheus, a favourite and chief minister of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 M. 4.[21]). This is probably the A. of 1 M. 1.[29]; 2 M. 5.[24], who is said to be over the tribute and to have built the fortress on Mount Acra which for long held the Jews in check. (4) A governor of Samaria who in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes was killed in battle by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 3.[10]). (5) Son of Gennæus, a local governor under Antiochus Epiphanes, noted as a special enemy of the Jews (2 M. 12.[2]).

APOLLOPHANES, one killed by the soldiers of Judas Maccabæus after the capture of Gazara (2 M. 10.[37]).

APPHUS, surname of Jonathan Maccabæus (1 M. 2.[5]), perhaps meaning "dissembler" (Heb. ḥaphūsh).

ARABATTINE. See AKRABATTINE.

ARADUS (1 M. 15.[23]) = ARVAD, which see.

ARATHES, AV. ARIARTHES, which see.

ARBATTIS, RV. ARBATTA, a district from which Simon Maccabæus removed the Jewish inhabitants for safety to Jerusalem. He had fought successfully against "the heathen" in Galilee, chasing them to the gates of Ptolemais; but judged that the Jewish population were not able to defend themselves without assistance from the south (1 M. 5.[21ff.]). The phrase, "those that were in Galilee and in Arbattis," suggests two districts. Galilee is well known, and, as it is first mentioned, the second probably lay on his way home. The most likely identification is with the toparchy of Akrabattis, which lay to the SE. of Shechem (Jos. BJ. III. iii. 4f.). Other suggestions are the plain of el-Baṭeiḥa, through which the Jordan enters the Sea of Galilee (Ewald, Hist. of Isr., v. 341), and "the Arabah or Araboth (ערבות) of Jordan" (EB. s.v.).

ARBELA. "When Demetrius heard that Nica-nor and his host were slain in battle, he sent Bacchides and Alcimus into the land of Judæa the second time, and with them the chief strength of his host: who went forth by the way that leadeth to Galgala, and pitched their tents before Masaloth, which is in Arbela, and after they had won it they slew much people" (1 M. 9.[1ff.]). "Demetrius sent . . . Bacchides again with an army into Judæa, who marched out of Antioch and came into Judæa, and pitched his camp at Arbela, a city of Galilee: and having besieged and taken those that were there in caves (for many people fled into such places), he removed, and made all the haste he could to Jerusalem" (Jos. Ant. XII. xi. 1).

These extracts furnish all the information there is regarding the position of Arbela. The writer of 1 Maccabees makes the march by way of Galgala (Gilgal), while Josephus takes it through Galilee. The former places the camp at "Masaloth in Arbela"; the latter "at Arbela, a city of Galilee." Josephus also refers to the caves whence the refugees were brought out and slain.

Some would place Arbela at the mod. Irbid or Irbil—a pronunciation still heard among the natives—on the southern edge of the gorge, Wādy el-Ḥamām, to the west of el-Mejdel. This lies on a route which the army may quite well have followed. The caves in the precipitous side of the gorge leave no doubt that this is the place intended by Josephus. No trace of a Masaloth, however, has been found in the vicinity. Robinson ingeniously suggests (BRP. ii. 398, note) that this name may represent the Heb. mĕsillōth, "steps, stories, terraces," and refer to the stronghold in the face of the cliffs.

Others, following 1 Maccabees, would identify "Galgala" (Gilgal) with the mod. Jiljilia, c. 5 miles N. of Bīr ez-Zait, and Masaloth with the mod. Meselieh, c. 3 miles SE. of Dothan. There is, however, no trace of Arbela in this neighbourhood. The writer seems to use it as the name of a district. OEJ. notes a village of this name in the great plain nine miles from Legio (Lejjūn); but the site is entirely lost. The name may have applied to the whole district.

Other suggestions have been made; but the choice lies practically between these two. 1 Maccabees is certainly the older authority, but Josephus must have been familiar with the history; and considering his intimate knowledge of Galilee and the adjoining districts, his evidence deserves special consideration. No certain decision is possible.

ARBONAI, a river mentioned in Jth. 2.[24], where it is said that Holofernes "went over the Euphrates . . . and destroyed all the high cities that were upon the river Arbonai." Some have thought the Chaboras is intended: others, that the name has arisen from misunderstanding of the original, which may have been "the cities which were בעבר הנהר beyond the river," עבר being taken for a proper name and being supplied with a Greek ending (EB. s.v.). The reading in BA. is Abrōna.

ARDATH, RV. ARDAT, a field named in 2 Es. 9.[26] as the scene of a vision of Esdras. Possibly Arad may be intended.

ARES, head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[10]), called "Arah" in Ez. 2.[5].

AREUS, RV. ARIUS. The king of Sparta referred to in 1 M. 12.[7, 20] is Areus I., who reigned B.C. 309–265. He is represented as corresponding with his contemporary, Onias the High Priest, successor of Jaddua. To this correspondence Jonathan Maccabæus referred in his communication sent by ambassadors to the Lacedæmonians c. B.C. 144. The name "Oniares" (v. 19 AV.) has arisen from confusion of the names of Onias and Arius (Ὀνίᾳ Ἀρεῖος).

ARIARTHES, RV. ARATHES, one of the kings to whom "Lucius, consul of the Romans," wrote, requiring favourable treatment of the Jews (1 M. 15.[22]). The monarch intended is Ariarthes VI., Philopator, king of Cappadocia (B.C. 163–130). Educated in Rome, he imbibed Roman ideas, and was entirely subservient to the wishes of Rome. He suffered defeat at the hands of Demetrius Soter, whose sister he had refused to marry, and took refuge in Rome. His kingdom was restored to him by the Romans.

ARNA, an ancestor of Ezra (2 Es. 1.[2]), corresponding to Zarias (1 Es. 8.[2]) and to Zerahiah (Ez. 7.[4]).

AROM, head of a family, some of whom returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[16]). Poss. we shd. read "Asom," which might represent "Hashum" in Ez. 2.[19].

ARPHAXAD, a king who reigned over the Medes in Ecbatana, a city which he is described as making enormously strong (Jth. 1.[1-4]). He was, however, overcome and slain by "Nabuchadonosor, king of the Assyrians," who utterly destroyed Ecbatana (vv. 13ff.). No king of this name is known to history; and it is impossible to identify the monarch referred to.

ARSACES. The monarch referred to in 1 M. 14.[2f.] was the sixth "king of the Persians," i.e. of the Parthians, who had borne that name. He was also known as Mithridates I. When Demetrius Nikator entered his territory Arsaces sent an army which defeated him, and carried him captive. While the Parthian king kept Demetrius a close prisoner, he treated him with kindness, and gave him his daughter Rhodogune as a wife. There Demetrius died (Ant. XIII. v. 11). Although not subject to Rome, a letter was sent by the Roman consul to Arsaces (1 M. 15.[22]; cp. Ant. XIV. viii. 5).

ARSARETH, RV. ARZARETH. This probably corresponds to the Heb. אֶרֶץ אַחֶרֶת, "the other land" (cp. Dt. 29.[28]). Into this land "the ten tribes" (2 Es. 13.[40]) were carried away. It is "a year and a half" beyond the river Euphrates (vv. 44f.). Josephus also speaks of "the ten tribes" being "beyond the Euphrates till now, an immense multitude, and not to be estimated by numbers" (Ant. XI. v. 2).

ARSIPHURETH, AV. AZEPHURITH, head of a family, some of whom returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[16]). The name in the corresponding lists is "Jorah" in Ez. 2.[18], and "Hariph" in Ne. 7.[24].

ARZARITH. See ARSARETH.

ASADIAS, son of Chilcias, an ancestor of Baruch (Ba. 1.[1]). The name seems to be the Greek form of the Heb. "Hasadiah" (cp. 1 Ch. 3.[20]).

ASAEL, RV. ASIEL, an ancestor of Tobit (To. 1.[1]). The name may be a corruption from Jahzeel (Gn. 46.[24]), a son of Naphtali, to wh. tribe Asael belonged.

ASANA, head of a family of "Temple servants" who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[31]), called "Asnah" in Ez. 2.[50].

ASARA. See AZARA.

ASARAMEL, AV. SARAMEL. As the translation stands it is the place where the assembly of the Jews was held at which Simon Maccabæus received the High-priesthood. There is no other trace of a place so called. Many conjectures have been made as to what the word may mean: e.g. ḥatzar 'am 'el, "court of the people of God"; sha'ar 'am 'el, "gate of the people of God": some have thought it might be a title of Simon himself, sar 'am 'el, "prince of the people of God." But nothing can be said with certainty.

ASBAZARETH (AV. 1611), AZBASARETH, RV. ASBASARETH, RVm. ASBACAPHATH, the name of an Assyrian king (1 Es. 5.[69]), possibly corrupted from "Esarhaddon" (cp. Ez. 4.[2]).

ASCALON (1 M. 10.[86], &c.). See ASHKELON.

ASEAS, one of the sons of Annas who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[32]; Ez. 10.[31], "Ishijah").

ASEBEBIA, RV. ASEBEBIAS, a Levite who returned with Ezra (1 Es. 8.[47]), called "Sherebiah" in Ez. 8.[18].

ASEBIA, RV. ASEBIAS, one of the Levites who came up with Ezra (1 Es. 8.[48]), called "Hashabiah" in Ez. 8.[19].

ASER, RV. ASHER, a city in Galilee, probably identical with Hazor 1 (To. 1.[2]).

ASERER, RV. SERAR, head of a family of Temple servants who went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[32]), called "Sisera" in Ez. 2.[53].

ASIBIAS, one of the sons of Parosh, who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[26]), corresponding to "Malchijah" in Ez. 10.[25].

ASIEL. (1) One of Ezra's swift scribes (2 Es. 14.[24]). (2) See ASAEL.

ASIPHA, head of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[29]), called "Hasupha" in Ez. 2.[43]; Ne. 7.[46].

ASMODÆUS, an evil spirit first mentioned in the book of Tobit (3.[8]). He is represented as loving Sara, only daughter of Raguel of Ecbatana, and as having caused the death on the bridal night of seven husbands who had married her in succession. The young Tobias deprived him of his power by acting on the advice of the angel Raphael (6.[15]). He burnt on "the ashes of perfume" the heart and liver of a fish which he caught in the Tigris. The smell drove the spirit into the remote parts of Upper Egypt, where the angel bound him (To. 8.[3]). Milton refers to the incident in Paradise Lost, iv. 168–171. The name used to be connected with the Hebrew verb shāmad, "destroy"; but it is now generally associated with Zoroastrianism, by which later Jewish angelology and demonology were greatly influenced. The name is now taken as the equivalent of the Persian "Æshma-Deva," the spirit of concupiscence, who at times arose to the rank of the prince of demons.

ASOM, one whose sons had married foreign wives (1 Es. 9.[33]), called "Hashum" in Ez. 10.[33].

ASPALATHUS, a fragrant material named with other spices used in the compounding of unguents (Sr. 24.[15]). It cannot now be identified.

ASPHAR, THE POOL, in the wilderness of Tekoa, where Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus pitched their tents, when they fled from Bacchides (1 M. 9.[33]; Ant. XIII. i. 2), may possibly be identical with Bīr Selhūb, a large reservoir c. six miles WSW. of 'Ain Jidy (Robinson, BRP. ii. 202). If this be correct, the name has disappeared from the pool, but it lingers in that of the neighbouring hills, Safrā. Ez-za'ferāneh, a cistern, with ruins around it, to the south of Tekoa, is favoured by several scholars (see Buhl, GAP. p. 158).

ASPHARASUS, an associate of Zerubbabel in leading the return from Babylon (1 Es. 5.[8]), called "Mispar" in Ez. 2.[2]; "Mispereth" in Ne. 7.[7].

ASSABIAS, RV. SABIAS, one of the "captains over thousands" who gifted lambs and calves to the Levites at Josiah's passover (1 Es. 1.[9]), called "Hashabiah" in 2 Ch. 35.[9].

ASSALIMOTH, RV. SALIMOTH, one of the chiefs who went up with Ezra from Babylon (1 Es. 8.[36]), called "Shelomith" in Ez. 8.[10].

ASSANIAS, RV. ASSAMIAS, one of the twelve priests to whom the treasure and the sacred vessels of the Temple were entrusted on the return from Babylon (1 Es. 8.[54]), called "Hashabia" in Ez. 8.[24].

ASSAPHIOTH, AV. AZAPHION, head of a family among the sons of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[33]), called "Hassophereth" in Ez. 2.[55], AV. "Sophereth"; and "Sophereth" in Ne. 7.[57].

ASSIDEANS, RV. HASIDEANS, RVm. "that is Chasidim." The Heb. word ḥasīdīm, "pious ones," of which this is a Greek transliteration, is frequently applied to godly Israelites (AV. "saints"). It was appropriated by a party in the time of the Greek ascendency, who held aloof from the priestly party who were inclined to Hellenism. They were religious purists, clinging tenaciously to the ancient law. They cared nothing for politics save when their religious freedom was endangered. From their ranks came the martyrs during the persecution of Antiochus IV. They had no sympathy with the Maccabæan national aspirations. They co-operated with Judas only to secure liberty to follow their own religious practices, and deserted him when this was attained. To their defection may be attributed his downfall. They accepted Alcimus as High Priest, although he was nominated by the Greek king, because he was "a priest of the seed of Aaron" (1 M. 7.[12f.]; cp. 1 M. 2.[42]; 2 M. 14.[6]—which entirely misrepresents the relation of the Assideans to Judas). For their relation to the Pharisees and Essenes see PHARISEES and WAITERS FOR THE REDEMPTION.

ASSUERUS, RV. AHASUERUS, which see (To. 14.[15]).

ASSUR (2 Es. 2.[8]; Jth. 2.[14]) = ASSYRIA, which see in Canonical Section.

ASTAD, AV. SADAS, one whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[13]), called "Azgad" in Ez. 2.[12]; Ne. 7.[17]. In 1 Es. 8.[38] his name is given as "Astath."

ASTATH. See preceding article.

ASTYAGES is named as the predecessor of Cyrus on the Persian throne (Bel. v. 1). See CYRUS.

ASUR, AV. ASSUR, head of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[31]), called "Harhur" in Ez. 2.[51]; Ne. 7.[53].

ATAR, AV. JATAL, head of a family of doorkeepers who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[28]), called "Ater" in Ez. 2.[42]; Ne. 7.[45].

ATARGATIS, RV. wrongly ATERGATIS. This goddess is mentioned only in 2 M. 12.[26] in connection with her temple at Carnion (Ashteroth Karnaim). Judas Maccabæus took and destroyed the town. The inhabitants took refuge in the temple of Atargatis: but that did not protect them: they were slain to the number of five and twenty thousand; and the temple itself was burned (Ant. XII. viii. 4).

Some have identified Atargatis with Astarte, the Ashteroth to whom the city owed its name. This, however, has been shown to be incorrect. At Ascalon, Atargatis (Derkĕto) had a temple distinct from that of Astarte. The first element of the name, 'atar, is = Heb. 'Ashter; but the second element represents the name of the Palmyrene deity 'Athi. She is therefore Astarte with the attributes of 'Athi. There was also a temple of Atargatis at Hierapolis. At Ascalon she was represented as half woman, half fish. At both places sacred fish were kept. This indicates some close original connection between the "omnipotent and all-producing goddess," and the "sacred life-giving waters" (see RS.[2] 172ff.).

ATER. See ATAR.

ATEREZIAS (1 Es. 5.[15]), properly ATER OF EZEKIAS (RV.).

ATERGATIS. See ATARGATIS.

ATETA, AV. TETA; head of a family of gatekeepers (1 Es. 5.[28]), called "Hatita" in Ez. 2.[42]; Ne. 7.[45].

ATHARIAS, RV. ATTHARIAS (1 Es. 5.[40]), a corruption of TIRSHATHA, which see.

ATHENOBIUS, a friend of Antiochus VII., Sidetes, sent as special messenger to Simon Maccabæus, to demand restoration of certain cities he had taken, or payment of 1000 talents of silver. Simon's reply was an offer of 100 talents in respect of Joppa and Gazara. This only sent the Syrian envoy off in a rage, and his report enraged the king (1 M. 15.[28ff.]).

ATHLAI (1 Es. 9.[29] RVm.) = AMATHEIS.

ATIPHA, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.[32]), called "Hatipha" in Ez. 2.[54].

ATTALUS. This name was borne by three kings of Pergamus. Either Attalus II., Philadelphus, B.C. 159–138, or Attalus III., Philometor, B.C. 138–133, the nephew of his predecessor, is referred to in 1 M. 15.[22], as having a letter addressed to him by the Roman consul, Lucius, in favour of the Jews. These were independent kings, but close allies of the Romans, to whom Attalus III. bequeathed his kingdom. Josephus quotes a decree in the interests of the Jews issued from Pergamus in the time of Hyrcanus (Ant. XIV. x. 22).

ATTHARATES (1 Es. 9.[49] = Ne. 8.[9]), a corruption of TIRSHATHA.

ATTHARIAS (1 Es. 5.[40] RV.). See ATHARIAS.

ATTUS, AV. LETTUS, one of the chiefs who accompanied Ezra (1 Es. 8.[29]), called "Hattush" in Ez. 8.[2].

AUGIA, daughter of Berzelus (or Barzillai), the wife of Addus the priest, whose descendants could not prove their genealogy after the return from Babylon, and were accordingly ejected from office (1 Es. 5.[38]). The name does not appear in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

AURANUS, RV. HAURAN, a man "far gone in years, and no less in madness," who led the attack on Lysimachus, goaded by the sacrileges he had committed (2 M. 4.[40]).

AUTEAS, one of the Levites who taught the people the law (1 Es. 9.[48]), called "Hodiah" in Ne. 8.[7].

AVARAN, the surname of Eleazar, brother of Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 2.[5]). The name possibly signifies "pale." In 1 M. 6.[43] AV. reads "Savaran," RV. correctly "Avaran."

AZAEL, Jonathan the son of Azael, along with Ezekias, who undertook the management of the matter concerning the foreign wives (1 Es. 9.[14]), called "Asahel" in Ez. 10.[15].

AZAELUS, one of the men who put away his foreign wife after the return from Bab. (1 Es. 9.[34]).

AZAPHION, RV. ASSAPHIOTH, which see.

AZARA, RV. ASARA, head of a family of Nethinim (1 Es. 5.[31]). The name does not appear in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

AZARAIAS, AV. SARAIAS, a progenitor of Ezra (1 Es. 8.[1]), called "Seraiah" in Ez. 7.[1].

AZARIAS. (1) One of the "principal men associated with Ezra (1 Es. 9.[21]), called "Uzziah" in Ez. 10.[21]. (2) One of those who stood up by Ezra at the reading of the law (1 Es. 9.[43]). This name does not appear in Ne. 8.[4]. (3) One of those who read the law to the multitude, "making them withal to understand it" (1 Es. 9.[48]), called "Azariah" in Ne. 8.[7]. (4) Ancestor of Ezra (2 Es. 1.[1], RV. "Azaraias"). (5) The name by which Raphael the angel was known when acting as the companion of Tobias (To. 5.[12], 6.[6], 7.[8], 9.[2]). (6) One of the captains under the command of Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 5.[18], &c.). (7) One of the three children, companions of Daniel, called "Azariah" in Dn. 1.[6], &c. His Babylonian name was Abed-nego (Dn. 1.[7]).

AZARU, AV. AZURAN, head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel, 432 in number (1 Es. 5.[15], RVm. "Azuru," poss. = "Azzur" in Ne. 10.[17]).

AZBAZARETH. See ASBAZARETH.

AZEPHURITH. See ARSIPHURETH.

AZETAS, ancestor of a family which went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[16]), not named in Ezra or Nehemiah.

AZIA, RV. OZIAS, father of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[31]), called "Uzza" in Ez. 2.[49].

AZIEI, an ancestor of Ezra (2 Es. 1.[2]), called "Ezias" in 1 Es. 8.[2] (AV.), "Ozias" (RV.), and "Azariah" in Ez. 7.[3].

AZOTUS. (1) In the battle in which he was slain, Judas Maccabæus discomfited the right wing of the army of Bacchides, and pursued them as far as Mount Azotus. The left wing then followed Judas, so that he was surrounded; and there, after a heroic struggle, he fell (1 M. 9.[15]). Some suggest identification with the hill where stands the mod. village Bīr ez-Zait (Ewald, PEFM. ii. 294), or with the hill on wh. Ashdod stood (Conder, HDB. s.v.). Another suggestion is that the name is due to a mistranslation of the Heb. 'ashdōth hā-har, meaning the slopes where the hill country of Judah descends into the Shephelah (EB. s.v.). (2) See ASHDOD in Canonical Section.

AZURAN. See AZARU.

B

BAALSAMUS, AV. BALASAMUS, one of those who stood at Ezra's right hand at the reading of the law (1 Es. 9.[43]), called "Maaseiah" in Ne. 8.[4].

BAANA, one of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[8]), called "Baanah" in Ne. 10.[27].

BAANI, AV. MAANI, head of a family many of whom had married foreign wives (1 Es. 9.[34]), called "Bani" in Ez. 10.[34].

BAANIAS, RV. BANNEAS, one of the sons of Phorus (1 Es. 9.[26]), called "Benaiah" in Ez. 10.[25].

BABI, head of a family that returned from Bab. with Ezra (1 Es. 8.[37]), called "Bebai" in Ez. 8.[11].

BACCHIDES, a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes and governor of Mesopotamia (1 M. 7.[8]; Jos. Ant. XII. x. 2), was sent into Judæa by Demetrius Soter, along with Alcimus, whom he had made High Priest, to take vengeance upon the Jews and to kill Judas Maccabæus. By means of treachery (1 M. 7.[10-20]) he was partially successful, confirming Alcimus in his office and leaving him to keep the people in obedience while he returned to Demetrius at Antioch. But on the expulsion of Alcimus (1 M. 7.[25]), and the defeat and death of Nicanor at the battle of Adasa (B.C. 161), B. was sent on a second expedition into Judæa. His large army was met by a handful of patriots under Judas. In the battle of Eleasa that followed (B.C. 161) Judas fell, fighting courageously, near Mount Azotus. The Syrian faction was established in power, and by aid of B. (Jos. Ant. XIII. i.) brought upon the Jews greater calamity than they had experienced since the return from Babylon. Jonathan, the brother of Judas, was chosen leader of the patriots, and when attacked by B. swam with his companions across the Jordan and withdrew into the wilderness. B. did not pursue him, but returned to Jerusalem, where he fortified the citadel: he also fortified and garrisoned several cities in Judæa. Meanwhile Alcimus died, "with great torment," being overtaken in an act of sacrilege, and B. returned to Antioch (B.C. 160) with Judæa settled in peace, which it enjoyed for two years. B. returned to Judæa at the instance of the Syrian faction, who held out the hope of secretly overpowering Jonathan and his brother Simon while living quietly in the country; but angry at the failure of the attempt, and entangled in difficulties, B. made honourable terms with Jonathan B.C. 158, restored his prisoners, and retired to Antioch never to return to Judæa again (1 M. 7.–9.; Jos. Ant. XII. x., xi.; XIII. i. 1–6).

BACCHURUS, one of "the holy singers" who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[24]). This name does not appear in the list of Ezra (10.[24]), where only one singer is named, and three porters, the last of whom is "Uri." It is possible that "Bacchurus" may be a corruption of this name.

BACCHUS. See DIONYSUS.

BACENOR. This name occurs only in 2 M. 12.[35], where Dositheus, a horseman, is described as belonging to Bacenor's company. Bacenor was therefore probably captain of a company of cavalry in the army of Judas Maccabæus, with which he opposed Gorgias the governor of Idumæa.

BÆAN, AV. BEAN, which see.

BAGO, head of a family who returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Es. 8.[40]), called "Bagoi" in 1 Es. 5.[14] and "Bigvai" in Ez. 8.[14].

BAGOAS, a eunuch in the household of Holofernes (Jth. 12.[11]). According to Pliny (HN. XIII. iv. 9), the name is the Persian term for "eunuch."

BAGOI, ancestor of a family, 2066 of whom returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[14]), called "Bago" in 1 Es. 8.[40]; "Bigvai" in Ez. 2.[2, 14]; Ne. 7.[19].

BAITERUS, AV. METERUS, one whose descendants to the number of 3005 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[17]). The name does not appear in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah. It is suggested that it may be a place-name of a common form, with Beth as the first element (HDB. s.v.).

BALAMO, RV. BALAMON (Jth. 8.[3]), probably ident. with BELMEN, which see.

BALASAMUS. See BAALSAMAS.

BALNUUS, a man of the sons of Addi who put away his strange wife (1 Es. 9.[31]), called BINNUI in Ez. 10.[30].

BALTHASAR, RV. BALTASAR (Ba. 1.[11f.]) = BELSHAZZAR.

BAN, head of a family whose genealogy had been lost during the Captivity (1 Es. 5.[37]). The text is corrupt. The corresponding name in Ez. 2.[60]; Ne. 7.[62], is "Tobiah."

BANAIAS, a man of the sons of Nooma (1 Es. 9.[35]), called "Benaiah" in Ez. 10.[43].

BANI, head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[12]), called "Binnui" in Ne. 7.[15]. See BINNUI, MANI.

BANID, RV. BANIAS, head of a family which went up from Babylon with Ezra (1 Es. 8.[36]). In Ez. 8.[10] the name should be restored in the form of "Bani," wh. has probably fallen out of MT. from its resemblance to the preceding word bĕnē, "sons."

BANNAIA, RV. SABANNEUS, a man of the sons of Asom who put away his foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[33]), RVm. "Zabad," so also Ez. 10.[33].

BANNAS, AV. BANUAS, head of a family of Levites (1 Es. 5.[26]) who came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Bannas and Suidas in this list are represented by "the children of Hodaviah"—i.e. "Bĕnē Hodaviah"—in Ez. 2.[40]; and by "Shebania, Hodiah" in Ne. 10.[10].

BANNEAS. See BAANIAS.

BANNUS, a man of the sons of Baani, who put away his foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[34]). He represents either "Bani" or "Binnui" in Ez. 10.[38].

BANUAS. See BANNAS.

BARCHUS, AV. CHARCUS, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.[32]), called "Barkos" in Ez. 2.[53]; Ne. 7.[55].

BARODIS, head of a family of the sons of the servants of Solomon (1 Es. 5.[34]). The name is not found in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

BARTACUS, father of Apame, the concubine of Darius (1 Es. 4.[29]). "The illustrious" was probably a title attached to his official rank. Josephus (Ant. XI. iii. 5) calls him "Rabases Themasius." It is suggested that τοῦ θεμασίου of Josephus, which takes the place of τοῦ θαυμαστοῦ of 1 Es., may represent the old Persian mathishta (simply "colonel," EB. s.v.); so instead of "the illustrious" we should possibly read "colonel."

BARUCH, THE BOOK OF, appears in Vlg. and old English Bibles after Lamentations. In LXX. it follows Jeremiah. The sixth chapter, however, stands apart under the title "The Epistle of Jeremiah," and comes after Lamentations. It is said to have been written in Babylon by Baruch, the son of Neriah, "in the fifth year, and in the seventh day of the month, what time the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire" (Ba. 1.[1f.]). The book was read before Jehoiachin, the captive king of Judah, the nobles, and the rest of the exiles. It moved them to mourn and fast. They made a collection and sent the proceeds to Jerusalem, asking the priests to make sacrifices on behalf of Nebuchadnezzar and his son Belshazzar, in the hope that Israel might find favour in their sight. They also sent the book, to be read on "the feasts and solemn days" (chap. 1.[1-14]). The book contains confession of sin and prayers for pardon and deliverance (1.[15]–3.[8]), and concludes with a long address to the Jews who are scattered among the Gentiles (3.[9]–5.[9]). Chapter 6., the Epistle of Jeremiah, "is a series of denunciations of idols and their worshippers, each concluding with the words, 'They are no gods; therefore fear them not.' This epistle is conceived to be sent to Babylon, the rest of the book of Baruch being a letter from Babylon. It is partly based upon Jeremiah 10.[1-15], where the prophet exhorts the house of Israel not to be dismayed at the signs of heaven or to learn the vain customs of the heathen" (Churton, Apocryphal Scrips., Intro. to Baruch).

Scholars are not agreed as to whether the original was written in Hebrew or Greek. It was evidently written at different times, and no historical value attaches to it.

BASALOTH, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.^{31}), called "Bazluth" in Ez. 2.^{52} and "Bazlith" in Ne. 7.^{54}.

BASCAMA, a town in Gilead where Trypho slew Jonathan Maccabæus (1 M. 13.^{23}; Ant. XIII. vi. 6). The bones of Jonathan were afterwards disinterred and buried in Modin, his native town, by his brother Simon. Furrer has suggested identification with Tell Bāzūk, on Wādy Jormāyeh, c. nine miles E. of the point where the Jordan enters the Sea of Galilee.

BASSA, RV. BASSAI, head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{16}), called "Bezai" in Ez. 2.^{17}; Ne. 7.^{23}.

BASTAI, RV. BASTHAI, head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{31}), called "Besai" in Ez. 2.^{49}; Ne. 7.^{52}.

BATH-ZACHARIAS. See Beth-zacharias.

BEAN, RV. BÆAN. Judas Maccabæus "remembered the wickedness of the children of Bean, who were unto the people a snare and a stumbling-block, lying in wait for them in the ways," therefore "he destroyed them utterly, and burned with fire the towers of the place, with all that were within" (1 M. 5.$^{4f.}$; cp. 2 M. 10.$^{17ff.}$). Perhaps we should read "Meon" for "Beon," in which case the place may be represented by Ma'ān. See Maon.

BEBAI. (1) Head of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{13}); several of them married foreign wives (9.^{29}). (2) A place mentioned in Jth. 15.^{4}, otherwise unknown.

BEELSARUS, one who accompanied Zerubbabel in the return (1 Es. 5.^{8}), called "Bilshan" in Ez. 2.^{2}; Ne. 7.^{7}.

BEELTETHMUS, one of the officers of the Persian king Artaxerxes in Palestine, who joined in the representations made to the king against the Jews, and secured an order to hinder them in the building of the Temple (1 Es. 2.^{16}). The name stands for bĕ'ēl tĕ'ēm, which, as Prof. Sayce has shown, is explained by the Assyr. inscriptions, and means "Lord of official intelligence," or "Postmaster."

BEEROTH. See Beroth.

BEL AND THE DRAGON. See Daniel, Additions to.

BELEMUS, an officer of king Artaxerxes (1 E. 2.^{16}), associated with Beeltethmus, which see. The name corresponds to "Bishlam" in Ez. 4.^{7}.

BELMEN, RV. BELMAIM, a place named in the record of preparations made to guard the country against the invasion of Holofernes (Jth. 4.^{4}). It was not far from Dothan (7.^{3}). It is probably identical with Bīr Bil'āmeh (Ibleam), about half a mile S. of Jenīn, a position of importance to the defenders. It is called "Balamo" (8.^{3}).

BEREA, RV. BERCEA. (1) The place where Bacchides encamped before the battle in which Judas Maccabæus fell (1 M. 9.^{4}). Josephus calls it Bēthzēthō. It may possibly be mod. Bīr ez-Zait, 1½ miles NW. of Jifneh. El-Bīreh is also a possible identification. (2) The place where Menelaus was put to death, by precipitation into ashes from a lofty tower, when Antiochus Eupator was marching against Judæa (2 M. 13.^{4}). It is identified with mod. Ḥalab (Aleppo).

BEROTH, RV. BEEROTH. The inhabitants of Beroth are named among those who returned from Babylon (1 Es. 5.^{19}) along with those of Chephirah and Kirjath-jearim. It is identical with el-Bīreh, a considerable village on the road to Nāblus, about ten miles N. of Jerusalem. It is the first halting-place of caravans going north from Jerusalem, and has plentiful supplies of water—hence its name = "wells." According to an old tradition, it was here that Jesus was missed by Joseph and Mary, on the evening of the first day out from Jerusalem (Lk. 2.$^{43ff.}$).

BERZELUS, AV. ZORZELLEUS, father of Augia, who married Jaddus, whose descendants had lost their genealogy during the exile (1 Es. 5.$^{38f.}$).

BETANE, one of the places to which Nebuchadnezzar sent his messengers (Jth. 1.^{9}). It evidently lay to the S. of Jerusalem, and is possibly identical with Beit 'Ainūn, three miles N. of Hebron.

BETHASMOTH, AV. BETHSAMOS, which see.

BETHBASI, a place in the wilderness to which Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus retired when threatened by Bacchides (1 M. 9.^{62}). They built up the fortifications that had fallen into decay, and withstood a siege successfully. Josephus (Ant. XIII. i. 5) has Bēthalaga, possibly intending Beth-hogla, not far from Jericho. More naturally we should seek a position in the wastes to the south-east of Jerusalem. Perhaps there is a reminiscence of this name in Wādy Bassās, to the SE. of Tekoa.

BETH-HORON. In the Canonical Section we have seen that the two Beth-horons are to be identified with Beit 'Ūr et-Taḥtah and Beit 'Ūr el-Fōqah. By way of Beth-horon, Seron, the Syrian general, attempted to advance on Jerusalem. He was met by Judas Maccabæus, and his army was driven headlong down the valley in utter rout (1 M. 3.$^{13ff.}$; Ant. XII. vii. 1). Here also, not long after, Nicanor, retiring from Jerusalem, was attacked by Judas: his army was scattered and himself was slain (1 M. 7.$^{39ff.}$; Ant. XII. x. 5). Beth-horon was fortified by Bacchides (1 M. 9.^{50}; Ant. XIII. i. 3). It is mentioned in connection with the preparations made to oppose Holofernes (Jth. 4.[4]). Here a Roman army under Cestius Gallus suffered crushing defeat, A.D. 66 (BJ. II. xix. 8f.).

BETHLOMON, the inhabitants of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[17]), is the town of Bethlehem (mod. Beit Laḥm), so called in Ez. 2.[21].

BETHSAMOS, RV. BETHASMOTH (1 Es. 5.[18]) is called "Beth-azmaveth" in Ne. 7.[28]; a town in Benjamin, probably represented by the mod. Hizmeh, in the uplands SE. of Gibeah.

Judas encountered and defeated Lysias (1 M. 4.[29ff.]; 2 M. 11.[5]). He then fortified it anew and set a garrison there (v. 61). It was taken by the army of Antiochus (6.[7, 26, 31, 49, 50]). It was fortified by Bacchides (1 M. 9.[52]). It was taken again by Simon (11.[65f.], 14.[7]). The mod. village boasts some remains of antiquity: notably a ruined tower, dating prob. fm. the twelfth cent.

BETHULIA. Information regarding this town is confined to the book of Judith. Buhl (GAP. 201 note) thus summarises: "According to the

BERŒA: MODERN ALEPPO

BETHSAN, RV. BETHSHAN = BETHSHEAN. This city is mentioned in the account of the return of Judas from his campaign in Gilead (1 M. 5.[52]). Here Jonathan eluded the snares of Trypho, only to fall into the trap set for him in Ptolemais (1 M. 12.[40ff.]). It is first called Scythopolis in 2 M. 12.[29]. By this name, which enshrined some memory of the Scythian invasion (see SCYTHIANS), it was known as a member of the DECAPOLIS; but it soon gave place to the ancient name, which persists in the form of Beisān.

BETH-SURA, RV. BETHSURON = BETHZUR. This ancient stronghold, represented by the mod. Beit Ṣūr, 4½ miles N. of Hebron, was a place of great strategic importance, commanding the approach to Jerusalem from that direction. Here book of Judith (4.[6], 6.[10ff.], 7.[1ff.], 8.[3], 10.[10], 12.[7], 15.[3, 6], 16.[21ff.]), Bethulia was situated in the neighbourhood of Jenīn, on a rock, beside a valley, commanding the passes to the south. At the foot of the rock was a spring." He inclines to identify it with Sānūr, a strong position on a rock overlooking Merj el-Ghariq, about seven miles S. of Jenīn. Conder favours the claim of Mithilīyeh, to the N. of Merj el-Ghariq. For an interesting argument to prove Bethulia = Jerusalem see EB. s.v.

It must be observed, however, that the writer of Judith regards the two as distinct. Joacin, the High Priest in Jerusalem, is said to have written to the inhabitants of Bethulia "charging them to keep the passages of the hill country" against Holofernes (Jth. 4.[6ff.]).

BETH-ZACHARIAS, the scene of the battle described in 1 M. 6.[32f.], in which Judas Maccabæus was defeated by Antiochus Eupator, and his brother Eleazar perished. Josephus (XII. ix. 4) describes it as 70 stadia from Bethsur. It is identical with Beit Zakāriā, fully 4 miles SW. of Bethlehem, "on an isolated promontory or hill, jutting out between two deep valleys and connected with the high ground south by a low neck between the heads of the valleys, the neck forming the only access to what must have been an almost impregnable position" BRP. iii. 283f.).

BETOLIUS, RV. BETOLION, a place, fifty-two inhabitants of wh. returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[21]) = "Bethel" in Ez. 2.[28].

BETOMESTHAM, RV. BETOMESTHAIM (Jth. 4.[6]), BETOMASTHEM, RV. BETOMASTHAIM (Jth. 15.[4]), a place "over against Jezreel, in face of the plain that is near Dothan." The district within which it must have lain is thus somewhat closely defined: but no satisfactory identification has been suggested.

BEZETH, the place where Bacchides encamped on withdrawing from Jerusalem, where he put deserters to death and cast them into a pit (1 M. 7.[19]). It may be identical with the quarter known as "Bezetha" (see JERUSALEM, p. 312).

BIATAS, RV. PHALIAS, one of the Levites who taught the people the law (1 Es. 9.[48]), called "Pelaiah" in Ne. 8.[7].

BOCCAS, an ancestor of Ezra (1 Es. 8.[2]), called "Bukki" in Ez. 7.[4]; "Borith" in 2 Es. 1.[2].

BORITH. See preceding article.

BOSOR, a city in Gilead taken by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 5.[26, 36]), which may be identical with Buṣr el-Ḥarīrī, on the SW. border of el-Lejā'.

BOSORA, a strong city in Gilead captured by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 5.[26, 28]). It is the famous city known as Bostra to the Romans, in the SE. of the Ḥaurān, the mod. Boṣra eski-Shâm. For illustration see BOZRAH in Canonical Section, p. 71.

BRAN. In the picture drawn of what the captives will see in Babylon in the letter of Jeremy (Ba. 6.), the women are described as burning "bran for incense," in their unchaste idolatrous worship (Ba. 6.[43]).

BRIDGE. Only in 2 M. 12.[13] (AV.) is mention made of a bridge, which Judas Maccabæus built in order to attack the strong city of Caspis. There were no bridges in early Palestine. Most of the streams dry up after the rainy season; and bridges built over them, unless of very strong construction, are apt to be swept away in the spates of winter. At most times they are easily fordable at well-known points. Josephus says of the Jordan when the Israelites passed over it under Joshua, "there never had been bridges laid over it hitherto" (Ant. V. i. 3); implying that bridges were not unknown to him. The Romans were the great road- and bridge-builders, making use of the arch for this purpose. Specimens of their work may still be seen: e.g. the bridge across the Jordan south of el-Ḥūleh, Jisr benāt Ya'qūb, "the bridge of Jacob's daughters." It is serviceable still after two millenniums, having outlived all later structures save the most recent.

Josephus speaks of a "bridge" (gephura) which connected the Temple with the upper city (BJ. VI. vi. 2); probably it was an arched viaduct.

BUCKLE. Alexander Balas gave a golden buckle to Jonathan Maccabæus as a mark of distinguished favour—"as the use is to give to such as are the kindred of the king" (1 M. 10.[89]). The buckle was used as a brooch to fasten the outer garment on the shoulder or over the breast.

BUGEAN is used as descriptive of HAMAN (Est. Ad. 12.[6] RV.). It may have the meaning of "braggart." In all other cases he is called "Haman the Agagite."

C

CADDIS, RV. GADDIS, surname of Joannan (John), eldest son of Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees (1 M. 2.[2]). See GADDIS.

CADES, RV. KEDESH (1 M. 11.[63, 73]). See KEDESH in Canonical Section.

CADES-BARNE (Jth. 5.[14]), RV. KADESH-BARNEA, which see in Canonical Section.

CADMIEL, RV. KADMIEL, father of a family of Levites (1 Es. 5.[26]).

CALAMOLALUS, head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[22]). In the corresponding lists in Ez. 2.[33]; Ne. 7.[37] for "Calamolalus" stand "Lod, Hadid." The name is corrupt.

CALITAS, one of the Levites who read the law to the multitude, making them understand it. His second name was Colius (1 Es. 9.[23, 48]), called "Kelaiah (the same is Kelita)" in Ez. 10.[23]; "Kelita" in Ne. 8.[7].

CALLISTHENES, the name of the officer who had charge of setting fire to the great gates of the Temple at the time of the desecration under Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 168). He was present as an officer of Nicanor at the battle of Emmaus (B.C. 165), and at the feast which the Jews held for their victory, they forced him into a village hut and there burned him alive—"a reward meet for his wickedness" (2 M. 8.[33]).

CALPHI, RV. CHALPHI, father of Judas, who, along with Mattathias, stood by Jonathan at the battle of Gennesar, and routed the host of Demetrius' princes (1 M. 11.[70]).

CANOPY. This was probably the mosquito curtain over the bed in which Holofernes lay (Jth. 10.[21]), kōnōpeion, which protected the sleeper from the kōnōps, "gnat." The description of it shows the luxury in which the enemy of Israel indulged. It was "woven with purple and gold, and emeralds and precious stones." When Judith had slain Holofernes she took down the canopy and carried it away as a trophy (13.[9]). She displayed it, along with the head of Holofernes, to the elders and people of Bethulia (v. 15); and finally dedicated it as "a gift unto the Lord" (16.[19]).

CAPHARSALAMA. When Nicanor, who was in Jerusalem, had tried in vain to lead Judas Maccabæus into an ambush, by proposals for a peaceful conference, he marched out against him and was defeated at CAPHARSALAMA, the fugitives returning to the city (1 M. 7.[31]). It is spoken of in crusading times as a castle of the Knights Hospitallers. The Arab geographer Muqaddasi places it "in the district of Cæsarea, on the high road from Ramleh northward." Several sites in the region indicated might suit, the likeliest, perhaps, being Khirbet Deir Sellām, about 12½ miles to the W. of Jerusalem.

CAPHENATHA, RV. CHAPHENATHA. Simon strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem, and it is said, "he repaired that which was called Caphenatha"—apparently some part of the defences which cannot now be identified. It has been supposed to be on the Mount of Olives; but this finds no support in the narrative (1 M. 12.[37]).

CAPHIRA. The inhabitants of Caphira returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[19]). It is called "Chephirah" in Ez. 2.[25]: a town on the border of Benjamin, represented by the mod. Kefīreh, to the SW. of Gibeon.

CARABASION (1 Es. 9.[34]), one who put away his foreign wife. There is nothing in the other lists corresponding to this name, which is evidently corrupt. In Ez. 10.[36] its place seems to be taken by "Meremoth."

CARCHAMIS, RV. CARCHEMISH, alluded to in 1 Es. 1.[25], is the famous city on the Euphrates, the mod. Jerablus. See CARCHEMISH in Canonical Section.

CARIA. Lucius, the consul of the Romans, is said to have sent to Caria a copy of his circular letter in favour of the Jews (1 M. 15.[23]). Caria lay on the SW. coast of Asia Minor. At this time (B.C. 139–138) it was governed by a confederacy of four cities, their centre of meeting being the temple of Zeus Chrysaoreus at Stratonicea. In B.C. 129 it was incorporated in the Roman province of Asia. Halicarnassus, Cnidus, Myndus, and Miletus were Carian cities, while Patmos, Cos, and Rhodes lay off the coast.

CARMANIANS, RV. CARMONIANS. In the "vision horrible" of 2 Es. 15.[28ff.], "the Carmanians, raging in wrath, shall go forth as the wild boars of the wood . . . and shall waste a portion of the land of the Assyrians with their teeth." A people fierce and cruel is intended. The description answers the inhabitants of Kirmān, N. of the Persian Gulf, and W. of Gedrosia. Strabo (xv. p. 727) represents them as a warlike race, who worshipped Ares alone of all the gods; and he gives an account of certain horrible practices that prevailed among them. A youth was free to marry only when he had slain an enemy and presented his head to the king. Their customs and language were Persian and Median, while they followed the Persian order in battle. They are referred to by Nearchus, Arrian, and other ancient writers. In v. 30[ff.] Sapor I. may be intended (A.D. 242–273). He founded the Sassanid dynasty. He defeated the Roman general Valerian, and proceeding to the NW. he traversed Syria and laid Antioch in ruins. By Odenatus and Zenobia of Palmyra, "the dragons of Arabia" (v. 29), he was driven back beyond the Euphrates.

CARME, RV. CHARME, head of a family of priests (1 Es. 5.[25]) called "Harim" in Ez. 2.[39].

CARNAIM, a strong city in Gilead captured by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 5.[26, 43f.]). Here was a temple of ATARGATIS, in which the refugees from the captured city were put to death (2 M. 12.[21, 26]). It corresponds to ASHTEROTH KARNAIM in Canonical Section, wh. see. In 2 M. it is called "Carnion."

CARNION. See preceding article.

CASLEU, AV. CHISLEV. See YEAR in Canonical Section.

CASPHON, RV. CASPHOR, a city taken by Judas Maccabæus on his expedition east of the Jordan (1 M. 5.[36]). It doubtless corresponds with "Caspis" (2 M. 12.[13]). This city was strongly fortified and near a large lake, conditions that are fulfilled by mod. el-Muzērīb, the station from which the Ḥajj, the great Moslem pilgrimage, finally sets out on its desert march. The identification, however, is uncertain. The ancient name of the city is unknown (see Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 157ff.).

CASPHOR. See preceding article.

CASPIS, RV. CASPIN. See CASPHON.

CAT. This animal is not named in the Canonical Scriptures, and appears only in Ba. 6.[22], in the epistle of Jeremy. Showing how contemptible the gods of Babylon are, the prophet points out that they cannot defend themselves from injury or insult. The bats, swallows, and birds alight with impunity upon their bodies and heads; "and in like manner the cats also." The context suggests that these were domesticated cats, not, as Cheyne thinks, wild cats (EB. s.v.). The cat was early domesticated in Egypt, and is often figured on the monuments, e.g. as accompanying the fowler (Wilkinson, A.E. i. 236f.). Herodotus entertains his readers with "travellers' tales" regarding the cat in Egypt (ii. 66f.). Although the cat is not mentioned in Scripture there can be no doubt that the Hebrews were familiar with the animal itself. The wild cat, Felis maniculata, the supposed original of the domestic cat, is found in Africa, Arabia, Syria, and Palestine. It is especially plentiful east of the Jordan. The Arabs call it Quṭṭ el-Khalā. Its body is 2 ft. long, with a tail of 11 inches.

Bochart (Hieroz. 862) proposes to render by "wild cat" the Heb. צִיִּים in Ps. 74.^{14}; Is. 13.^{21}, 34.^{14}; Jr. 50.^{39}, instead of EV., "wild beasts of the desert."

CATHUA, head of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{30}), possibly = "Giddel" in Ez. 2.^{47}.

CEDRON, RV. KIDRON, a city fortified and occupied by Cendebæus by orders of Antiochus Sidetes, whence he made incursions on the Jews to their great hurt (1 M. 15.$^{39-41}$). Here he was attacked and routed by a force under the sons of Simon the Maccabee, who burned the place (16.$^{4ff.}$). From the narrative we gather that it was not far from Jamnia (Yebna), and Azotus (Ashdod). It is probably represented by the mod. village Katrah, c. three miles SW. of 'Aker (Ekron).

CEILAN. The sons of Ceilan and Azetas were among the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{15}). These names do not appear in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CELOSYRIA (1 Es. 2.^{17}), RV. CŒLE-SYRIA, which see.

CENDEBEUS, RV. CENDEBÆUS, a general of Antiochus VII., who was left as "captain of the sea-coast" of Palestine (1 M. 15.$^{38ff.}$) on the defeat of Tryphon by Antiochus (B.C. 138). He fortified Kedron as commanded by the king, and made it a centre for the harassing of the Jews. Simon Maccabæus, by reason of age, was unable to resist C., but his two sons, Judas and John, defeated him—a general of Antiochus—with great loss at Modin (1 M. 16.$^{1-10}$), though they had been very serviceable to Antiochus in his war against Tryphon.

CERAS, RV. KERAS, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.^{29}), called "Keros" in Ez. 2.^{44}; Ne. 7.^{47}.

CETAB, RV. KETAB, ancestor of a family of Nethinim (1 Es. 5.^{30}), not named in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CHABRIS, son of Gothoniel, one of the "elders of the city," rulers of Bethulia (Jth. 6.^{15}, &c.).

CHADIAS, THEY OF, RV. CHADIASAI. These, along with the Ammidioi, returned from Bab. with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.^{20}). Chadias may possibly be identical with "Kedesh" of Jo. 15.^{23}. The name is not in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CHÆREAS, AV. CHEREAS, brother of the Ammonite leader, Timotheus. He had command of the fortress of Gazara, the "Jazar" of 1 M. 5.$^{6-8}$. Hither Timotheus fled from Judas Maccabæus. The latter pursued him, and after a vigorous siege took the city. In the slaughter which ensued both Timotheus and his brother Chæreas were slain.

CHALPHI (1 M. 11.^{70}), AV. CALPHI, wh. see.

CHANAAN, CHANAANITE (Jth. 5.$^{3, 16}$, &c.), RV. CANAAN, CANAANITE. The AV. represents the Greek χαναάν, the form in which the name appears in the Apocrypha and in the NT. (Ac. 7.^{11}, 13.^{19}).

CHANNUNEUS, RV. CHANUNEUS, a Levite in the list of 1 Es. 8.^{48}, corresponding, perhaps, to "Merari" in Ez. 8.^{19}.

CHAPELS, RV. SHRINES (1 M. 1.^{47}; 2 M. 10.^{2} 11.^{3}), are places for idol worship.

CHAPHENATHA, AV. CAPENATHA, which see.

CHARAATHALAN, AV. CHARAATHALAR (1 Es. 5.^{36}), is described as leading certain families who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. The phrase "Charaathalan leading them and Allar" has arisen from running together the place-names "Cherub, Addan, Immer," with some confusion of the letters (cp. Ez. 2.^{59}; Ne. 7.^{61}).

CHARACA, RV. CHARAX, a place east of Jordan, said to be 750 stadia from Caspis, in wh. there were Jews called Tubieni, that is, from Tob. Caspis may possibly be identified with el-Mezērīb; but there is nothing to show in what direction Characa lay. The distance also seems very great (92 miles) for the army to traverse in the operations described (2 M. 12.^{17}). Kerak (Kir-moab) was known as χαράκμωβα and Μωβουχάραξ. It lies about 100 miles south of el-Mezērīb. It is within the limits of possibility that Kerak may represent the city intended; but there are no data for a certain decision.

CHARCUS (1 Es. 5.^{32}), RV. BARCHUS, which see.

CHAREA, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.^{32}) called "Harsha" in Ez. 2.^{52}; Ne. 7.^{54}.

CHARME (1 Es. 5.^{25}), AV. CARME, which see.

CHARMIS, one of the three "elders of the city," rulers of Bethulia (Jth. 6.^{15}, &c.).

CHASEBA, head of a family of Temple servants, mentioned only in 1 Es. 5.^{31}.

CHELCIAS, RV. HELKIAS. (1) Father of Susannah (Su. vv. 2, 29, 63). Tradition makes him brother of Jeremiah, and identifies him with the priest who found the book of the law in the Temple (2 K. 22.^{8}). (2) Ancestor of Baruch (Ba. 1.^{1}). (3) Father of Joakim the High Priest (Ba. 1.^{7}).

CHELLIANS. In Jth. 2.^{23} Holofernes is said to have spoiled the Ishmaelites "which were over against the wilderness to the south of the land of the Chellians," which probably means the land belonging to the inhabitants of CHELLUS.

CHELLUS, one of the places beyond—i.e. west of—the Jordan, to which Nebuchadnezzar sent his summons (Jth. 1.[9]). It is mentioned with BETANE and Kadesh, and may be taken as lying to the SW. of Jerusalem. It may have represented the ancient Ḥalūtzah (Tg. Jrs., Gn. 16.[14]), which, under the name of Elusa, was known to the Greek and Roman geographers (Reland, Pal. 717). It lay near the source of Wâdy es-Sâni. The adjoining country would then be "the land of the Chellians," to the south of which dwelt the children of Ishmael (Jth. 2.[23]). The reading "Chaldæans" in the latter passage is probably an attempt to solve a difficulty by amending the text.

CHELOD. In Jth. 1.[6] it is said that "many nations of the sons of Chelod assembled themselves to the battle," apparently allies of Nebuchadnezzar, responding to his summons. Porter (HDB. s.v.) translates, "there came together many nations unto the array (or ranks) of the sons of Cheleul." It might mean "to battle with (against) the sons of Cheleul." The Syr. reads "to fight against the Chaldæans." No probable suggestion has been made as to the meaning of Chelod. It is possible that "sons of Chelod" denotes the whole assemblage of Nebuchadnezzar's allies.

CHEREAS. See CHÆREAS.

CHETTIIM, RV. CHITTIM = OT. KITTIM (Gn. 10.[4]). See CYPRUS in Canonical Section. The island of Cyprus was so called from the settlement of Kition, mod. Larnaca, in the SE. (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 1). But the name came to have a much wider and somewhat vague significance. Thus Alexander the Great is said to have come "out of the land of Chittim" (1 M. 1.[1]), where obviously Macedonia is intended: and Perseus is described as "king of Chittim" (1 M. 8.[5], AV. "Citims").

CHOBA (Jth. 4.[4]), CHOBAI (Jth. 15.[4, 5]). A place named with Jericho, Æsora, and the valley of Salem. Reland (Palestina, 721) suggested Coabis, which is mentioned in the Peutinger Tables as being 12 Roman miles from Scythopolis. This may be the modern el-Mekhubby, near which is the cave 'Arāq el-Khubby, about 11 miles from Beisān (Scythopolis) and 3 miles from Ṭūbās. This appears, at least, to be the district in which Choba must be sought.

CHOLA, AV. COLA, which see.

CHORBE, AV. CORBE, which see.

CHOSAMEUS seems to have arisen from a copyist's error (1 Es. 9.[32]). It appears to take the place of three names given in Ez. 10.[31].

CHUSI, a place named in Jth. 7.[18] as near Ekrebel, on the brook Mochmur. It is probably identical with the mod. Qūzah, a village 5½ miles south of Nāblus, and 5 miles west of 'Aqrabeh (Ekrebel).

CIRAMA, RV. KIRAMA. The people of Cirama returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[20]); it is called "Ramah" in Ez. 2.[26].

CISAI, RV. KISEUS, grandfather of Mordecai (Est. Ad. 11.[2]).

CITHERN, RV. HARP (1 M. 4.[54]), one of the instruments used at the re-dedication of the Temple and altar. See MUSIC in Canonical Section.

CITIMS. See CHETTIIM.

CLEOPATRA, daughter of Ptolemy VI., Philometor, and of queen Cleopatra, was given in marriage by her father to Alexander Balas, king of Syria (1 M. 10.[58]; Jos. Ant. XIII. iv. 1). When Demetrius with a band of Cretan mercenaries attacked Alexander, Ptolemy led an army into Syria in support of Alexander, his son-in-law; but at Ptolemais he learned that a conspiracy was laid against his life by Alexander through the agency of his friend Ammonius, and as Alexander refused to punish Ammonius, Ptolemy dissolved his relationship to him and made a league with Demetrius Nicator, taking his daughter from Alexander and giving her to Demetrius, who by Ptolemy's aid was received at Antioch as king of Syria. Alexander was killed in battle against the joint forces of Ptolemy and Demetrius. Demetrius was afterwards taken prisoner by Arsaces VI. (Mithridates I.), whose dominions he had invaded, and who treated him honourably, giving him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. Cleopatra married the brother of Demetrius, Antiochus VII., Sidetes, who in the absence of Demetrius had gained possession of the Syrian throne (B.C. 137). She was probably privy to the murder of Demetrius on his return to Syria, B.C. 125 (Appian, Syr. 68), though Josephus (Ant. XIII. ix. 3) gives a different account of the fate of Demetrius. She afterwards murdered Seleucus, her son by Nicator, who on his father's death assumed the government without her consent. She succeeded in securing the throne for her second son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII. Grypus, whom she recalled from Athens where he was studying; but as he was unwilling to concede to her the measure of power she claimed in the government, she attempted to poison him on his return from exercise (B.C. 120). On learning her intention he begged her to drink first, and on her refusal produced his witness and then repeated his request as the best means of clearing herself. On this she drank and died (Justin xxxix. 2). She had another son by Antiochus VII., Sidetes—Antiochus Cyzicenus, named from the place of his education. He was killed in battle in B.C. 95.

CŒLE-SYRIA, "hollow Syria." The two great mountain ranges running north and south, known respectively as the Lebanon and the Antilebanon, form a gigantic double rampart between the desert and the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea. The hollow between the ranges was known to the Greeks as Cœle-Syria; and to this great valley the name properly belongs. In Jo. 11.[17] it is called Biq'ath ha-Lebānōn, "The valley of the Lebanon." The natives call the part S. of Baalbek el-Buqā', "the valley" par excellence. The hollow is nearly a hundred miles in length, and forms the continuation, northward, of the Jordan valley. The level rises towards the middle, the watershed being in the neighbourhood of Baalbek. The river Orontes drains the northern portion. The Litāny flows to the southern limit of the valley, then turns westward through a great cleft in the mountain to the sea.

Strabo applies the name to the valley, but also extends it to cover the territory of Damascus (xvi. 2). It came to signify the region lying to the east and south of Mount Lebanon, and Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia meant all the Seleucid dominions south of the river Eleutherus (1 Es. 2.[17], &c.). In Josephus the term usually denotes the country east of the Jordan, to which he adds Scythopolis (Beisān), which although on the west of the river was politically united to the Decapolis (Ant. XIII. xiii. 2, &c.). But in XIV. iv. 5 he says that "Cœle-Syria as far as the river Euphrates and Egypt," was committed by Pompey to the care of Scaurus. This sufficiently illustrates the elasticity of the term in later times.

COLA, RV. CHOLA, a place mentioned with Chobai (see CHOBA) in Jth. 15.[4], and should probably be sought in the same district. Kā'un, in the Jordan valley, has been suggested. It lies on the way from el-Mekhubby to Beisān.

COLIUS (1 Es. 9.[23]), the same as CALITAS, wh. see.

CORBE, RV. CHORBE, head of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[12]). He corresponds to "Zaccai" in Ez. 2.[9]; Ne. 7.[14].

CORE (Sr. 45.[18]), RV. KORAH, wh. see in Canonical Section.

COS, one of the places to which a copy of the letter in favour of the Jews was sent by Consul Lucius (1 Ne. 15.[23]). See Cos in Canonical Section.

TETRADRACHM (? PHŒNICIAN TALENT) OF COS

COUTHA, RV. CUTHA (1 Es. 5.[32]), head of a family of Temple servants; not mentioned in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CRATES. When Sostratus, the governor of Jerusalem, was called to Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes, in consequence of a dispute with Menelaus, he left Crates, a former governor of Cyprus, to act as deputy in his absence (2 M. 4.[29]).

CUTHA. See COUTHA.

CYAMON (Jth. 7.[3]), the western point to wh. the army of Holofernes stretched from Bethulia, described as "over against Esdraelon." It is probably identical with Tell Qaimūn, a mound about seven miles NW. of el-Lejjūn, with remains of ancient buildings, prob. = JOKNEAM, wh. see in Canonical Section.

D

DABRIA, one of the scribes swift with the pen, who wrote down the visions of Esdras (2 Es. 14.[24]).

DACOBI, RV. DAKUBI, head of a family of gatekeepers (1 Es. 5.[28]) called "Akkub" in Ez. 2.[42]; Ne. 7.[45]).

DADDEUS, RV. LODDEUS, "the captain who was in the place of the treasury," to whom Ezra sent for "such men as might execute the priests' office" (1 Es. 8.[46]), called "Iddo" in Ez. 8.[17].

DAISAN (1 Es. 5.[31]), head of a family of Temple servants; called "Rezin" in Ez. 2.[48]; Ne. 7.[50]. The form "Daisan" has arisen through a scribe mistaking ר for ד.

DALAN, AV. LADAN, head of a family who had lost their genealogy (1 Es. 5.[37]) = "Delaiah," Ez. 2.[60].

DANIEL, THE ADDITIONS TO. The non-canonical additions to the book of Daniel are three in number, viz., the Song of the Three Holy Children, the Story of Susanna and the Elders, and the Story of Bel and the Dragon. In order, however, to understand fully the purpose of these books, as well as to appreciate their special "atmosphere," we must remember that seventy years of strict captivity in far-distant Babylon had materially changed both the character and the outlook of a large percentage of the Hebrew exiles. To many of them Babylon was home. They had known no other. Born in Babylonia, many of them had actually grown old there, and looked upon it as their only fatherland. Long separation from Palestine had, in many instances, weakened the "home-hunger" of patriotic associations. They had formed new ties, new friends, new ideals: they were animated by new aims and purposes. Only those, on the other hand, who were zealous for the law (as Dr. Sayce says), and saw in the destruction of Jerusalem the punishment of its neglect, could preserve themselves from mixing with the surrounding population and submitting to the influence of its customs and beliefs. That the larger section of the Jewish exiles had become naturalised in Babylon is proved by the frequency with which their names occur in the Babylonian contracts, &c., that have been preserved. Accordingly it was only those who had kept themselves distinct and apart, alike in race and religion, that had any desire to return to Palestine. As Sayce well puts it : " The companions of Zerubbabel were the 'remnant' who believed in the divine mission of Israel, and looked on the law of Moses as their rule of life." Their struggle with Babylonian heathenism and its seductions intensified their love for the exoteric characteristics of the law. Only by scrupulous observance of its ceremonial requirements could they hope to remain a " peculiar people," separate from the larger world and the less rigid rule of life, beside which it was their lot to live.

These characteristics are reflected in the Apocryphal literature which has come down to us, and nowhere more vividly than in the Additions to Daniel.

(1) The Song of the Three Holy Children, better known to many, perhaps, as the Benedicite, under which designation it has been a familiar item in the services of the Christian Church from the fourth century. It is also styled the Prayer of Azarias. The song professes to be the psalm which was sung by the three captives, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, when they were cast into the fiery furnace for refusing to bow down in worship to " the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar the king set up on the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon." Just such a " Song " is it as would be appropriate to such an occasion, when the power of the Mighty God of Israel triumphed over the spite and machinations of men. Its character as a psalm was recognised by the Codex Alexandrinus, inasmuch as it inserts a large section of it at the conclusion of the Psalter. Consisting as it does of sixty-eight verses in the Septuagint, it is inserted after the 23rd verse of the 3rd chapter of Daniel, and divides itself naturally into three parts : (a) the Prayer of Azarias (vv. 1–22) from the midst of the fire ; (b) a continuation of the story in Dn. 3.[23], wh. describes how the servants of Nebuchadnezzar increased the intensity of the heat in the fiery furnace by means of " rosin, tow, pitch, and small wood, so that the flame streamed forth above the furnace forty and nine cubits," and how the angel of the Lord came down and made the midst of the furnace as if it had been a moist, whistling wind; (c) the thanksgiving Song of the Three Holy Children. Critics are still divided as to whether it was originally written in Hebrew or Greek, but there seems a consensus of opinion that traces of more than one hand are visible in it.

(2) The History of Susanna.—This is placed in the Septuagint before chap. 1. of the book of Daniel, while in the Vulgate it stands as chap. 13. Some writers think the story may have been suggested by Jr. 20.[13]. The whole trend of the narrative is designed to bring out the keen insight and Solomon-like wisdom of Daniel. Susanna, a woman of surpassing beauty, was the wife of Joachim, a wealthy Jew of Babylon. She was no less distinguished by her piety than by her beauty. Two " elders of the people," their evil purpose being frustrated by her fidelity, conspired to destroy her, bringing a false charge against her. The sworn word of the elders being accepted, Susanna was about to be put to death, when Daniel ordered the two elders to be parted from one another and examined them separately, when they made such glaringly contradictory statements that they were adjudged worthy to suffer the fate they sought to inflict on Susanna.

It has been supposed that the motive of the story is the encouragement of an agitation which was then being promoted by the Pharisaic party in favour of legal reform. Mr. C. J. Ball has suggested that the story was a novelette of the Haggadah type, based on a miscarriage of justice which occurred about B.C. 100, when one of the leaders of the Pharisee party—Simon, son of the president of the Council—was accused, tried, and convicted on evidence which was afterwards proved to be a gross perjury. This incident led the Pharisee party, as opposed to the Sadducees, to advocate first, such legal reforms as the more searching examination of witnesses, and second, the infliction of very severe penalties on those convicted of perjury. Mr. Ball sees in the Story of Susanna a tractate issued by the Pharisees to support their views.

Mr. Ball's views are ingenious, but there are grave difficulties in the way of their acceptance. In the first place they assume that " Susanna " was written in Palestine, and therefore that it was composed in Hebrew, whereas the play upon the Greek names of the trees in which Daniel indulges proves that Greek, not Hebrew, was the original language. There is no evidence that " Susanna " was known in Palestine until after the Christian era. Josephus has no reference to the story.

In the next place, the idea that " Susanna " could have been written against the Sadducees proceeds from total forgetfulness of the relations between that party and the Pharisees. The Sadducees were the priestly party, while the strength of the Pharisaic party was among the Elders of the Sanhedrin. A Pharisaic tractate against the Sadducees would never have represented " two elders " as the guilty parties in such a shameful story as that of "Susanna." Rather two priests would have been pilloried as the criminals.

Further, the whole story of the condemnation of Simon rests on Talmudic evidence, wh. is notoriously of little value. There is, in fact, no need to seek any historical setting for the tale. The whole Haggadah is in line with numerous Eastern tales, Talmudic and Arabic, wh. illustrate and glorify the skill of the judge in eliciting truth.

(3) Bel and the Dragon.—Originally placed in the Septuagint at the conclusion of the book of Daniel, it was prefaced by the words, "From the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi." This preface has misled not a few writers. The portion in question is only vv. 33–39, belonging to the no longer extant pseudepigraphic book of Habakkuk, and these verses have been arbitrarily thrust into another narrative with which they have nothing in common. The story itself is a variant version (according to Prof. Sayce) of the canonical account of Daniel's deliverance from the den of lions, but in addition to this there are really two other stories, the Story of Bel, and the Story of the Dragon, absolutely independent of each other save that they both attach themselves to the magic name of Daniel. The Story of Bel is concerned with the worship of the image of that tutelary deity of the city of Babylon. Daniel refused to bow down in worship of the image, in conformity with the edict of the king, because he worshipped the living God who created the heaven and the earth and all mankind. The king then asked Daniel if he did not believe that Bel also was a living god, citing in proof thereof the amount of food and wine he daily consumed. Daniel demands that a test be arranged for. Food is placed in the temple before the great image, and the doors of the sacred place are all sealed with the royal signet. Daniel, however, obtains permission to strew the floor of the temple with ashes. In the night the priests enter through a secret door in the image and consume the viands, then in the morning they triumphantly point to the fact that the food is gone. Daniel, however, directs the king's attention to the footprints in the ashes, and the priests, seeing that their deceit is discovered, confess the fraud. So much for the Story of Bel.

The Story of the Dragon recounts the fact that in Babylon there was a huge reptile of the serpent type which was worshipped as divine. Daniel refused to worship the brute, and on being called in question offers to slay it. This he does, but the populace, furious first at the disgrace and downfall of the image, and now over the death of the dragon, demand that Daniel be thrown to the lions. This is done, but the mouths of the lions are closed and they can do him no harm. By this manifestation of the power of the Lord he is able to defeat the machinations of his enemies, and to vindicate his contention.

These stories are mere examples of legendary folklore pressed into the service of religion by the rabbis, in order to pour contempt upon idolatry. These Additions to Daniel date from the first century B.C. OLIPHANT SMEATON.

DAPHNE, a suburb of Antioch in Syria, with a celebrated grove and sanctuary of Apollo, established, as was likewise the city itself, by Seleucus Nicator. It was situated on the left bank of the Orontes, about five miles distant SW. from the city, and to its great natural beauty was added every kind of attractive embellishment by the Seleucid kings, and especially by Antiochus Epiphanes. The place possessed the privileges of an asylum. In this connection it is mentioned in 2 M. 4.[33-38] (the historicity of wh. is doubtful). In the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 171) Onias, the patriotic High Priest, rebuked Menelaus, who by corruption had gained the High Priest's office, and in connection therewith had committed gross sacrilege at Jerusalem. To escape the wrath of Menelaus, Onias withdrew to the sanctuary at Daphne, from which he was treacherously tempted, and, to the great indignation not only of the Jews but of many also of other nations, and even of king Antiochus himself, murdered. It was the regular place of recreation for the Antiochenes, and in later times it gained an unenviable reputation for immorality. "Daphnici mores" became proverbial, and Juvenal describes the place as one of the main sources of corruption of imperial Rome: "in Tiberim defluxit Orontes." On this account it became the special object of attack in the days of Julian when Christianity was triumphant, and from that time dates its decline.

DATHEMA, the stronghold in which the Jews took refuge from "the Gentiles that were in Gilead" (1 M. 5.[9]): it is simply "the stronghold" in v. 29. Judas Maccabæus, summoned to succour his brethren, defeated the enemy with great slaughter. It was within a night's march of BOSORA (v. 29), but no satisfactory identification has yet been suggested.

DEBORA, RV. DEBORAH, Tobit's grandmother (To. 1.[8]).

DELUS, RV. DELOS, mentioned in 1 M. 15.[23] as one of a number of places to which Numenius bore a letter from the Roman Senate intimating the renewal of "old friendship and alliance" with the Jews, "our friends and confederates." The letter was the response to an embassy sent (B.C. 141) from Simon the High Priest and the people of the Jews. Delos was the smallest of the Cyclades group of islands in the Ægean Sea. As the reputed birthplace of Apollo it was one of the chief seats of the worship of that god and of his sister Artemis, and in classical times was held as a peculiarly sacred spot. Nothing dead could be buried on the island, and every dead body was conveyed across to the neighbouring island of Rhenæa for burial. The city had no walls, but was protected by its extraordinary sanctity, which, however, did not prevent the plundering of its temple and its vast treasures by Menophanes, a general of Mithridates. Its sanctity and its geographical position on the highway from Italy and Greece to Asia rendered it a great commercial centre, and its importance in this respect increased after the fall of Corinth in B.C. 146. According to Strabo, as many as 10,000 slaves were said to have been sold in a single day. Its commerce may be supposed to have attracted a settlement of Jews, some of whom would seem from the message of the Senate to have been of an undesirable description (1 M. 15.[21]). Although the centre not only of the encircling Cyclades but of the ancient religious world, it has nothing whatever to do with the life of to-day except that the harbour between it and Rhenæa has been made a quarantine station. Any tolerably fertile patches of the island are to-day let to a few shepherds.

DEMETRIUS. See SELEUCID KINGS.

DEMOPHON, commander of a district in Palestine under Antiochus V., Eupator, who, with others, continued to molest the Jews after the peace agreed upon between Judas Maccabæus and Lysias (2 M. 12.[2]).

DESSAU, RV. LESSAU (2 M. 14.[16]), mentioned by this name only here, as a place where battle was joined between Nicanor and the Jews. It is possible that ADASA is intended.

DIONYSIA, the feast of Dionysus or Bacchus. In early times the festival had a character of serenity and cheerfulness. According to Plutarch, "the celebration in honour of Dionysus was quite a simple but cheerful affair: in procession was carried a vase filled with wine and decorated with vine-branches; then came a goat, and then one who carried a basket with figs." Later on this simplicity disappeared, and the worship became associated with all the splendour of the Attic drama. In another direction it assumed a wilder and more excited character, the worshippers giving themselves up to intoxication and licentious enthusiasm, and marching in procession to the turbulent noise of flutes, clarions, and cymbals. A leading part in this worship, which was in part carried on by night, was taken by women who, under the name of Bacchanals, Thyiads, and Mænads, crowned with ivy and carrying the thyrsus, represented the attendants of the god. It was worship of this sort, introduced into Rome probably from the Greek cities of South Italy and in some measure from the East, that excited the wrath of the Roman Senate, and was the occasion of the decree (B.C. 186) forbidding the observance of such worship in Rome or even in Italy. The practices, however, had attractions for certain sections of Roman society, and were secretly retained even down to imperial times. Such was the worship that was forced upon the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes in B.C. 168, when the Jews "were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy" (2 M. 6.[7]). Nicanor, six years later, threatened the priests when officiating in the Temple that, unless they delivered up Judas Maccabæus, he would convert the building into a temple of Dionysus (2 M. 14.[33]).

DIONYSUS, also called Bacchus, was the god of wine and of the culture of the vine: in Homer he is represented as the giver of joy to mortals, and as releasing them from care and sorrow: he also gives health and strength to the body, so that he is a saviour at once in a spiritual and a bodily sense. By his gifts men are led to cultivate cheerful associations and the peaceful enjoyment of life. He is also a friend of the Muses and a protector of the arts. The drama and the dithyramb in Greece were indebted to his worship for their existence and advancement, and as a nature-deity he represented growth and fertility. As early as Homer the orgiastic character of his worship was recognised. There is probably no mythological character about whose origin, activities, and influences more varied opinions were entertained. Many traditions of different times and countries, referring to analogous divinities, seem to have been transferred to Dionysus. The extensive travels of the god, especially those in the East, are well known, though they do not seem to have left any special trace in Palestine. His worship, as practised in Greek society in the days of the Maccabees (see DIONYSIA), sanctioning as it did the indulgence of the worst passions and excess, must have been peculiarly offensive to pious Jews; and it was this worship rather than that of any god with more ethical characteristics that was deliberately thrust upon the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes, and threatened by Nicanor. The famous golden vine that had a place in the porch of the Temple had probably something to do with the ancient belief (Plut. Quæst. Conviv., iv. 6) that Dionysus was worshipped by the Jews, an opinion noticed by Tacitus (Hist. v. 5) who, however, gives the Jews no credit for encouraging the festivities and joyous features associated with the worship of the god.

DIOSCORINTHIUS (2 M. 11.[21]). See YEAR in Canonical Section.

DISCUS, one of the games of the Greeks introduced in Jerusalem by Jason, the High Priest under Antiochus Epiphanes. It attracted even the priests from their most solemn duties, so that they "had no more any zeal for the service of the altar"

(2 M. 4.[14]). The game played at the palæstra by the Hellenising Jews excited the hot indignation of the pious. The discus was a circular plate of stone or metal. To throw it with accuracy was a test of strength and dexterity.

Discus

DOCUS, RV. DOK, a "little stronghold" built by Ptolemy, son of Abubus, into which he brought his father-in-law, Simon Maccabæus, and his two sons, and there treacherously slew them (1 M. 16.[15f.]). Josephus (Ant. XIII. viii. 1; BJ. I. ii. 3) calls it "Dagon," and places it above Jericho. The name is still found in 'Ain Dūk, a copious source of excellent water, c. four miles NW. of Jericho. There are ruins hard by, which may, however, be those of the Templars' castle wh. was still standing in the latter part of the thirteenth century (BRP. i. 571f.).

DORA, RV. DOR, appears in the Apocrypha only in 1 M. 15.[11], &c. Tryphon the usurper was here fruitlessly besieged by Antiochus VII., Sidetes. Later it was held by Zoilus against Jannæus, but was taken by Ptolemy Lathyrus (Ant. XIII. xii. 2, 4), and passed to the Hasmonæans. It was taken by Pompey, who made it a free city, under the jurisdiction of the governor of Syria (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ. I. vii. 7). It was rebuilt by Gabinius (Ant. XIV. v. 3), and possessed a synagogue (Ant. XIX. vi. 3). In Jerome's time it was already deserted (OEJ. s.v. Dōr tou Naphath). It is represented by the mod. Ṭanṭūrah, c. eight miles N. of Cæsarea, on the sea-coast. Without a harbour of any value, no sea commerce of importance was possible. But the existence in great abundance in its neighbourhood of the purple-yielding murex lent it prosperity for a time. The ancient remains lie to the N. of the mod. village, but are not of much note. See Dor in Canonical Section.

DORYMENES, father of Ptolemy Macron (1 M. 3.[38]; 2 M. 4.[45]). See Macron.

DOSITHEUS. (1) A captain under Judas Maccabæus who, along with Sosipater, captured Timotheus after the engagement at Carnion, and who, for the sake of the parents and brethren of some of them, who were in the power of Timotheus' friends, was persuaded to let him go (2 M. 12.[19. 24]). (2) A heroic soldier in the army of Judas Maccabæus who in battle laid hold on Gorgias, the opposing general, and would certainly have taken him alive, had not a Thracian horseman intervened and disabled his shoulder (2 M. 12.[35]). (3) A Jew, son of Drimylus, who rescued Ptolemy Philopator from the murderous design of Theodotus, conveying Ptolemy secretly away, and putting "an obscure person" in his place, "whom it befell to receive the punishment intended for the other" (3 M. 1.[3f.]). Dositheus afterwards apostatised.

DOTÆA, a form of the name Dothan (Jth. 3.[9], AV. wrongly "Judæa").

DOTHAN, see art. in Canonical Section. It is frequently mentioned in the book of Judith in connection with the invasion of Holofernes.

E

EANES, RV. MANES, one of the sons of Emmer who agreed to put away his foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[21], RVm. "Harim"; cp. Ez. 10.[21]).

ECANUS, one of the scribes, swift with the pen, who wrote down the visions of Esdras (2 Es. 14.[24]).

ECBATANA (Old Persian Haghmatāna), the Greek form of the name of the capital of Media (1 Es. 6.[23]; To. 3.[7], 6.[5], 7.[1], 14.[14]; Jth. 1.[1f., 14]; 2 M. 9.[3]). It appears in Ez. 6.[2] as Achmetha, the city where the archives of the reign of Cyrus were preserved. It is called "a very strong city," and a description of its fortifications is given in Jth. 1.[1ff.]. Herodotus gives an account of the building of Ecbatana by Deioces (i. 98). It was surrounded by seven walls with battlements of different colours, the outmost white, the next within black, then scarlet, blue, and orange. The two inmost had battlements of silver and gold respectively. Herodotus regards this as the capital of Cyrus (i. 155). Rawlinson makes out a fair case for two cities of this name, one corresponding to the mod. Hamadan; the other a ruin on the "conical hill of Takhti-Soleiman." This second site he would identify with the Ecbatana of Herodotus. It was called Gaza or Gazaca by the Greeks and Romans (Strabo, xi.; Arrian, Anab. iv. 2), a name supposed to be derived from the Persian Choz, "treasure," as the treasure-city of the empire. The account in Jth. 1.[1-4] of the building seems to be a reminiscence partly of Herodotus, and partly of the building of Vara by Yima in the Zendavesta. The northern Ecbatana (Hamadan) is probably referred to in Tobit, as the home of Raguel, the father of Sara the wife of Tobias. Here Tobit died.

ECCLESIASTICUS (lit. "Church-book"), the title given by the Latin Church to an Apocryphal (deutero-canonical) work, of which the Greek name is "Wisdom of Jesus, son of Sirach" or (more briefly) "Wisdom of Sirach"; whereas the original name is said to have been the Hebrew M'shālīm, "Proverbs," though the rabbis know of it only under the name "Book of Ben-Sira." Of the original, which was in late Hebrew, only a few verses are preserved by the Jewish oral tradition, and these are in a mutilated condition; but the Greek translation was made (if its prologue may be trusted) by a descendant of the author, and perhaps from an autograph copy; this is the only case in Biblical Literature in which the family tradition of a book has been preserved. Besides the Greek there is a Syriac version (included in the Peshiṭtā) made from the original, but from an imperfect and evidently corrupt or partly illegible copy of it; all other versions are made from one or other of these two, though the Old Latin shows signs of having been made from a Greek copy corrected from the Hebrew. The work was never regarded as canonical by the Jews, though the rabbis once or twice cite verses from it as from the Hagiographa (K'thūbīm); these citations are due to defective memory.

Authorship.—The date of the author can be approximately fixed from the statement of the translator, who tells us that he himself came to Egypt in the 38th year of Euergetes, i.e. B.C. 132, and was there educated; and that the work which he translates is that of his grandfather. The work itself is shown by the prayer in chap. 36. to be pre-Maccabæan; and if it be reasonable to infer from chap. 50. that the author was a contemporary of Simon the Just, and the High-priesthood of this personage be rightly placed by Josephus about B.C. 300, it would follow that the work was composed at latest about the middle of the third century B.C., while the word "grandfather," used of the author by the translator, must be interpreted as a remoter ancestor. The context, however, wherein Josephus mentions "Simon the Just," is unhistorical, and although there is some obscurity about the wording of the translator's prologue, it seems unsafe to control it from Josephus, and a date near B.C. 200 is ordinarily accepted for the work. The name of the author is given in the epilogue as "Jesus, son of Sirach" in the Greek, some MSS. adding "son of Eleazar," while in the Syriac he is described as "Jesus, son of Simon, called Asīrā (the Prisoner)." The Greek form of the patronymic probably represents a Hebrew Sīrāh, though the form which the Jewish tradition retains, Sīrā (ending with aleph), is not excluded by it; various conjectures have been made about the origin of this name, all more or less fanciful. The author further states that he was of Jerusalem, and gives a brief autobiography in chap. 51., whence, however, we learn little that is definite. He speaks somewhat vaguely of persecutions that he had undergone and from which he had miraculously escaped, and from $34.^{11, 12}$ we learn that he had travelled far and wide, and often been in danger of death. From $43.^{24}$ we might infer that he had not himself crossed the sea, yet perhaps this is only a quotation of Ps. $107.^{29}$. He further records his keen pursuit of wisdom in early youth, and this, together with his travels, seems to have formed the preparation for the profession of "scribe" which he describes with some enthusiasm in chap. 39.; such preparation involved travel to foreign countries ($39.^{4}$), attendance at court (ibid.), and introduction to men of note (cf. $9.^{15}$) as well as an exhaustive study of antiquity. His account of this study ($39.^{1, 2, 3}$) is so phrased as to suggest that it included more than Hebrew Literature (unless the mass of it in his time was far greater than we should otherwise imagine); yet as he does not mention any foreign language among these preparatory studies, and in his list of famous men and authors does not go outside the OT., perhaps these words should not be pressed. The profession, as he conceives it, is one of learned leisure, which therefore we may suppose that he enjoyed. In the Jewish tradition he is thought of as a rabbi and commentator on the OT.

Contents.—The book of Ben-Sira is an imitation of the Biblical books Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and so contains hymns, prayers, rules of conduct, and speculations on a variety of topics. It would seem to consist of two books, each introduced by a hymn to Wisdom, the first book ending with chap. 23. There is another hymn to Wisdom occupying chaps. $14.^{20}$–$15.^{8}$. In that which introduces the second book Wisdom is made to panegyrise herself. To this second book there are three appendices: (a) chaps. 42., 43., description of the beauties of nature, in the style of Ps. 104.; (b) chaps. 44.–50., a sketch of Bible history, brought down to the post-Biblical Simon the Just, somewhat in the style of Ps. 78.; (c) chap. 51., a hymn of thanksgiving for personal protection. A prayer for Israel occupies chap. 36. The precepts are often addressed to "my son" or "children," suggesting that they were intended in the first place for the author's family. They enter into minute details of conduct and manners (e.g. behaviour at table, 31., 32.), as well as morals and dictates of prudence. The profession which he admires most is, as has been seen, that of scribe; he defends the medical profession also, on the ground that Moses employed a drug to cure the bitter waters; apparently the physician's prayer (or charm) is in the author's opinion more potent than his physic. The priest (representing a caste rather than a profession) is to be tolerated and given his dues on the ground of the commandment. He does not conceal his contempt for various forms of manual labour, especially agriculture, though he acknowledges that they are required for the continuance of the State; and he declares all tradesmen to be rogues. To the military profession he appears not to allude; the "scribe" appears to conduct affairs of State.

Though recognising the virtues of the housewife, and an admirer of female beauty, he has a violent attack on women, holding that a good woman is inferior to a bad man. He is a lover of wine, without which he thinks life would be valueless, and describes at length with appreciation musical entertainments at which wine flowed freely—an institution which was favoured by the Greeks, and afterwards by the Arabs. His sentiments in general agree with those of Ecclesiastes, whose pessimism, indeed, he does not share. Life should be enjoyed, because there will be no enjoyment afterwards. Mourning for the dead should be moderate, or it will harm the mourner, while it cannot benefit the deceased, since there is no return—"Do not deceive yourself," &c. In other precepts he reflects the common-sense of his time, and the same as afterwards found expression in many popular works, e.g. those of Horace. Yet at times his strain is loftier. He repeats the prophetic precepts which declare sacrifice without good conduct worthless, and anticipates several of the Evangelical maxims, e.g. that forgiveness of offences should precede prayer, and that in prayer there should be no vain repetitions. And though he declares that "man is not immortal," he hopes to be raised to life at the coming of Elijah.

Relation to the Canonical Books.—In the hymn to Wisdom, which forms chap. 24., that word is said to signify (v. 23.) "the book of the Covenant of the Most High God, the law which Moses commanded us," whence his own book was drawn, like a canal from a river. To the author's study of the Old Testament attention is also called by the translator. "The book of the law" means the Canon, in accordance with the usage of the rabbis and the NT. And in the main his aphorisms are based on the OT., with which he appears to have been saturated, though a certain amount of the matter seems to be original, and some aphorisms are identical with those ascribed to Greek sages (including Homer, Solon, and Æsop), and may conceivably come (perhaps indirectly) from a Greek source. His "book of the Covenant" seems to have included everything in the Hebrew Bible (in its present order) as far as Ecclesiastes, and also Nehemiah; he borrows from all parts of the Psalter (e.g. 17.^{27} = Ps. 6.^{6}, 22.^{27} = Ps. 141.^{3}), names the prophets in their present order, and freely uses Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes. From his list of Hebrew heroes he omits the names of Daniel, Ezra, and Esther, and he appears to be unacquainted with the Chronicles. The omission of the two first names has been used as evidence against their historical character, and the existence of the works called by them in Ben-Sira's time; neither case is, however, perfectly clear; for the phrase (33.^{8}) "he changed times and seasons" appears to be borrowed from Daniel 2.^{21}, and in the notice of Ezekiel attention is called to the verse in which the prophet mentions Job (49.^{9} Syr.) who, in our texts of Ezek., is coupled with Noah and Daniel. The phrase in 17.^{27b} appears only to occur in Ezra 10.^{11}, but this need not imply quotation. The mention of Nehemiah without Ezra would be explicable on the supposition that Ben-Sira possessed the memoirs of the former free from the accretions which now accompany them.

Metre.—The quotations from the OT. are all Procrustean in character, i.e. artificially lengthened or shortened. Thus, Ec. 2.^{14}, "nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it" appears (18.^{6a}) as "there is not to diminish nor to add"; the etymology of Abraham (Gn. 17.^{5}), "a father of many nations," appears as (44.^{19}) "a great father of many nations"; but the promise (Gn. 22.^{18}) that "all the nations of the earth should be blessed in his seed" is reduced (44.^{21b}) to "that nations should be blessed in his seed." This phenomenon indicates that the author must be composing in syllabic metre, since a single syllable (in the etymology of "Abraham" the syllable rab, "great") is of consequence to him; and this is otherwise probable, since the nearly contemporary Pœnulus of Plautus shows that the kindred Punic dialect admitted versification in Greek style. Wherever restoration of Ben-Sira's verses is rendered possible either by comparison of the versions or from the OT., they are found to follow the scheme which is that of a metre called in Greek Bacchic, and in Arabic mutaḳārib. The following verses are specimens:—

⏓ – ⏓   ⏓ – ⏓   ⏓ – ⏓

19.$^{13, 14}$: hōcháḥ rē'ă shémmā lo 'ấsāh wĕim'ấsāh shémmā lo yósif hōcháḥ rē'ă shémmā lo 'ámar wĕim āmar shémmā lō yíshneh.

42.^{14}: tōb rấ' ish mimmḗtebeth ísshāh wĕíshhāh mĕbíshāh lĕḥérpah.

Wherever the verses do not fall into this scheme they are either interpolated, or the restoration is infelicitous.

Language and Style.—The fragments of the original preserved in the Jewish oral tradition represent the rabbinical terminology well developed, and methodical restoration of the verses from the two primary versions shows that many late Hebrew words and idioms were employed. This may at times have been for metrical reasons (e.g. 8.^{10}, where the "coals of the wicked" is shown by the Syriac rendering, "the completely wicked," to stand for gumre hārāshā'), but in most cases it is probable that the author, when not actually quoting the OT., employed the learned language of his time. Plays on words seem to have been common (e.g. 37.[2] between ōhēb and ōyēb, "friend" and "fiend"; 43.[30], "Labour not, for ye shall not attain," Heb. tīgĕ'ū and taggī'ū); and certain collections of aphorisms suggest acrostic arrangement, but this is uncertain. It has repeatedly been suggested that chap. 51. (like the last chapter of Proverbs) was an alphabetical ode, but the evidence for this is weak.

History of the Text.—The author's vehement assertion of the unique claim of the Davidids to the Jewish throne may have rendered his work unpopular in Maccabæan and Herodian times; though the Jewish tradition makes a rabbi cite it before a Maccabæan prince. This accounts for Josephus's silence about it. The original existed as late as the fourth century A.D., if we may believe the statement of Jerome, who professes to have seen it; but it had perished long before the Jewish oral tradition was compiled: for such verses as it preserves are mutilated, put together out of different parts of the work, and (as may be seen by comparing the forms which they assume in different collections of tradition) steadily depraved by confusion with texts of the OT. Moreover, verses of Ben-Sira are ascribed to other rabbis, and sayings of other teachers assigned to him. A specimen of these quotations is the following: "Take no thought for the morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth; possibly he may not see the morrow, and be found troubling himself about a world which is not his." This passage, ascribed to Ben-Sira, consists of (a) a saying of Jesus Christ; (b) a passage of Proverbs; and (c) a reader's attempt to reconcile them. But this confusion between the sayings of Jesus Christ and Jesus Sirach probably was one of the reasons for the destruction of the book, which indeed the Talmud records (using the word gānaz), though it is unaware of any serious reason for the proceeding, since the oral tradition does not preserve Ben-Sira's own name. Since the Jews at some time destroyed everything in the way of Hebrew Literature which was not canonical, it would in any case have had a poor chance of surviving. Wherever later rabbis show any acquaintance with the author, except such as can be derived from the oral tradition, they evidently have it from Christians; so in Josippon (ninth century) the patronymic is given as Shirach (evidently from the Greek), and in a historical work of the eleventh century the name of the book is given as Maqhīl, an ingenious rendering of Ecclesiasticus, supposed to be derived from Ecclesiastes (in Heb. Qoheleth). Ordinarily, however, the rabbis know nothing about Ben-Sira except the passages cited in the oral tradition, as appears from the reply to questions asked of Hay Gaon (of the tenth–eleventh century) and others. In a comparative list of Jewish and Christian Scriptures made in Baghdad about A.D. 970, the book figures in the Christian, but not in the Jewish list. Its possession by the Christians has naturally attracted the attention of the Jews wherever the two communities have associated on friendly terms; and several attempts have been made to restore the original. Towards the end of the eighteenth century such an attempt was made by Ben-Zeb (Wolfsohn), who employed as his basis the Syriac version, which from his acquaintance with Jewish Aramaic he could partly understand, supplementing it from a German version of the Greek. Much the same process seems to have been employed by a re-translator in the tenth or eleventh century, large fragments of whose work were discovered some ten years ago in a gĕnīzah, or rubbish-heap belonging to an Egyptian synagogue. Besides the Syriac version the re-translator employed another derived from the Greek, apparently in Persian; for (43.[2]) "the sun by its appearance preaching at its rise" (based on Ps. 19.[2], &c.) is represented by the untrue and unpoetical "the sun in its affliction giving forth heat"; and in Persian the words for "speech" and "heat" are indistinguishable in writing (SKHN); the MS., moreover, has some Persian glosses. Other examples of mistranslation from Persian can easily be found, and in many cases the re-translator has duplicated the same verse from his two sources, where the Greek and Syriac certainly stood for the same original; and in doing so he ordinarily mistranslates one or both. The MS. being paper, and not earlier than the tenth century, the work which it contains could only be accepted as the original if it furnished a text explaining the bulk of the differences between the Greek and Syriac, and superior to both; and this condition it by no means fulfils. This work is indeed cited as Ben-Sira by one authority, a treatise ostensibly by the Gaon Sa'adyah of the ninth century, who in his other works knows only of the Talmudic quotations. This treatise is, however, clearly a lampoon on the school of Sa'adyah, and by coupling the book with a notorious forgery, and making the wild statement that Ben-Sira furnished his work with points and accents, invented about a century before Sa'adyah's time, it testifies against the genuineness of this document, and not for it.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

EDDIAS, RV. IEDDIAS, one who agreed to put away his foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[26]), called "Jeziah" in Ez. 10.[25]; RV. "Izziah."

EDDINUS (1 Es. 1.[15]), AV. JEDUTHUN, which see.

EDES, RV. EDOS, one who agreed to put away his foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[35]), called "Iddo" in Ez. 10.[43]; AV. "Jadau."

EDNA, wife of Raguel, and mother of Sara who became the bride of Tobias (To. 7.[2], &c.).

EDOS. See Edes.

EKREBEL, a place mentioned only in Jth. 7.[18]. It appears to have lain to the SE. of Dothan. It is prob. identical with Acrabbein, named by OEJ. as the capital of the district of Acrabattine. It is represented by the mod. 'Akrabeh, to the E. of Nāblus.

ELA, father of some who put away their foreign wives (1 Es. 9.[27]), called "Elam" in Ez. 10.[26].

ELASA (1 M. 9.[5]), AV. ELEASA, wh. see.

ELCIA, RV. ELKIAH, an ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.[1]).

ELEASA, RV. ELASA, the place where Judas Maccabæus encamped before the battle in which he was defeated and slain (1 M. 9.[5]). It is possibly identical with Khirbet Il'asā, between Upper and Lower Beth-horon.

ELEAZAR. (1) One of the "principal and learned men" sent by Ezra to secure "such men as might execute the priests' office" (1 Es. 8.[43]), called "Eliezer" in Ez. 8.[16]. (2) The fourth son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas Maccabæus: he was surnamed Avaran (1 M. 2.[5]). He read aloud "the holy book" before battle with Nicanor, and his own name, "the help of God," was taken as watchword (2 M. 8.[23]). In the battle with Antiochus Eupator at Beth-zacharias, B.C. 163, he perished in an act of heroic self-devotion (1 M. 6.[43ff.]). (3) "One of the principal scribes, an aged man," who, in the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes refused to escape torture and death by a subterfuge suggested by the king's officers who respected him. His heroic constancy secured him enduring fame (2 M. 6.[18ff.]). The name of this renowned scribe seems to have been borrowed by the writer of 3 Maccabees for his hero-priest (3 M. 6.). (4) Father of Jason, one of the ambassadors sent by Judas Maccabæus to Rome (1 M. 8.[17]). (5) Sirach Eleazar, father of Jesus (Sr. 50.[27], RV.).

ELEAZURUS, RV. ELIASIBUS, one of the holy singers who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[24]), called "Eliashib" in Ez. 10.[27].

ELEPHANT. This animal is not named in the Canonical Scriptures. "Behemoth" in Jb. 40.[15], where RVm. suggests "elephant," is obviously the hippopotamus. The Jews knew of its existence, however, as they were familiar with Ivory (see Canonical Section), for the production of which it is mainly valued. They also knew that the ivory was the tusks, not the horns of the animal (1 K. 10.[22]; 2 Ch. 9.[21]; Heb. shenhabbim, AVm. "elephants' teeth"). The Indian elephant is not so large as the African, and was probably earlier domesticated. The male only has tusks. The African elephant is stronger and fiercer; both male and female have tusks. The ancient Egyptians and Assyrians hunted the elephant for the sake of its tusks and its hide. On the black obelisk of Shalmaneser (see page 301, side 3, panel 3 from top), an elephant of the Indian species is figured as part of the tribute of Egypt. In the army of Darius at Arbela (B.C. 331) there were fifteen elephants. This is the first mention of them in war. They were largely used by the Seleucid kings of Syria (1 M. 3.[34], 6.[30], 8.[6], &c.). In the army of Antiochus Epiphanes, which defeated the Jews at Beth-zacharias, there were thirty-two elephants trained for war. The beasts were roused by the sight of "the blood of grapes and mulberries." Each carried a tower of wood, "strong and covered," "girt fast upon him with cunning contrivances." Upon each there were thirty-two soldiers, besides "his Indian," i.e. his driver. This last proves that they were Indian elephants. Eleazar, the brother of Judas, singled out one, supposing that the king sat upon it, and, cutting a path to the animal, slew it from below with his sword. The elephant falling, crushed him to death (1 M. 6.[28ff.]).

ELEUTHERUS, the river which formed the boundary between Syria and Phœnicia (Strabo, xvi.). Thus far Jonathan accompanied Ptolemy, king of Egypt (1 M. 11.[7]). The "princes" of Demetrius, defeated by Jonathan at Amathis, fled across the Eleutherus (1 M. 12.[30]). It is now known as Nahr el-Kebīr. It flows in the vale which severs Northern Lebanon from the range which runs to Mount Amanus, and enters the sea 15 miles to the north of Tripoli.

ELIAB, an ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.[1]).

ELIADAS, one of the sons of Zamoth, who had married a strange wife (1 Es. 9.[28]), called "Elioenai" in Ez. 10.[27].

ELIADUN, RV. ILIADUN (1 Es. 5.[58]), possibly = "Henadad" in Ez. 3.[9].

ELIALI (1 Es. 9.[34]), possibly = "Binnui" in Ez. 10.[38].

ELIAONIAS (1 Es. 8.[31]), a descendant of Pahath Moab, called "Elihoenai" in Ez. 8.[4].

ELIASIB, a priest (1 Es. 9.[1]), the "Eliashib" of Ez. 10.[6].

ELIASIBUS (1 Es. 9.[24]), AV. ELEAZURUS, wh. see.

ELIASIMUS (1 Es. 9.[28]), AV. ELISIMUS, wh. see.

ELIASIS, one of those who had married foreign wives (1 Es. 9.[34]), corresponding to "Jaasu" in Ez. 10.[37].

ELIONAS. (1) (1 Es. 9.[22]), and (2) (1 Es. 9.[32]), men who had married foreign wives, corresponding respectively to "Elioenai" (Ez. 10.[22]) and "Eliezer" (Ez. 10.[31]).

ELIPHALAT (1 Es. 9.[33]), called "Eliphelet" in Ez. 10.[33].

ELIPHALET (1 Es. 8.[39]), called "Eliphelet" in Ez. 8.[13].

ELISEUS, RV. ELISHA, the prophet (Sr. 48.[12]).

ELISIMUS, RV. ELIASIMUS, one who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[28]).

ELKIAH, AV. ELCIA, wh. see.

ELNATHAN. See ALNATHAN.

ELUL (1 M. 14.[27]). See YEAR in Canonical Section.

ELYMÆANS, the inhabitants of ELAM (Jth. 1.[6]).

ELYMAIS, a wealthy city of Persia containing a very rich temple, "wherein were coverings of gold, and breastplates, and shields," left there by Alexander the Great. Antiochus Epiphanes tried to take the city but failed (1 M. 6.[1-4]). The name is also applied to the country called in OT. Elam (a place-name derived from the name of a man), whence came the Elamites (Ac. 2.[9]) and the Elymæans (Jth. 1.[6]). The district occupied a part of the province of Susiana, but Strabo and other ancient geographers describe the place with great indistinctness, a circumstance which is perhaps in some measure due to the character of the people, who seem to have been a wild mountain tribe possessing different tracts of country at different periods of their history. Its position was probably south of Assyria and east of Persia proper. According to Strabo (xv. 3, 10) the inhabitants were skilful archers, a description which accords with the notice of them by Isaiah and Jeremiah: the former (22.[6]) says that "Elam bare the quiver," while the latter (49.[35]) speaks of "the bow of Elam." In very early time the country was governed by independent kings; thus, Chedorlaomer was king of Elam; and in Jth. 1.[6] Arioch is mentioned as king of the Elymæans in the war between Nebuchadnezzar, king of Nineveh, and Arphaxad, king of the Medes. From Ac. 2.[9] the inhabitants would seem to have retained their own peculiar language till NT. times.

EMMAUS. The Syrians under Gorgias encamped "near unto Emmaus in the plain country" (1 M. 3.[40]). Here they were crushingly defeated by the Jews under Judas Maccabæus (4.[3-25]). Subsequently the town was fortified by Bacchides, who placed a garrison in it "to vex Israel" (9.[50f.]). It was the chief town of a toparchy under the Romans (BJ. III. iii. 5; Pliny, NH. v. 14). It played an important part in the history of that time (Ant. XIV. xi. 2; BJ. I. xi. 2; II. v. 1, xx. 4; IV. viii. 1; V. i. 6, &c.). It suffered severely from an earthquake in A.D. 131. It was rebuilt c. A.D. 221, and thenceforward was called Nicopolis; a name the origin of which is unknown. Some have thought that it commemorated the capture of Jerusalem. We hear of a spring near by possessed of miraculous powers (Sozomen, v. 20), said to have been closed by order of the emperor Julian (Theophanes, Chron. 41). Willibald, however, mentions it in the eighth century, and, still later, William of Tyre.

EMMAUS

It is represented by the mod. 'Amwās, a small village at the foot of the mountains, 15 miles W.

of Jerusalem, &c., 22 miles SW. of Jaffa. See also HAMMATH in Canonical Section.

EMMER, head of a family, some of whom had married foreign wives (1 Es. 9.21), called "Immer" in Ez. 10.20.

EMMERUTH, AV. MERUTH, wh. see.

ENASIBUS (1 Es. 9.34), corresponding to "Eliashib" in Ez. 10.36.

ENEMESSAR. This is the form in which the name SHALMANESER appears in the book of Tobit (1.1, &c.). By him Israel was carried into captivity to Nineveh (2 K. 17.3-6, 18.9-11). Tobit, of the tribe of Naphtali, is represented as being among the captives. As a reward for his integrity he is made purveyor to the king (1.13). The writer errs in calling SENNACHERIB the son of Enemessar (v. 15). According to the inscriptions Sennacherib was the son of SARGON. Dr. Pinches thinks that "the form Enemessar for Shalmaneser is a corruption, being apparently put for Senemessar (sh changed to s and then to the light breathing, as in Arkeanos [Αρκέανος] for Sargon), l being dropped, and the m and n transposed." There is nothing unusual in this. Shalmaneser itself is a mutilated form of the Asyr. Shalman-asharid.

ENENIUS, RV. ENENEUS, one of the twelve associated with Zerubbabel in leading the return (1 Es. 5.8), corresponding to "Nahamani" in Ne. 7.7.

EN-GADDI, RV. "on the sea shore" (Sr. 24.14) = EN-GEDI.

ENNATAN, AV. by a misprint EUNATAN, one of the men sent by Ezra to fetch Levites who might serve in the Temple (1 Es. 8.44), called "Elnathan" in Ez. 8.16.

EPHRON, a city which evidently lay between Carnion and Scythopolis. Judas Maccabæus came this way with his army and the Jews from the land of Gilead after the capture of Carnion. It is described as "great, in the way as they should go, exceeding strong: they could not turn aside from it on the right hand or on the left, but must needs pass through the midst of it" (1 M. 5.46). The inhabitants refused to let them pass, so the Jews took and destroyed the city, putting the men to the sword. The conditions indicated might be met by Qaṣr Wādy el-Ghafr, a watch-tower which effectually commands the road from the Ḥaurān at the point W. of Irbid, where it crosses the deep Wādy el-Ghafr.

EPIPHANES, ANTIOCHUS. See SELEUCID KINGS.

EPIPHI (3 M. 6.38), the eleventh month of the Egyptian year.

ESAIAS (2 Es. 2.18), AV. ESAY = ISAIAH the prophet.

ESAU, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.29), called "Ziha" in Ez. 2.43; Ne. 7.46.

ESDRAELON, the Greek form of the name applied to the valley of Jezreel (Jth. 3.9, 7.3), the great plain stretching from Tabor, Little Hermon, and Gilboa to Mt. Carmel. See JEZREEL, VALE OF, in Canonical Section.

ESDRAS, THE FIRST BOOK OF.—Name and Order.—In Latin Bibles four books bear the name of Esdras (or Ezra). 1 Es., which heads the list of the English Apocrypha, has been variously placed; thus in the Septuagint Version it follows 2 Chronicles (in Codex B, immediately), while in Codex A it comes (with the title ὁ ἱερεύς) ninth in order thereafter, in both instances being succeeded by Ezra and Nehemiah, which (in A) has the title of "the 2nd bk. of Esdras the priest," Codex L, however, reversing this succession. In the Old Latin Version from the LXX, 1 Es. (Esdræ liber primus de templi restitutione) was also followed by the canonical Ezra, while in the Vulgate of St. Jerome's time 2 Chronicles was followed first (as in Codex L) by the canonical Ezra, now divided into its two parts, which thus became 1 Esdras (Ezra), 2 Esdras (Nehemiah), then by 3 Esdras (the present work, originally 1 Es., probably referred to by St. Jerome as "the Shepherd"), and 4 Esdras (the apocalyptic or Latin Ezra), to both of which last he contemptuously alludes as apocryphorum tertii et quarti somnia. Since the Roman edition in 1590 of Pope Sixtus V., Esdras 3 and 4 have been relegated to an apocryphal appendix at the end of the Vulgate New Testament. 1 Es. (or Esdras 3) has consequently been lately styled the apocryphal Ezra, which is ambiguous, as Esdras 4 is so also. Another designation, "the Greek Ezra," distinguishes it from the Latin Ezra (so called from having survived in the Latin only) and also from the Hebrew Ezra, but not from the LXX version of the last. The best name in English is "the 1st book of Esdras," corresponding to its original title, Ἔσδρας α′; it being remembered that its Vulgate equivalent is Liber tertius Esdræ.

Original Language.—It was written originally in Greek, either as an independent recasting of the LXX version of the canonical Ezra (Keil, Bissell, Schürer, &c.), or as a free translation from the Hebrew original (Michaelis, Trendelenburg, Pohlmann, Herzfeld, Fritzsche, &c.), or as a Greek version earlier than the LXX of Ἔσδρας β′ (Ewald), or even as the original LXX translation, the present Canonical Version being the work of Theodotion (Howarth).

Versions.—Besides the Old Latin Version, which Jerome left untouched, there was a later revision of the then current Vulgate, and Lagarde discovered a portion of still another Latin translation. It exists in a Syriac rendering (not the Peshiṭṭā, which embraces only the canonical books), in Ethiopic, and Armenian.

Contents.—With the exception of 3.1–5.6 (which represents an independent haggada or legend) the contents of this book are the same, though not presented in the same order, as 1 Ch. 35.–Ez. 10. and Ne. 7.[13]–8.[12], as will appear from the following table :—

1 Esdras 1.=2 Ch. 35, 36.[1-21].—Josiah's Passover; defeat and death at Megiddo; sketch of succeeding reigns to the destruction of Jerusalem.
,, 2.[1-15]=Ez. 1.[1-11].—Cyrus' edict. Sacred vessels entrusted to Sanabassar, who returns with them to Jerusalem.
,, 2.[16-30]=Ez. 4.[7-24].—Samaritans interrupt the building of the Temple (wall) in the reign of Artaxerxes; the work abandoned till reign of Darius.
,, 3.[1]–5.[3]=(?).—Jewish youth, victorious in the pages' contest before Darius, gets leave for Jews to return.
,, 5.[4-6]=(?).—Caravan departs under Joshua and Joachim, son of Zerubbabel, and others.
,, 5.[7-45]=Ez. 2.—Lists of those who returned with Zerubbabel.
,, 6.[1]–7.[9]=Ez. 5.[1]–6.[18].—Sisinnes applies to Darius, who permits building of the Temple. Work completed by Zerubbabel in Darius' sixth year.
,, 5.[46-73]=Ez. 3.–4.[5].—Altar set up, Feast of Tabernacles celebrated, Temple foundations laid, co-operation of enemies rejected, the work interrupted till the reign of Darius.
,, 7.[10-15]=Ez. 6.[19-22].—Building of the Temple completed.
,, 8.[1]–9.[36]=Ez. 7–10.—Return of the Jews under Ezra in the reign of Artaxerxes. Abuse of mixed marriages redressed, offenders named.
,, 9.[37-55]=Ne. 7.[73]–8.[13].=Ezra's reading of the law.

Acceptance.—Josephus in his Antiquities (XI. i. 1–v. 5) copied 1 Esdras, not the LXX of Ἔσδρας β′, but with alterations and additions; substituting Cambyses for Artaxerxes to obviate the anachronism of 2.[15-25], introducing an edict of Cyrus to Sisinnes and Sarabasanes (after 2.[11]) which is contained later (in chap. 6.), making Darius propose the reward and set the theses (in 3.), inserting (after 7.[15]) an extraneous account of the Samaritan intrigues, and going on (after 9.[55], which ends in the middle of a sentence) to mention the Feast of Tabernacles, the settlement of the restored exiles, and the death of Ezra. The Church Fathers, with the exception of St. Jerome, frequently quote from 1 Esdras with respect, especially the λόγιον in 4.[41], μεγάλη ἡ ἀλήθεια καὶ ὑπερισχύει, Magna est veritas et prævalet (not prævalebit as commonly cited), which was taken as a prophecy of the conquest of Christ (Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xviii. 36).

Exclusion.—Its rejection by St. Jerome influenced the subsequent verdict of the Church, which was finally endorsed at Trent in 1546, and followed by all the Protestant communions till now, when modern Biblical scholarship inclines to a more favourable reception for the following reasons: (1) Its position in the oldest MSS. indicates an ancient parity, at least, with the canonical Ἔσδρας β′. (2) Josephus' use speaks for its claim to canonicity. (3) The reception accorded by the Greek (Clement. Alex., Strom. i. 392; Origen, Hom. ix. in Jos., § 10, &c.; Euseb., Comm. Ps. 76, § 19; Athan., Or. contr. Arian, ii. 20) and Latin (Tertullian, De Civ. Milit. 9; Cyprian, Ep. 74, 9; Aug., De Civ. Dei, xviii. 36) Fathers seems to imply that they valued it as highly as the Hebrew Ezra (see for Patristic citations Pohlmann, Tüb. Th. Quartalschrift, 1859, pp. 257–275). (4) It is now acknowledged to possess a remarkable literary character and importance for historical criticism and exegesis.

Origin and Relationship.—The discussion of the question as to the relation which Ἔσδρας α′ bears to Ἔσδρας β′ appears to point in the direction at least of the priority of the former (see HDB. 759ff. and EB. 1489ff. for a statement of the various theories adduced).

Object.—The subscription of the Old Latin Version of this book indicates sufficiently the main purpose of its compilation: Explicit Esdræ liber primus de templi restitutione. It was, in fact, to set forth the history of the Temple from the latest date of celebration therein of the traditional cult to the rebuilding of the sacred edifice and the restoration therein of the prescribed worship, this restoration taking place successively under Josiah, Zerubbabel, and Ezra. The personal note is supplied in the original paragraph (3.[1]–5.[6]), which is evidently inserted to remind Greek-speaking Jews of the favours anciently bestowed upon their co-religionists by foreign potentates, notwithstanding their representing the alien world-power, and so, perhaps, also (indirectly) to encourage the ritual observance of their national code by showing its compatibility with the sympathy and support of such a Gentile potentate as Ptolemy Philometor (B.C. 181–146), who is alluded to in the contemporary apocalypse of the Sibylline Books (iii. 293–4), and who was petitioned by Onias, when fleeing from Antiochus Epiphanes, to permit the building of a temple for Alexandrian Jews at Heliopolis (Lupton in The Speaker's Comm.).

Time.—Between the limits of the compilation of Ezra and Nehemiah (about B.C. 300) and the time of Josephus (A.D. 100), the date of the present work probably lies about midway (see Herzfeld, Gesch. d. v. Is. 1863, ii. 73; and Lupton, Speaker's Comm. i. 11–14).

Place.—A number of allusions in the course of the book seem to indicate an Egyptian rather than a Palestinian origin, notwithstanding some topographical details of the Temple more exactly given than in the canonical parallel passages.

Style.—Unlike the laboriously close rendering of the Hebrew original in Ἔσδρας β′, the Greek of this book is fluent and idiomatic, but is not a loose paraphrase; for many Hebraisms are elegantly turned. Its literary excellence, which probably attracted Josephus, has been compared with that of the LXX Version of Daniel (Gwynn, Dict. Chr. Biog.), and has suggested a common authorship to Thackeray (HDB. l.c.).

Value.—From a historical point of view this work is practically worthless, the narrative in the second, third, and fifth chapters being inverted, Artaxerxes and Cyrus being mentioned first and last instead of coming last and first respectively, the transposed passage (2.[16-30]) being inserted to account for Zerubbabel's petition to Darius and lead up to the haggada of the Persian court-pages, after which events in Cyrus' reign are introduced as having happened in that of his successor. But, as a faithful reflection of the Jewish spirit of patriotism and devotion in Maccabæan times, it is highly important and instructively suggestive.

For the literary critic of the Massoretic text, its evidence is of great weight, as it often mirrors a truer original than that vouched for in the LXX of Ezra (see HDB. s.v., and specially, for Bible readers, the masterly introduction in Duff's edition of Esdras).

Text.—The present work is found in two of the three oldest MSS. of the LXX, having been lost (with the bulk of the OT. earlier than Ezra 9.) fm. the Sinaitic (א). In the Alexandrine (A) and Vatican (B) the contents are differently arranged as noted above (Name and Order), and of these the text of the former is superior (see Fritzsche, Libri Apocr. V. T. 1871). It is not contained in the Codex Amiatinus.

Literature.—The First and Second Books of Esdras, edited by A. Duff, D.D., 1903 (in "The Temple Bible"); The Apocrypha, Revised Version, 1895; W. R. Churton, The Uncanonical and Apocryphal Scriptures, 1884; O. F. Fritzsche and C. L. W. Grimm, Kurzgefasstes Exegetisches Handbuch zu den Apokryphen, Leipzig, 1851); O. F. Fritzsche, Libri Apocryphi Veteris Testamenti Græci (Leipzig, 1871); Pohlmann, Über das Ansehen des Apokryphischen dritten Buches Esras (in Tübingen Theologische Quartalschrift, 1859, 257–275; Bissell (in Lange's Commentary on the Old Testament, 1880); Lupton (in the Speaker's Commentary, Apocrypha, i. 1888); Sir H. H. Howarth (in the Academy, 1893: The Character and Importance of I Esdras, vol. xliii. pp. 13, 60, 106, 174, 326, 524); Schürer, History of the Jewish People, II. iii. 177–181; Ewald, History of Israel, v. 126–128; Josephus, Antiquities, xi. 1–5.

P. Henderson Aitken.

ESDRAS, THE SECOND BOOK OF, as it is named in the English version of the Apocrypha, belongs to the Apocalyptic Literature of the Hebrews.

Titles.—The question of titles has two aspects: (1) Verbal. (a) The most ancient verbal title seems to be Ἔζρας ὁ προφήτης. It is possible, though by no means certain, that this title is cited in Clem. Alex. (Strom. iii. 16) and in Ambrose of Milan (De bono Mortis, ch. xii.). (b) Ἔσδρα ἀποκάλυψις—which is very appropriate, as far as the contents of the book are concerned. (2) Numerical, added to the verbal title. The generally accepted heading is "The Fourth Book of Ezra," which is found in the most ancient Latin MS., Codex Sangermanensis. The numerical title is important, because the book is thus brought into line with the other books assigned to Ezra. They have been numbered thus in Cod. S.: 1 Ezra = Ezra and Nehemiah, along with 3 Apocryphal Esdr. 3., 4., 5.[1-3]; 2 Ezra = 4 Esdr. 1., 2.; 3 Ezra = 3 Esdr. 1., 2.[1-15]; 4 Ezra = 4 Esdr. 3.–14.; 5 Ezra = 4 Esdr. 15., 16.

Original Language and Versions.—The original language was undoubtedly Greek. The theory of a Hebrew original has been ruled out of court. The original Greek text has been lost, but we are fortunate in possessing five different versions, namely, the Latin, of which numerous codices exist, the most important being Codex Sangermanensis and Codex Ambianensis—both MSS. date from the ninth century—the Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, and Armenian versions.

Structure and Contents.—Chaps. 3.–14 constitute the original part of the book. 1. and 2., 15. and 16. are later additions. They are separated from the main body of the work, and in the best MSS. bear a different title. They are found in the Latin, but not in the Oriental versions. 1. and 2. have been added by a Christian hand. This is almost certain on account of the anti-Jewish tone of the chapters, and the thought and language, which in many parts are thoroughly Christian, and manifest a striking resemblance to passages of NT., e.g. 1.[30, 35, 37, 38], 2.[5, 13, 20, 21, 27, 32, 34, 35, 40, 41, 42-47].

Probably 1. and 2. are a good deal later than the book proper, and were written by a Christian living in Egypt about the beginning of the third century A.D.

Chaps. 15. and 16. seem to be later than 1. and 2. They were perhaps added about the end of the third century A.D. Indeed attempts have been made to find references to events of Egyptian history in certain verses of 15., such as the plague of Alexandria (about A.D. 260) in vv. 10–12, &c. The author was in all probability a Jew, though there are one or two evidences of Christian influence, e.g. 15.[35] and 16.[18, 28, 53]. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the book relates to vv. 35 and 36 of chap. 7. It is clear that there is a gap between the verses. The hiatus has been filled up in the Oriental versions, but exists in the Latin version. There is a strong presumption that the passage existed in the original Greek; and it has been discovered that it must also have stood in Cod. S., the most ancient version, but that the leaf on which it had been written was cut out, perhaps for doctrinal reasons. All doubts as to the authenticity of the missing passage have been allayed by a remarkable discovery of R. L. Bensly, in 1875, who found the lost verses in the Codex Ambianensis (now in the Bibliothèque Communale at Amiens). The verses are entirely eschatological.

Space permits only a very brief summary of the contents of the book. 3.–14., the main body of the composition, consists of a series of seven visions. They are communicated to Ezra, and interpreted by Uriel, the archangel. The first three visions (3.–9.[25]) revolve round the same theme—" Why have pain and sorrow come into the world ? " The inquiry is prompted by Israel's affliction and Babylon's (Rome's) prosperity. The answer is: (1) God's ways are unknowable. (2) Present affliction is explained in the light of the future life. (3) Affliction is the gate through which one passes into the state of bliss beyond. The fourth vision (9.[26]–10.[58]) is that of a woman bewailing the death of her son. The woman, who in the vision suddenly disappears and is replaced by a city builded, is interpreted as Sion weeping for the loss of her son, that is, the destruction of Jerusalem. The fifth vision (11.–12.) describes the eagle that arose from the sea. This vision is most important in considering the date of the book. The sixth vision (13.) is remarkable from its treatment of the Messianic idea. It is the vision of the man who came up out of the midst of the sea and flew with the clouds of heaven. This is the Saviour of the world, who rebukes the nations for their wickedness and gathers unto Him in Sion the peaceable multitude, interpreted as the ten lost tribes. The seventh vision (14.) sets forth the legend of the restoration of the Holy Scriptures. They had been burnt, and Ezra is here represented as restoring them. Under Divine inspiration he dictates for forty days to five swiftly writing scribes.

The Oriental versions mention at the close the translation of Ezra.

Date, Authorship, and Design.—With reference to the date of the book, opinions have varied between a time before the Christian era and a date after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Petty details have been cited by some, e.g. 6.[9] and 14.[11, 12]. But the really determining factor is the vision of the eagle. It is now generally agreed that Rome under the empire is alluded to. That the eagle is Rome is clear, but it is difficult to determine who are indicated by the twelve wings, three heads, and eight lesser wings. Probably they must represent twenty-three Roman emperors or rulers. The most cogent theory is that these rulers range from Julius Cæsar to Domitian (who reigned from A.D. 81–96). It is possible to be more specific. The author recalls a catastrophe of the Jews: he compares it with the Babylonian exile: Jerusalem lies waste. That probably refers to A.D. 70. The time is now roughly thirty years afterwards. The author is aware of the death of Titus (11.[35]) and expects that of Domitian (12.[2, 28]). We shall not be far wrong in placing the date about A.D. 90.

There are several resemblances between the book and writings of NT. which might point to a Christian author, cp. Mw. 7.[13, 14] and 4 Esdr. 7.[6, 9]; Mw. 22.[14] and 4 Esdr. 8.[3]. See also points of contact with the Pauline epistles and book of Revelation. The spirit of the book, however, is clearly Jewish. The author, while his outlook is comprehensive, is torn with grief at the fate of Jerusalem and its people, while his allusions to the ten lost tribes, to Behemoth and Leviathan, and other Hebrew points, show the Jewish cast of mind. As in the case of many of the apocryphal writings, the name of Ezra is used to denote the author, because that fact would lend additional weight to the book; and besides, the real author thought the name appropriate, because Ezra's experience in the Babylonian Exile coincided with his own in relation to the national calamity of A.D. 70.

The design of the book is to comfort the Jews in their national affliction. The present life is only the gateway leading to the future. Hence the apocalyptic and eschatological nature of the composition.

It is interesting to observe how both Jewish and Christian writers of the early Christian era seemed to follow a common tradition in regard to eschatology. The Messianic teaching of the book is important. See especially 7.[28, 29], 12.[31ff.], 13.[5ff.]

Lit.: Bensly and James, Cambridge Texts and Studies, vol. iii. 2; Bensly, Missing Fragment of 4th Ezra, 1875; Hilgenfeld, Messias Judæorum; Apocrypha revised, 1894; Kautzsch, Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen; Lange's OT. Commentary, Bissell; Drummond, Jewish Messiah.

NORMAN R. MITCHELL.

ESDRIS (2 M. 12.[36] RV.). The text is doubtful: probably we shd. read with AV. " Gorgias."

ESEBON (Jth. 5.[15]) = HESHBON: so RV.

ESEBRIAS, RV. ESEBERIAS (1 Es. 8.[54]), called " Sherebiah " in Ez. 8.[18].

ESORA (Jth. 4.[4]), RV. ÆSORA, which see.

ESRIL, RV. EZRIL, one who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[34]), called " Azareel " in Ez. 10.[41].

ESTHER, ADDITIONS TO. The canonical book of Esther, as it stands in our English Bibles, is largely concerned with the struggle to the death between the house of Haman the Agagite and that of Mordecai the Benjamite, also with the disgrace of queen Vashti and the promotion of Esther (the cousin of Mordecai and his adopted daughter) to be queen in her stead. Haman, in the course of his feud with Mordecai, aimed a mortal blow at the whole Jewish race, which was cleverly countered by Esther, who, risking her own life and regal dignity by venturing uninvited into the presence of Ahasuerus (Xerxes), submitted her petition to the monarch for a formal interview, at which Haman would also be present, when she would solicit for her race the right of defending themselves.

These facts must be carefully kept in remembrance when considering the Additions to Esther, inasmuch as the Additions do not take the form of addenda that may be appended to the conclusion of the canonical chapters. Our English apocryphal books are all printed in this way, with the statement prefixed: "The rest of the chapters of the book of Esther which are found neither in the Hebrew nor in the Chaldee." The Additions take the form, therefore, of "interpolations," or in other words they supply to the Hebrew original certain supplements which have been incorporated in the Greek version. After supplying a Preface and an Epilogue, they then expand the Hebrew narrative at three specific places, to wit (1) chap. 3.[13]; (2) chap. 14.[17]; and (3) chap. 8.[12]. When those interpolations were made it is difficult to say, some writers contending that they may have been introduced by the translator himself, when the book was rendered into Greek, others that they bear internal evidence of being the interpolations of a later date, the author of them being in all likelihood an Egyptian Jew familiar with the Septuagint Greek. To the conclusion of the Greek version a note is appended, to which a moderate degree of authority may be attached, stating that the complete book of Esther, which it styles the Epistle of Purim, after being rendered into Greek at Jerusalem by Lysimachus, son of Ptolemy, was conveyed to Egypt in the year B.C. 114, by Dositheus and his son. The writer of the note (says Prof. Stevenson in the Temple Apocrypha) conveys the impression that the whole epistle was translated from a Hebrew original. Internal evidence, however, agrees with the negative conclusion, which naturally follows from the absence of the chapters in the Hebrew Bible. The Epistle of Purim implies the complete book of Esther, which is regarded as a letter of Mordecai's (Est. 9.[20, 26, 29]).

To consider the Additions in detail. The Preface (11.[2]–12.[16]) is in two parts. The incidents of the future are predicted in a prophetic dream of Mordecai's, the interpretation of which is, with an artistic skill worthy of a sensational novelist of to-day, reserved for the Epilogue. In this way the interest is maintained throughout. Then comes a Prelude, in which the introduction of Mordecai to the palace is explained, with the cause of the feud which existed between the latter and Haman. The cause of both incidents was the discovery of a conspiracy to destroy the king. "Mordecai's dream," says Prof. Stevenson, "is not simply a fantastic reflection of his history. It appears rather to have been adapted without complete success to its present purpose. Underlying it may be traced a form of the widespread nature-myth, which describes the daily contest of light and darkness (cp. 9.[11]), and the yearly struggle of summer and winter." Its application here may be a suggestion or recognition of identity between Mordecai and Marduk, the Babylonian sun-god. If so, the fact is of some importance in discussions regarding the origin of the Hebrew book of Esther. The dream is said to have taken place in Nisan; but that was the month when Haman cast lots for the destruction of the Jews (Est. 3.[7]).

The first Addition or interpolation (chap. 13.[1-7]) is introduced after 3.[13], and is the copy of the edict which was issued against the Jews. One noteworthy fact in the edict is that not once does it name the people who are to be destroyed. The responsibility of doing this was left, probably at his own request, to Haman, who supplied the omission possibly in supplementary instructions. The edict is remarkable for the vagueness of the charges brought against the Jews, of being "a certain malicious people that had laws contrary to all nations, and continually despised the commandments of kings, so as the uniting of our kingdoms honourably intended by us cannot go forward."

The second Addition or interpolation (chap. 13.[8]–14.[19]) comes in after chap. 4.[17], and is devoted to recording the prayers offered by Esther and Mordecai, immediately prior to that interview between the former and the king, when Esther virtually broke one of the most stringent laws in the kingdom, that no woman must appear in the presence-chamber of the monarch uninvited. The Addition relates how she entered into the royal presence, how she was received, and the effect the royal majesty had upon her. The fact must also be noted here that chap. 15. is substituted for 5.[1-3], whereby the simple statement of the Hebrew text is omitted.

The third Addition or interpolation (chap. 16.) is placed after chap. 8.[12], and contains the copy of the king's letter in which he undoes the mischief of his edict as far as is permissible in a land where the law, once passed, was immutable. After stigmatising Haman as the enemy of the king and of the Jewish nation, it gives a reason for his action, in styling him a Macedonian who aimed at the destruction of the Persian empire. The letter then proceeds to affirm a new bond of sympathetic union between the king and the Jews, when it styles them "the children of the Most High and Most Mighty Living God, who hath ordered the kingdom both unto us and to our progenitors."

The Epilogue consists of an explanation of the dream of the Preface, and a note regarding the Greek translation of the book.

What then is the purpose or motif pervading these Additions? The aim was twofold: (1) To expand or amplify the existing narrative by the insertion of new matter, for the original text was exceedingly brief; and (2) to impart a more definitely religious tone to the book. For (as Prof. Andrews remarks) in the canonical book of Esther the name of God never occurs, and the religious interest is very slight. In all the Additions, on the other hand, the religious element present is very marked, the writer seemingly being anxious to impress on the minds of his readers the conviction that the worship of God is the main aim and end in life.

In these Additions the English forms of the proper names differ from those in the original Hebrew. They have evidently been influenced by the forms employed in the Greek version. Thus Mardocheus stands for Mordecai, Aman for Haman, Artaxerxes takes the place of Ahasuerus, Cisai of Kish, Semei of Shemei, and the like.

OLIPHANT SMEATON.

ESYELUS, AV. SYELUS, one of the governors of the Temple in the time of Josiah (1 Es. 1.[8]), called "Jehiel" in 2 Ch. 35.[8].

ETHANUS (2 Es. 14.[24]), AV. ECANUS, wh. see.

ETHMA, RV. NOOMA (1 Es. 9.[35]), corresponds to "Nebo" in Ez. 10.[43].

EUERGETES (Prol. to Sr.). See PTOLEMIES.

EUMENES II. succeeded his father, Attalus I., on the throne of Pergamus, B.C. 197. Friendship with the Romans was a tradition in his house. He assisted them in the war with Antiochus the Great (see SELEUCID KINGS), and received as a reward of his fidelity and valour large grants of territory (1 M. 8.[8]). The passage is certainly corrupt. India and Media did not belong to the Seleucids, and were never in the power of Rome to give. Possibly Mysia and Ionia may have been intended. "Livy (37.[55]) and Strabo (xiii. 4.[2] [624]) agree that the territory ceded to Eumenes extended only to the Taurus, and the latter especially notes that previous to this accession there had not been under the power of Pergamos 'many places wh. reached to the sea at the Elaïtic and the Adramytene Gulfs'" (EB. s.v.). Later the Romans suspected Eumenes of treasonable intrigues with Perseus, and he fell into disfavour. He died in B.C. 159.

EUNATAN, a misprint in 1 Es. 8.[44] (AV.) for ENNATAN.

EUPATOR (1 M. 6.[17]; 2 M. 2.[20], &c.). See PTOLEMIES.

EUPOLEMOS, one of the two deputies sent by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 8.[17]) to Rome, c. B.C. 161, to ask the Romans to assist the Jews against Demetrius. The circumstances that led to the embassy that succeeded in making the first league—offensive and defensive—between the Jews and the Romans, the reception of the embassy by the Roman Senate, and the decree of mutual assistance, are fully recorded in 1 M. 8. The same account substantially is given in Josephus (Ant. XII. x. 6). 1 M. 8.[15] seems to be the only ancient authority for the statement that the Roman Senate at the date of the embassy numbered 320.*

EZECHIAS, RV. EZEKIAS (1 Es. 9.[14]), called "Jahaziah" in Ez. 10.[15].

EZECIAS. (1) RV. EZEKIAS (1 Es. 9.[43]), called "Hilkiah" in Ne. 8.[4]. (2) RV. HEZEKIAH (Sr. 48.[17]), king of Judah (cp. 2 M. 15.[22]).

EZERIAS, RV. ZECHRIAS (1 Es. 8.[1]) = "Azariah" in Ez. 7.[1].

EZIAS, RV. OZIAS (1 Es. 8.[2]) = "Azariah" in Ez. 7.[3].

EZORA (1 Es. 9.[34]), AV. OZORA, which see.

EZRIL (1 Es. 9.[34]), AV. ESRIL, which see.

* Eupolemus, the historian of the Jews, quotations from whose work survive in certain writings of the Fathers, lived at this time. His history was probably written c. B.C. 157. Possibly, therefore, he may be identical with E. of 1 M. 8.[17].

F

FAUCHION, RV. SCIMITAR (Jth. 13.[6], 16.[9]), the short sword with wh. Judith is said to have cut off the head of Holofernes.

FLINT. The word occurs in Apollonius' description of the plain in wh. the Jews under Jonathan would not be able to resist his attack, "where there is neither stone nor flint" (1 M. 10.[73]). We should probably read "pebbles," i.e. ammunition for the slingers, without which they would fall an easy prey to the cavalry.

FROCK. The frock, or overall, of hōmolinon, i.e. rough, undressed flax, marks the humblest of the people as over against royalty which wears purple (Sr. 40.[4]). This single garment is largely worn by the countrymen in Palestine still.

G

GABAEL. (1) An ancestor of Tobit (To. 1.[1]). (2) A poor Jew of the city of Rages, in Media, to whom Tobit lent ten talents of silver (To. 1.[14]). In the time of Tobit's distress the money was restored to him through his son Tobias, who was conducted to Gabael at Rages by the angel Raphael (To. 1.[14], 4.[1, 20], 5.[6], 9., 10.[2]). In the same book mention is made of Gabrias, who is described in 1.[14] as the brother, and in 4.[20] as the son, of Gabael.

GABBE (1 Es. 5.[20]), AV. GABDES, called "Gaba" in Ez. 2.[26].

GABRIAS, the brother of GABAEL, with whom Tobit had left in trust ten talents of silver (To. 1.[14]). In 4.[20] Gabael is called "son of Gabrias": the reading, however, is doubtful. The VV. also are confused.

GADDIS, surname of John, brother of Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 2.[2], AV. CADDIS). Possibly it represents the Heb. gaddi, "my fortune" (Nu. 13.[11]).

GALAAD (1 M. 5.[9, 55]; Jth. 1.[8]), the Greek form of the name GILEAD.

GALILEE. See article in Canonical Section.

GAMAEL, chief of the family of Ithamar, who went up from Babylon with Ezra (1 Es. 8.[29]), called "Daniel" in Ez. 8.[2].

GAR, RV. GAS, head of a family of the servants of Solomon (1 Es. 5.[34]), not represented in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

GARIZIM (2 M. 5.[23]), RV. GERIZIM, which see in Canonical Section.

GAS. See GAR.

GAZARA, a stronghold in Judæa which played a considerable part in the wars of the Maccabees. It is first mentioned in connection with the flight of Gorgias and his army, Judas Maccabæus pursuing them as far as Gazara (1 M. 4.[15]). It was one of the cities fortified by Bacchides (9.[52]; Ant. XIII. i. 3). After a short siege it surrendered to Simon Maccabæus, who turned out the inhabitants, cleansed the city of idolatry, and built for himself a residence there (1 M. 13.[43ff.]). His son John, "a valiant man," he made "leader of all his forces," with a dwelling in Gazara (v. 53). The writer of 2 Maccabees gives the credit of the capture of Gazara to Judas, after a siege of twenty-four days (10.[32ff.]).

The city is represented by the mod. Tell Jezer, c. four miles west by north of 'Amwās. It is identical with GEZER, which see. Remains of the palace built by Simon Maccabæus were found by Mr. Macalister in the course of excavation (PEFQ. 1905, p. 26).

GAZERA, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.[31]), corresponding to "Gazzam" in Ez. 2.[48].

GEDDUR, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.[30]), possibly corresponding to "Giddel" or "Gahar" in Ez. 2.[47].

GENNÆUS, AV. GENNEUS, which see.

GENNESAR, RV. GENNESARETH = Sea of Galilee (1 M. 11.[67]).

GENNEUS, RV. GENNÆUS, the father of Apollonius, one of the Syrian generals commanding a district in Pal. under Antiochus Eupator (2 M. 12.[2]). Luther takes the word as an adjective (well-born), and translates "des edlen Apollonius."

GEON, RV. GIHON, one of the four rivers of Paradise named in a figurative encomium of wisdom (Sr. 24.[27]). Probably the Nile is intended.

GEPHYRUN (2 M. 12.[13] RV.). It is said that Judas "fell upon a certain city Gephyrun." AV. renders "He went also about to make a bridge." This may be correct. RVm. says, "The relation between the names Gephyrun and Caspin is unknown, and perhaps the Greek text is corrupt." Compare Gephrun, the name of a city in Gilead mentioned by Polybius, V. lxx. 12), and Casphor (1 M. 5.[26, 36]). Josephus calls the city EPHRON, which see (Ant. XII. viii. 5).

GERGESITES, RV. GIRGASHITES (Jth. 5.[16]), a pre-Israelite people in Palestine, of whom nothing definite is known.

GERON. Instead of EV. "an old man of Athens" in 2 M. 6.[1], perhaps we should render with RVm. "Geron, an Athenian," said to have been sent by Antiochus "to compel the Jews to depart from the laws of their fathers," and "to pollute the sanctuary in Jerusalem, and to call it by the name of Jupiter Olympius."

GERRENIANS, AV. GERRHENIANS, marks apparently the southern frontier of the territory ruled by Antiochus Eupator. He is said to have made "Hegemonides governor from Ptolemais even unto the Gerrhenians" (2 M. 13.[24]). The town of Gerrha, between Pelusium and Rhinocolura, could hardly be meant, as it was then in the hands of Egypt. One MS. reads here Gerarēnōn; this wd. give the limits as Ptolemais and Gerar. The Syr. reads Gezer, which points to the stronghold of that name. No certain decision is possible.

GERSON (1 Es. 8.[29]), called "Gershom" in Ez. 8.[2].

GESEM, RV. GOSHEN, one of the districts to which the messengers of Nebuchadnezzar were sent (Jth. 1.[9]).

GIHON. See GEON.

GIRGASHITES. See GERGESITES.

GORGIAS, a general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 M. 3.[38]). During the absence of Antiochus in Persia, Lysias, the deputy of Antiochus, appointed him along with Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, and Nicanor, to lead an expedition of 40,000 footmen and 7000 horsemen into Judæa c. B.C. 166. G., with 5000 foot and 1000 of the best horse, was defeated with great loss at Emmaus by Judas Maccabæus, who had only 3000 men with "neither armour nor swords to their minds" (1 M. 4.[1-25]). Later on (B.C. 164) G. gained a victory over the forces of Joseph and Azarias, who, wishing to share the glory of Judas and Jonathan, in direct disobedience to the orders of Judas attacked G., who held the garrison of Jamnia (1 M. 5.[56ff.]; Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 6). In 2 M. the doings of G. are narrated with some confusion. In 12.[32] "governor of IDUMEA" is probably a wrong reading for Jamnia, which is the reading in Josephus, loc. cit.

GORTYNA, an ancient city of Crete situated near the south coast, and about equally distant from the east and west ends of the island. It is mentioned in Homer: under the Romans it seems to have been the capital of the island, though in earlier times it was a smaller and less important town than Cnossos. The two towns when united were able to control the island, but in later times they were often engaged in hostilities. The town (1 M. 15.[23]) was one of the places to which formal intimation was made in B.C. 161 of the renewal of the league between the Romans and the Jews. The league was renewed by the Senate in response to the request of the embassy sent to Rome by Simon, the High Priest, and the Jews. Jews in considerable numbers were settled in Crete, as in the other islands of the Ægean, between the time of Alexander the Great and the beginning of the Christian era. Gortyna was probably their chief place of residence in the island.

GOTHOLIAS, the father of Josias, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Es. 8.[33]). This is the Greek form of 'Athaliah, the gamma taking the place of the 'ain—the usual transliteration. It appears from comparison with 2 K. 11.[1], &c., that Athaliah was a name borne by both men and women.

GOTHONIEL (i.e. 'Othoniel), father of Chabris, who was one of the three rulers of the city of Bethulia (Jth. 6.[15]).

GRABA, RV. AGGABA (1 Es. 5.[29]), called "Hagabah" in Ez. 2.[45].

GRECIANS (1 M. 6.[2] RV. "Greeks"; 8.[9] RV. "they of Greece"; 2 M. 4.[36], &c., RV. "Greeks"), the non-Jewish subjects of the Greek kings.

H

HABBACUC, RV. HABAKKUK, the prophet, introduced as the agent in the miraculous provision of food for Daniel in the lions' den (Bel. 33., &c.).

HAGIA, RV. AGIA, which see.

HALICARNASSUS, a city of Caria in the SW. of Asia Minor. It was the birthplace of Herodotus, and of Dionysius, the Greek archæologist and historian, who lived in the first century B.C. Its famous mausoleum was built by queen Artemisia in honour of her husband, Mausōlus, and was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. It was destroyed in the year 1522 by the Knights of Rhodes, who used the material to build the castle of Budrum, the modern name of H. Numerous designs have been prepared by architects and others for the restoration of the mausoleum, from that of Sir Christopher Wren to the present day. The only Biblical interest of the place is associated with its mention in 1 M. 15.[23] as one of the places to which formal intimation was sent of the renewal of the old "friendship and league" between the Romans and the Jews. This league was originally made at the instance of Judas Maccabæus, who sent to Rome an embassy to beg assistance against the king of Syria. The renewal of the league was granted to the ambassadors of "Simon, the High Priest, brother of Judas, and of the people of the Jews." In Josephus (Ant. XIV. x. 23) is mentioned a decree of the people of H. to the effect that "as many men and women of the Jews as are willing so to do may celebrate their sabbaths and perform their holy offices, according to the Jewish laws; and may make their proseuchæ at the sea-side, according to the customs of their forefathers."

HASIDÆANS (1 M. 2.[42], &c.), AV. ASSIDEANS which see.

HASMONÆAN, the name applied to the family of the Maccabees with which Josephus the historian claimed relationship (Ant. XVI. vii. 1, "Asamonean"). He evidently derives it from Asamoneus, whom he makes great-grandfather of Mattathias (Ant. XII. vi. 1). The family is named in the Talmud (Middoth, i. 6) bĕnē Ḥashĕmōna'ē. The name does not appear in 1 M. 2.[1], but Wellhausen (Pharisäer, &c., 94) makes the not improbable suggestion that τοῦ Συμεών in that place may be a misrendering of the Heb. ben Ḥashmān. Dalman's idea that the original title of 1 Maccabees may have been ספר בית חשמנאי, "Book of the house of the Hasmonæans," is possibly correct.

HEGEMONIDES, the Syrian officer placed in command of the region stretching from PTOLEMAIS to the GERRENIANS (2 M. 13.[24] RV.). AV. renders "made him (Judas Maccabæus) principal governor from Ptolemais," &c., but for this use of the word there is no support.

HELCHIAH, RV. HELKIAS (1 Es. 8.[1]), corresponding to "Hilkiah" in Ez. 7.[1].

HELCHIAS, RV. HELKIAS (2 Es. 1.[1]), an ancestor of Ezra; same as preceding.

HELIAS (2 Es. 7.[39]), RV. ELIJAH, the prophet.

HELIODORUS, minister of the Syrian king Seleucus IV., Philopator (B.C. 187–175), who, being sorely in need of money to pay the tribute due to the Romans, and being informed by Apollonius, governor of Cœle-Syria (i.e. Palestine) and Phœnicia, of the wealth stored in the Temple at Jerusalem, commissioned H. (2 M. 3.) to plunder the Temple and to bring the money to him. From verses 12 and 15 it would seem that some of the money was deposited in the Temple as in a bank for safe keeping, and was only to this extent under the control of the High Priest, notwithstanding whose protest H. was proceeding to carry out his commission when, by the interference of "the Lord of spirits and the Prince of all power," a great apparition appeared, which caused him to fall down "compassed with great darkness" and speechless. By the intercession of Onias, the High Priest, he was restored to life and strength, and bore witness to the sanctity and majesty of the Temple. The narrative in 2 M. 3. is not known from any other source, though the so-called 4 M. refers to the attempt to plunder the Temple, assigning the deed to Apollonius. The courtier H. mentioned by Appian (Syr. 45) as having poisoned the king in order himself to mount the throne is identified with H. of 2 M. 3.

HELKIAS. (1) One of the governors of the Temple in the time of Josiah (1 Es. 1.[8]), the "Hilkiah" of 2 Ch. 35.[8] (cp. Ez. 7.[1]), and the "Chelcias" of Ba. 1.[7]; RV. "Helkias." (2) The father of Susannah (Su. vv. 2, 29, AV. "Chelcias").

HERCULES, the name given by the Greeks to the Tyrian deity whose national name was Melcart, identified with Baal of OT. history, and in whose honour games were held every fifth year at Tyre (2 M. 4.[18]). This deity was identified with Hercules on the same principle as that on which Cæsar indicated the Gallic, and Tacitus the German, gods, namely, by similarity of functions and attributes. According to Josephus (Ant. VIII. v. 3), Hiram, king of Tyre, in the days of Solomon, built the temple of Hercules and also that of Astarte. In the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 175–164), Jason, who by underhand methods (2 M. 4.[7-14]) had supplanted his brother Onias in the office of High Priest, was quite willing to introduce Greek fashions and pagan manners into Jerusalem, and generally to fall in with the designs of Antiochus to unify his widely spread dominions on the basis of a common Hellenic culture and local self-government. From Jerusalem he sent special deputies of the Jews—whom, to humour Antiochus, he called Antiochians—to Tyre to take part in the games in honour of Hercules as the national god, a practice that was regularly followed by the cities that had been founded as colonies from Tyre.

HIEREEL (1 Es. 9.[21]). In Ez. 10.[21] the name is "Jehiel."

HIEREMOTH. (1) 1 Es. 9.[27], corresponding to "Jeremoth" in Ez. 10.[26]. (2) 1 Es. 9.[30], corresponding to "Jeremoth" in Ez. 10.[29] (AV. "Ramoth").

HIERIELUS, RV. JEZRIELUS (1 Es. 9.[27]), corresponding to "Jehiel" in Ez. 10.[26].

HIERMAS (1 Es. 9.[26]), corresponding to "Ramiah" in Ez. 10.[25].

HIERONYMUS, one of the Syrian governors of a district in Palestine, under Antiochus Eupator. When, having come to an understanding with Judas Maccabæus, Lysias withdrew from the country, Hieronymus, along with others, continued to molest the Jews, "and would not suffer them to be at quiet, and live in peace" (2 M. 12.[2]).

HIRCANUS, RV. HYRCANUS, a son of Tobias, a man in very high place, who had a deposit in the Temple treasury, which, along with the rest of the treasure there, Heliodorus wished to confiscate, but was prevented by a vision (2 M. 3.[11ff.]). It is possible that he may be identical with the Hyrcanus of whom Josephus has much to tell. This latter was son of Joseph, a farmer of taxes for Ptolemy, and grandson of Tobias. It is not uncommon for a man to be called the "son" of his grandfather (Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 6ff.). Disagreeing with his brethren, Hyrcanus fixed his residence beyond the Jordan, and collected the taxes in that district for the Egyptian government. He built a stronghold and palace, with an elaborate system of caves, for security against attack by his brethren, the splendour of which is attested by the remains at 'Arāq el-Emir, c. 12 miles W. of 'Ammān, on the W. bank of Wādy eṣ-Ṣīr. After the death of Ptolemy V., fearing the hostile power of Antiochus Eupator, Hyrcanus committed suicide. His palace was left to go to ruin, and no attempt was ever made to restore it.

HOLOFERNES, chief captain of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Nineveh, was commissioned to wage war on the west country, and to receive from the inhabitants earth and water, the usual tokens of complete submission. In the book of Judith, which is our only source of information regarding H., the expedition seems to have been undertaken to compel men everywhere to worship Nebuchadnezzar. In its course H. reaches Judæa and besieges Bethulia, a name which means "the virgin of Jehovah," and seems to favour the view of those who allegorise the book of Judith and attach a symbolic meaning to the names. In their difficulties the Jews secure the approaches to the city and betake themselves to fasting and prayer; while H., though instructed in the history of the Jews and what their God had done for them, despises God, resolves to continue the siege, and is actually promised submission by the governors in five days. Meanwhile Judith, a beautiful, rich, pious, and patriotic widow, undertakes to deliver the city, but declines (8.^{34}) to disclose her methods to the governors. Her actions are described in the eighth and following chapters of the book. She cuts off the head of H., and the Assyrians are routed and slain. There are grave objections to the historical character of the book in which these events are narrated; but even on the supposition that the book of Judith was a composition of religious fiction of the days of the struggle for Jewish independence, the description of the fate of a great persecutor of the Jews cannot fail to have been of service in inspiring with courage the champions of national and religious freedom. The H. of Shakespeare and Rabelais has nothing but the name in common with H. of the book of Judith.

HORSE-LITTER, RV. LITTER, a palanquin in wh. an invalid might travel (2 M. 9.^{8}).

HYDASPES, a river mentioned in Jth. 1.^{6} along with the Euphrates and the Tigris as descriptive of the region from which was drawn a portion of the forces levied by Nebuchadnezzar for his great war against Arphaxad, king of the Medes. The Hydaspes of the ancient geographers is identified with the Jhelum, one of the principal rivers of the Punjab, which Horace described by the epithet "fabulosus," referring doubtless to the many travellers' tales and poetical fictions recorded of it; but as this has been considered too remote to supply a contingent to Nebuchadnezzar's force, it has been proposed in Jth. 1.^{6} to substitute Choaspes, a river in Susiana, as Grotius suggested Ionia for India and Mysia for Media in 1 M. 8.^{8}.

HYRCANUS. (1) John (see MACCABEES). (2) See HIRCANUS.

I

IADINUS. See ADINUS.

IDUEL (1 Es. 8.^{43}), called "Ariel" in Ez. 8.^{16}, through confusion of ר and ד.

IDUMÆA, IDUMÆANS. See EDOM in Canonical Section.

IEDDIAS. See EDDIAS.

ILIADUN. See ELIADUN.

IMALCUE, AV. SIMALCUE, an Arabian prince in whose care Alexander Balas left his young son Antiochus (1 M. 11.^{39}). Tryphon with difficulty persuaded him to part with the child (v. 40), whom as Antiochus VI. he had crowned king of Syria (vv. 54ff.). Josephus (Ant. XIII. v. 1) gives the name as Malchus. Diodorus calls him Jamblichus (Müller, Fragm. Hist. Gr. ii., xvii., note 21). The same writer, however, says that Antiochus was in charge of Diocles, prince of Abæ, in Arabia (op. cit. note 20).

IONIA is practically an ethnological rather than a geographical term: it indicates the district of the Greek settlements on the extreme west coast of Asia Minor, lying between the Æolic settlements on the north and the Dorian settlements on the south. Phocæa was its most northern and Miletus its most southern point. From N. to S. it extended in a straight line about 100 miles, though Ptolemy, the geographer, would confine it to the narrower limits of the territory between the Hermus and the Mæander, thus excluding both Phocæa and Miletus. It extended not more than a few miles inland, and contained these twelve cities: Phocæa, Erythræ, Clazomenæ, Teos, Lebedos, Colophon, Ephesus, Priene, Myus, Miletus, (the islands) Chios, and Samos. About B.C. 700 Smyrna became a part of Ionia. Each of these was a Greek city-state. Collectively they formed a sort of confederacy which had regular meetings, perhaps for games and for religious rather than political purposes. The cities were prosperous, and took a leading part in the intellectual life of Greece. Ionia for India and Mysia for Media in 1 M. 8.^{8} are generally accepted as good emendations of the traditional text.

IRI, RV. URIAS, wh. see.

ISDAEL, RVm. GIDDEL (1 Es. 5.^{33}), called "Giddel" in Ez. 2.^{56}.

ISMAEL. (1) RV. ISHMAEL (Jth. 2.^{23}), the son of Abraham by Hagar. (2) (1 Es. 9.^{22}), corresponding to "Ishmael" in Ez. 10.^{22}.

ISMAERUS, AV. OMAERUS (1 Es. 9.^{34}), corresponding to "Amram" in Ez. 10.^{34}.

ISTALCURUS. This name in 1 Es. 8.^{40} corresponds to "Zabbud" (EVm. "Zaccur") in Ez. 8.^{14}. It may be a corruption of Zaccur.

IVY is mentioned only in 2 M. 6.^{7}. The worshippers of Bacchus (DIONYSUS) were accustomed to wear wreaths of ivy in honour of this deity, to whom the plant was sacred. Part of the oppression of Antiochus Epiphanes was to compel the Jews, when the feast of Bacchus came, "to go in procession in honour of Bacchus, wearing wreaths of ivy." It was of ivy or of pine that the "corruptible crown" was made, for which the competitors strove in the famous Isthmian games (1 Cor. 9.^{25}).

J

JACUBUS (1 Es. 9.^{48}), corresponding to "Akkub" in Ne. 8.^{7}.

JADDUS. See Addus.

JAIRUS. (1) The father of Mordecai (Est. Ad. 11.^{2}), called "Jair" in Est. 2.^{5}. (2) AV. AIRUS, wh. see.

JAMBRI. In 1 M. 9.$^{36\text{-}41}$ "the children of Jambri" are said to have come from the town of Medaba and to have made an attack upon John, the brother of Jonathan, who succeeded Judas Maccabæus as leader of the Jews. John was killed, but was avenged by his brother Jonathan, as narrated in the passage cited. The Jambri are not mentioned elsewhere. In Josephus (Ant. XIII. i. 2) they are called the "sons of Amaræus." The true reading is probably Amri (Omri), a form found in 1 K. 16.^{22}. Some have suggested "sons of the Amorites" as the original reading, and make it refer to some family of Amorites who in early times had occupied the town Medaba.

JAMNIA (1 M. 4.^{15}, &c.), identical with the ancient Jabneel, wh. see in Canonical Section.

JAMNITES (2 M. 12.^{9}), the inhabitants of Jamnia.

JARIB, RV. JOARIB, ancestor of Mattathias (1 M. 14.^{29}).

JARIMOTH (1 Es. 9.^{28}), called "Jeremoth" in Ez. 10.^{27}.

JASAEL, RV. JASAELUS (1 Es. 9.^{30}), called "Sheal" in Ez. 10.^{29}.

JASON. This Greek name was used by Hellenising Jews as the equivalent of Joshua or Jesus, as the Greek Simon was taken as the equivalent of the Heb. Simeon. (1) The son of Eleazer (cp. Sr. 50.^{27}), one of the envoys sent by Judas Maccabæus to Rome to arrange an agreement with the Romans, B.C. 161 (1 M. 8.^{17}; Ant. XII. x. 6). He is probably to be identified with (2), the father of Antipater, who acted as an ambassador of Jonathan to Rome, B.C. 144 (1 M. 12.^{16}, 14.^{22}; Ant. XIII. v. 8). (3) Jason of Cyrene wrote "in five books" a history of "the things concerning Judas Maccabæus and his brethren, and the purification of the great Temple, and further the wars against Antiochus Epiphanes and Eupator his son," &c. This work the writer of 2 Maccabees assayed "to abridge in one work" (2 M. 2.$^{19\text{ff.}}$). Nothing further is known about this historian. (4) Second son of Simon II. and brother of Onias III. He was a leading spirit among the Hellenising Jews: originally called Jesus, he adopted the Greek name Jason (Ant. XII. v. 1). A large bribe purchased the favour of Antiochus Epiphanes, and he was made High Priest instead of his brother, B.C. 175 (2 M. 4.$^{7\text{-}17}$; 4 M. 4.$^{15\text{-}20}$). He bent all his energies to introduce Greek manners and customs, and met with great success, overthrowing "the lawful modes of life" and bringing in "new customs forbidden by the law." Below the Acropolis in Jerusalem he erected a gymnasium and ephebeion, the exercises in which proved so attractive that for them even the priests neglected their sacred duties. Being ashamed of it, they sought to hide the distinguishing mark of their Jewish nationality (1 M. 1.^{15}). He sent a deputation to the Tyrian games in honour of Hercules. These men, however, decided that the contribution they carried, which was designed for the sacrifice of Hercules, should be devoted to the "equipment of the galleys" (2 M. 4.$^{18\text{ff.}}$). He held his position for three years; and then Menelaus, his messenger to Antiochus, by means of a bribe secured his own appointment as High Priest. Jason, being deposed, and in danger, fled to the Ammonites. He made one abortive attempt to drive out his rival, encouraged by a rumour that Antiochus was dead (2 M. 5.$^{5\text{ff.}}$). It is in a tone of exultation that the writer recounts the subsequent distresses of this "vile Jason," fleeing to the Ammonites again, then to Aretas the Arabian, then to Egypt: finally he went to the Lacedæmonians, "as thinking to find shelter there because they were near of kin," and there "he met with a miserable end."

JASUBUS (1 Es. 9.^{30}), called "Jashub" in Ez. 10.^{29}.

JATAL, AV. ATAR, wh. see.

JATHAN (To. 5.^{13}), AV. JONATHAS, wh. see.

JECHONIAS. (1) The Greek form of the name of Jeconiah the king (Est. Ad. 11.^{4}; Ba. 1.$^{3,\,9}$). (2) (1 Es. 8.^{92}), called "Shecaniah" in Ez. 10.^{2}.

JECONIAS. (1) One of the "captains over thousands" who made great gifts of sheep and calves at the Passover of Josiah (1 Es. 1.^{9}), called "Conaniah" in 2 Ch. 35.^{9}. (2) This name appears in 1 Es. 1.^{34} RVm. for "Joachaz" in the text.

JEDEUS (1 Es. 9.^{30}), called "Adaiah" in Ez. 10.^{29}.

JEELI (1 Es. 5.^{33}), called "Jaalah" in Ez. 2.^{56}; "Jaala" in Ne. 7.^{58}.

JEELUS (1 Es. 8.^{92}), called "Jehiel" in Ez. 10.^{2}.

JEMNAAN, a city named between Ocina (Acho) and Azotus (Ashdod), on the coast of Palestine, as having surrendered to Holofernes (Jth. 2.^{28}, 3.$^{1\text{ff.}}$). No doubt Jamnia is intended.

JERECHUS RV. JERECHU (1 Es. 5.^{22}), called "Jericho" in Ez. 2.^{34}; Ne. 7.^{36}.

JEREMIAS. (1) A son of Bani who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.^{34}), corresponding to "Jere-mai" in Ez. 10.[33]. (2) The prophet Jeremiah (Sr. 49.[6], &c., RV. JEREMIAH).

JEREMIEL, AV. URIEL, the archangel who answered the questions of the righteous souls (2 Es. 4.[36]).

JEREMY (1 Es. 1.[28], &c.), a form of the name of Jeremiah the prophet.

JESIAS (1 Es. 8.[33]), AV. JOSIAS, wh. see.

JESSUE, RV. JESUS (1 Es. 5.[26]), called "Jeshua" in Ez. 2.[40].

JESU, RV. JESUS (1 Es. 8.[63]), called "Jeshua" in Ez. 8.[33].

JESUS, the Greek form of the Heb. name Joshua, itself a contraction from Jehoshua. (1) JOSHUA the son of Nun (1 M. 1.[55], &c., RV. "Joshua"). (2) Jeshua the High Priest (1 Es. 5.[5], &c.); see JESHUA in Canonical Section. (3) Jeshua the Levite (1 Es. 5.[26], RV. &c.; cp. Ez. 2.[40]). (4) The son of Sirach; see ECCLESIASTICUS.

JEZELUS. (1) (1 Es. 8.[32]), called "Jehaziel" in Ez. 8.[5]. (2) (1 Es. 8.[35]), called "Jehiel" in Ez. 8.[9].

JEZRIELUS, AV. HIERIELUS, wh. see.

JOACHAZ (1 Es. 1.[34]), JEHOAHAZ, son of Josiah.

JOACHIM, RV. JOAKIM. (1) (Ba. 1.[3]), JEHOIAKIM, king of Judah. (2) A High Priest, son of Chelcias (Ba. 1.[7]).

JOACIM, RV. JOAKIM, wh. see.

JOAKIM. (1) King of Judæa and Jerusalem (shortened from Jehoiakim, 1 Es. 1.[37-39]). (2) Son of (1): (1 Es. 1.[43]). (3) A priest wrongly called son of Zerubbabel in 1 Es. 5.[5]: he was really son of Jeshua (Ne. 12.[10, 26]), where he is mentioned in the same connection as in 1 Esdras, i.e. in the list of Levites and priests who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel. (4) The High Priest who was in Jerusalem in the days of Judith (Jth. 4.[6, 14]), and who, along with "the ancients of the children of Israel," welcomed Judith back to the city after the death of Holofernes. The absence of this name from the official list of High Priests in 1 Ch. 6. (Jos. Ant. X. viii. 6), and the impossibility of identifying it with any one in the list or with any historical person, tend towards establishing the fictional character of the book of Judith. The name means "the Lord hath set up," and is probably symbolical, like other names mentioned in the book. (5) The husband of Susanna (Su. 1.[1ff.]), probably here also a symbolical name.

JOADANUS (1 Es. 9.[19]). The name corresponding to this in Ez. 10.[18] is "Gedaliah."

JOANAN (1 Es. 9.[1]), RV. JONAS, called "Johanan" (RV. "Jehohanan") in Ez. 10.[6].

JOANNAN, RV. JOHN, surnamed "Caddis," the eldest brother of Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 2.[2]). See MACCABEES.

JOANNES, AV. JOHANNES, wh. see.

JOARIB, RV. JARIB, wh. see.

JOAZABDUS, RV. JOZABDUS (1 Es. 9.[48]), called "Josabad" in Ne. 8.[7].

JODA (1 Es. 5.[58]), called "Judah" in Ez. 3.[9]; "Hodaviah" in Ez. 2.[40]; "Hodevah" in Ne. 7.[43]; and "Sudias" in 1 Es. 5.[26].

JOHANNES, RV. JOANNES. (1) Chief of the sons of Astath; son of Acatan (1 Es. 8.[38]), called "Johanan" in Ez. 8.[12]. (2) A son of Bebai (1 Es. 9.[29]), called "Jehohanan" in Ez. 10.[28].

JOHN. (1) The father of Mattathias, grandfather of Judas Maccabæus and his brothers (1 M. 2.[1]). (2) John, surnamed Caddis, the eldest son of Mattathias (1 M. 2.[2], &c.); see MACCABEES. (3) The father of Eupolemus, an envoy sent to Rome by Judas (1 M. 8.[17]; 2 M. 4.[11]; Ant. XII. x. 6). (4) John Hyrcanus, son of Simon the Maccabee (1 M. 13.[53], 16.[1]); see MACCABEES. (5) One of the two envoys sent to treat with Lysias (2 M. 11.[17]).

JONAS. (1) (1 Es. 9.[23]), corresponding to "Eliezer" in Ez. 10.[23]. (2) The prophet Jonah (2 Es. 1.[39]; To. 14.[4,8]). (3) (1 Es. 9.[1]), AV. JOANAN, wh. see.

JONATHAN. (1) See MACCABEES. (2) Father of Obeth (1 Es. 8.[32] = Ez. 8.[6]). (3) The son of Azael, concerned with Ezra in the matter of putting down marriage with foreign women (1 Es. 9.[14] = Ez. 10.[15]). (4) Son of Absalom (1 M. 13.[11]), possibly brother of Mattathias (11.[70]), sent by Simon the Maccabee to seize Joppa. (5) A priest who led in the prayer after the recovery of the sacred fire (2 M. 1.[23]).

JONATHAS, the Latin form of the Heb. Jonathan. Jonathan was brother of Ananias, and son of "that great Samaias" (To. 5.[13]).

JORAM, one of the "captains of thousands" (1 Es. 1.[9]), corresponding to "Jozabad" in 2 Ch. 35.[9].

JORIBAS, RV. JORIBUS. (1) (1 Es. 8.[44]), called "Jarib" in Ez. 8.[16].

JORIBUS (1 Es. 9.[19]), called "Jarib" in Ez. 10.[18].

JOSABAD, RV. JOSABDUS. (1) (1 Es. 8.[63]), called "Jozabad" in Ez. 8.[33]. (2) A son of Bebai (1 Es. 9.[29]), called "Zabbai" in Ez. 10.[28].

JOSAPHIAS (1 Es. 8.[36]), called "Josiphiah" in Ez. 8.[10].

JOSEDEC, RV. JOSEDEK, the father of Jesus (1 Es. 5.[5], RV. "Jeshua"), called "Josedech" in Hg. 1.[1].

JOSEPH. (1) Son of Zacharias, who, with Azarias, was defeated by Gorgias (1 M. 5.[56ff.]). (2) A mistake for "John" (2 M. 8.[22], 10.[19]). (3) An ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.[1]). He appears as Judith's great-grandfather.

JOSEPHUS (1 Es. 9.[34]), corresponding to "Joseph" in Ez. 10.[42].

JOSIAS. (1) (1 Es. 1.[1], &c.), JOSIAH, king of Judah. (2) RV. JESIAS (1 Es. 8.[33]), corresponding to "Jeshaiah," the son of Athaliah (Ez. 8.[7]).

JOZABAD (1 Es. 9.[23]), RV. JOZABDUS = "Jozabad" in Ez. 10.[22].

JOZABDUS. (1) See JOZABAD. (2) (1 Es. 9.[29]), see JOSABAD. (3) See JOAZABDUS.

JUDAS. (1) A Levite (1 Es. 9.[23]). (2) Maccabæus, the third son of Mattathias (1 M. 2.[4]); see MACCABEES. (3) One of the two officers of Jonathan, "Judas the son of Calphi," who supported him when others fled, in battle with the Syrians at Hazor (1 M. 11.[70]; Ant. XIII. v. 7). (4) A man of distinction in Jerusalem associated with the Senate in sending a letter to Aristobulus (2 M. 1.[10]). Some think Judas Maccabæus is intended. Others would identify him with a prophet of the Essenes (Ant. XIII. xi. 2; BJ. I. iii. 5). (5) A son of Simon the Maccabee (1 M. 16.[2]). He with his brother John Hyrcanus fought against Cendebæus, when he was wounded (1 M. 16.[1ff.]; Ant. XIII. vii. 3). He was murdered by his brother-in-law, Ptolemy, at Dok (1 M. 16.[11ff.]; cp. Ant. XIII. viii. 1; BJ. I. ii. 3f.).

JUDITH, THE BOOK OF. Among the apocryphal writings in Hebrew literature there is none more interesting than Judith, or the narrative of the deliverance of Palestine by the agency of a great Judæan heroine. To regard the work, however, as other than only romantic fiction, or even to rank it as a historical novel of a type cognate to those of Walter Scott or Alexandre Dumas, in which the main incidents are based on actual occurrences, would be to misunderstand entirely alike the aim and the character of the book. Belonging as it does to the class of Hebrew writings that are technically known as the "Haggadah," or in other words, "romantic story," its incidents are laid, as regards time, during the invasion of Syria and Palestine by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria, or as the text puts it, "in the twelfth year of the reign of Nabuchodonosor, who reigned in Nineveh, the great city"; and as regards place, before the presumably imaginary, or at least the otherwise unknown fortress of Bethulia, situate in the hill-country over against Esdraelon, where, as the story says, there was a passage into Judæa thro' a defile so narrow, that two men could bar the progress of an army.

Nebuchadnezzar, having overthrown Arphaxad, the Median king of Ecbatana, had his youthful imagination fired by promptings to conquer those wealthy and warlike nations lying between Persia and Egypt who had refused to make common cause with him against Ecbatana, or, as the text says, "that he should avenge himself on all the earth." He assembled a great army, over which he placed his chief captain, Holofernes, and ordered him "to destroy all flesh that did not obey the commandment of his mouth." After Western Asia has been overrun the conquering hordes reach Judæa. The High Priest Joakim, in Jerusalem, writing to the elders of the city of Bethulia, besought them to bar the passage of the Assyrian general. This they determine to do, and Holofernes, when he comes to Bethulia, finds the pass so strongly guarded that he cannot break through. Accordingly he in turn besieges the town, investing it so straitly that no provisions can reach it and even its water supply is cut off. Great distress begins to prevail in Bethulia. The people clamour for surrender, and are so insistent that at last the "elders" or "ancients" of the place agree that, if relief does not come in five days, they will hand over the fort with the pass and the town to Holofernes.

Meantime Judith, a young widow of surpassing beauty and great piety, resolves to attempt the release of her country from the impending oppression. Attended only by her maid, she goes to the camp of the young Assyrian general, pretending that she had secrets to reveal to him which would betray not only Bethulia but Jerusalem into his hands.

Holofernes received her, and after she had revealed her plans, which pleased him greatly, he insisted upon her remaining with him in the camp, for he had fallen deeply in love with her. With pretended reluctance she consented, on condition that she was allowed to leave the camp each night in order to pray to God and to perform her ceremonial washings. Holofernes became more enamoured of her every hour, and at last ordered a sumptuous banquet to be prepared, at which only he and she were to be present. At this he drank a great deal of wine, finally falling into a drunken sleep. This was Judith's opportunity. With his own sword she cut off the head of Holofernes, and then as usual proceeded to go outside the camp, presumably, as before, for prayer and ablutions. The sentinels, having received their instructions to permit her to pass, offered no objection. This time, however, she passed out towards the beleaguered city, carrying with her the head of the slaughtered Assyrian general. A few minutes later she was safe within the gates of the town, showing her ghastly trophy and assuring the "elders" they were free. Her words were confirmed. Next morning, as soon as daylight revealed the terrible spectacle that was visible in the general's tent, the camp broke up in confusion, and the army retreated precipitately to Nineveh. Judith, by her slaughter of Holofernes, had saved her country.

Such is the outline of the story, the aim of which was evidently to encourage and stimulate the Jewish nation in its struggle against oppression and alien influences, by the record of past successes and deliverances. The actual history of the Hebrew nation in the past, however, was not of a kind calculated to assist the writer by supplying him with a fund of fact upon which he could draw. If we except the narrative of David's conquests and triumph, and the overthrow of Sennacherib, the history of Israel was rather one of defeat and servitude, culminating, as Prof. Sayce says, "in the fall of the Davidic monarchy and the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar." A new history, therefore, had to be supplied, a history sublimated by imagination and idealised by Haggadah, in which the tyrants and the conquerors of history and of tradition exchanged natures and characters like the changing colours of a kaleidoscope. Character was altered as need demanded, distinctions of time and place were obliterated in the atmosphere of the Haggadah, past and present being virtually merged in one.

As to the date of composition, Professor Sayce assigns it to the Maccabæan age (B.C. 160–140), but wisely refrains from being too specific. For Tobit and Judith alike, however, internal evidence points to a date about the middle of the great Maccabæan epoch. Professor H. T. Andrews and other scholars incline to a later date—one subsequent to the Roman invasion of B.C. 63.

The outstanding characteristics of the book are a warm patriotism, which strives to utilise every means available to impress on Jewish men and women the necessity for scrupulous observance of all the requirements of the ceremonial law (8.[1-9]). Stress, therefore, is laid by Judith on her ablutions being a part of her worship (12.[7-9]); her religion, moreover, is stated to consist in large degree in the unbroken regularity of her fastings (8.[6]), also in the scrupulous care she showed in avoiding all unclean meats (10.[5], 12.[2]), while she remarks to Holofernes that the city will be taken because its inhabitants will be forced by famine to offend God by eating unclean food (11.[11-19]). Great respect, in addition, is paid to the recently restored Temple service, and horror is expressed at the prospect of renewed profanation of the vessels in the House of God by the touch of heathen barbarians (4.[3], 5.[18, 19], 8.[6]). Jerome states that Judith was originally written in Aramaic, but Sayce (Temple Apocrypha) considers it more likely that the original language was Hebrew, the Aramaic and Greek versions being translations. Judith does not appear to have been known to Josephus, but, on the other hand, it was regarded as part of the OT. Canon, and was therefore accepted as canonical by the early Christian Church, along with those other books of the Apocrypha which found a place in the Septuagint. From the latter they naturally found their way into the Latin versions. OLIPHANT SMEATON.

JUEL. (1) (1 Es. 9.[34]), called "Uel" in Ez. 10.[34]. (2) 1 Es. 9.[35], called "Joel" in Ez. 10.[43].

K

KARIATHIARIUS, AV. KIRIATHIARIUS (1 Es. 5.[19], RVm. "Kiriath-arim or Kiriath-jearim") = "Kirjath-jearim" in Ne. 7.[29].

KERAS, AV. CERAS, wh. see.

KETAB, AV. CETAB, wh. see.

KIDRON, AV. CEDRON, wh. see.

KILAN, AV. CEILAN, wh. see.

KIRIATHIARIUS, RV. KARIATHIARIUS, wh. see.

KISEUS, AV. CISAI, wh. see.

KONÆ, AV. "the villages" (Jth. 4.[4]). Konæ represents the Greek κωνά, wh., if correct, may be identical with CYAMON. Some MSS. have κόμας, from wh. comes AV. "the villages."

L

LABANA (1 Es. 5.[29]), called "Lebanah" in Ez. 2.[45].

LACCUNUS, AV. LACUNUS, wh. see.

LACEDÆMONIANS. In 1 M. 12., 14., 15., and in 2 M. 5.[9], mention is made of certain correspondence and alliance between the Jews and the Lacedæmonians on the ground among others of common descent from Abraham (1 M. 12.[5-23]). What the kinship with Abraham, first claimed by Areus, king of the Lacedæmonians, may mean it is impossible to say. The claim may be the result of some ethnological error, and may have been assumed from the similarity of the names Pelasgi and Peleg, son of Eber (Gn. 10.[25], 11.[16]). The league of friendship is stated (1 M. 12.[20]) to have been originally formed between Areus, king of the Lacedæmonians, and Onias, the High Priest of the Jews, to each of whom, however, it is difficult to assign precise and at the same time mutually consistent dates. It was renewed (c. B.C. 144) by Jonathan (1 M. 12.[5-18]), and again by Simon (1 M. 14.[16-23]), after the death of Jonathan. As against Syrian Hellenism the patriotic Jews wished to show that they had the support of distinguished Greeks, but as against the material force of Syria it is possible that the Jews attached an exaggerated importance to a Spartan alliance. They judged from the distinguished position of Sparta in earlier Greek history, while in the days of the Maccabees the strength of Sparta was practically negligeable. The mention of the name in 1 M. 15.[23] indicates the existence of a Jewish settlement in Sparta, and there seems to be no reason at all to doubt the facts of the alliance and of the correspondence, though there is a difficulty in reconciling all the particulars. The correspondence is given at considerably greater length in Josephus (Ant. XII. iv. 10, XIII. v. 8, XIV. xii. 22) than in the books of the Maccabees.

LACUNUS, RV. LACCUNUS, one who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[31]). The name, wh. does not appear in Ez. 10.[30], may have arisen from taking the final l of Chelal with the following Benaiah, and mistaking the ב in Benaiah for כ.

LADAN, RV. DALAN, head of a family whose genealogy was lost (1 Es. 5.[37]), called "Delaiah" in Ez. 2.[60]; Ne. 7.[62].

LADDER OF TYRE. Antiochus VI., son of Alexander Balas, made Simon the brother of Jonathan "captain from the Ladder of Tyre unto the borders of Egypt" (1 M. 11.[59]; Ant. XIII. v. 4). Josephus, speaking of the mountains that encompass the plain of Ptolemais (Acre), says "that on the north is the highest of them all, and is called by the people of the country, 'the Ladder of the Tyrians,' which is at a distance of a hundred furlongs" (BJ. II. x. 2). The name clearly did not apply to any one of the three promontories, Rās el-Musheirifeh, Rās en-Naqūrah, and Rās el-Abyad, by which the mountain on the north breaks down upon the shore, none of which answers the description of Josephus as regards height. He must have intended the mountain itself, with this succession of headlands which had to be scaled by one approaching Tyre from the south. These rocky spurs drop from a considerable height precipitously into the sea. In ancient times a path was cut in the face of the cliffs, steps being hewn at different points to facilitate the ascent. This path is serviceable still, and is largely used despite its somewhat dangerous character in parts. It must always have been easy of defence. The mountain formed a natural division between the Phœnician plain and that to the south.

LAMPSACUS, RVm. (1 M. 15.[23]), EV. SAMPSAMES, wh. see.

LASTHENES. The titles of honour bestowed on this officer of Demetrius II., Nicator, show that he held high position. He is called "cousin" (1 M. 11.[31]) and "father" (v. 32) of the king. These do not imply any blood relationship, but indicate distinguished rank. A native of Crete, he raised a band of mercenaries, and rendered effective service to Demetrius in wresting the throne of Syria from Alexander Balas (1 M. 10.[67]; Ant. XIII. iv. 3). Demetrius probably gave Lasthenes the governorship of Cœle Syria. To him the king sent the letter granting to Jonathan remission of taxes (1 M. 11.[30ff]; Ant. XIII. iv. 9). Some have thought that Lasthenes may have been the favourite whose counsels exercised such baleful influence upon Demetrius (Diod Exc. xxxii. p. 592).

LESSAU. See Dessau.

LETTUS. See Attus.

LEVIS (1 Es. 9.[14]) is properly "the Levite"; cp. Ez. 10.[15], "Shabbethai the Levite" for "Levis and Sabbateus."

LIBANUS (1 Es. 4.[48], 5.[55]; Jth. 1.[7], &c.), the Greek form of Lebanon.

LODDEUS, AV. SADDEUS, wh. see.

LOTHASUBUS, one of those who stood by Ezra at the reading of the law (1 Es. 9.[44]), called "Hashum" in Ne. 8.[4].

LOZON (1 Es. 5.[33]), head of a family of Solomon's servants, called "Darkon" in Ez. 2.[56]; Ne. 7.[58].

LUCIUS, a Roman consul who is said (1 M. 15.[16]) to have written to Ptolemy Euergetes the letter which assured Simon, the High Priest, of the protection of Rome. The most probable identification of the name has been with Calpurnius Piso, who was one of the consuls in B.C. 139. The Romans, while securing the establishment of their power in Asia, naturally made use of the kings of Egypt and also of the Jews to counterbalance the power of Syria: hence the readiness of the Romans to enter into an alliance with both. In mentioning only the prænomen of the Roman consul the writer of 1 M. shows his want of knowledge of Roman practice, as he does of Spartan practice in the introduction to his narrative of the Spartan alliance and correspondence with the Jews (1 M. 12.[20], 14.[20]).

LUTE, AV. HARP (1 M. 4.[54]). See Music in Canonical Section.

LYCIA, one of the states to which letters favourable to the Jews were sent by the Consul Lucius (1 M. 15.[23]). See Lycia in Canonical Section.

LYDIA is mentioned as one of the countries taken from Antiochus and given to Eumenes by the Romans (1 M. 8.[8]). See Lydia in Canonical Section.

LYSIAS, "a noble man and one of the blood royal" of Syria (1 M. 3.[32]). On the departure of Antiochus Epiphanes into Persia (c. B.C. 166) to collect in person the revenue which was not coming in satisfactorily, L. was entrusted with the guardianship of his son Antiochus Eupator, and with the government of the country as far as Egypt and Lower Asia, with special instructions (Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 2) "to conquer Judea, take its inhabitants for slaves, utterly destroy Jerusalem, and abolish the whole nation." With this object L. sent a large force under Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, Nicanor, and Gorgias against Judas Maccabæus, who defeated two divisions of it under Nicanor and Gorgias, near Emmaus, and in the following year (B.C. 165) L. himself at Bethsura (1 M. 4.). Antiochus died while on his Persian expedition (B.C. 164), and L., who acted as regent during the minority of the young prince, collected another large army at Antioch, re-captured Bethsura, and was besieging Jerusalem when he learned of the approach of Philip, to whom Antiochus, on his deathbed (1 M. 6.[15]), had given the guardianship of his son. He defeated Philip and was supported at Rome; but in the following year he fell with his ward Antiochus into the hands of Demetrius I., by whom both were put to death (1 M. 7.[1, 23]).

LYSIMACHUS, brother of Menelaus, who had supplanted his brother (according to Josephus) Jason, who had previously supplanted his brother Onias in the office of High Priest. The accounts in Jos. (Ant. XII. v. 1) and 2 M. 4.[29] differ. According to Josephus, Simon had three sons, no mention being made of L. among them. In 2 M. 4.[29] L. is the brother of Menelaus, who was the brother of Simon. When Menelaus was summoned to Antioch to answer a charge of malversation, he left his brother L. in his stead in the priesthood. L. robbed the Temple and thus provoked an insurrection, in which he met his death at the hands of the mob beside the treasury (2 M. 4.[42]). See MENELAUS.

M

MAANI. (1) RV. BAANI, wh. see. (2) See MEANI.

MAASEAS, AV. MAASIAS, grandfather of Baruch (Ba. 1.[1]), called "Maaseiah" in Jr. 32.[12], 51.[59].

MAASMAS, AV. MASMAN (1 Es. 8.[43]), corresponding to "Shemaiah" in Ez. 8.[16].

MABDAI, RV. MAMDAI (1 Es. 9.[34]), corresponding to "Benaiah" in Ez. 10.[35].

MACALON (1 Es. 5.[21]), called "Michmas" in Ez. 2.[27] = MICHMASH.

MACCABEES, the family of Mattathias.

(1) Judas Maccabæus (Gr. makkabaios, "the hammerer," probably from Heb. maqqābāh, "hammer"), the great hero of post-exilic Judaism, grew up in an age when the soil of Judæa was red with the blood of martyrs. Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria (B.C. 175–164) was attempting to enforce Hellenism throughout his empire; and while many Jews responded to the fascinations of Greek thought and custom, the faithful to the law, or Ḥasīdīm, united in a loyal opposition to pagan influence which, passive as it was, drew down the Syrian king's severest vengeance. Thousands "were tortured, not accepting deliverance," or fled to the wilderness, there to be hunted out and defencelessly slain. Their spiritual strength was dauntless; but their resistance was passive only, and the swift scythe of temporal power mowed them down. Would there never be a time when "the people that knew their God" should be strong and do?

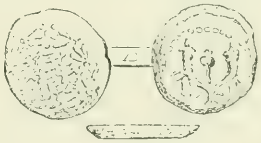
It was an action of Mattathias Asmonæus, an aged priest, the father of Judas and his four brethren, which gave the first answer to this question. Called to offer the first heathen sacrifice at his native town of Modin (whither he had fled from Jerusalem), he not only refused, but slew the king's commissioner and a renegade Jew who approached with an offering; then, raising the standard of revolt, he and his sons and numerous followers betook themselves to the mountains, whence their daring night-raids and skirmishes, overthrowing pagan altars, and punishing apostates, spread terror far and near. In B.C. 166, after about a year of this guerilla warfare, Mattathias died, leaving to Judas Maccabæus the responsibility of leadership against the foe.

Early Battles of Judas.—At first Judas only continued his father's tactics; but his rare military genius brought the penalty of its success; large forces moved against him. It was not long before he had contended victoriously with the Syrian general, Apollonius, and defeated Seron, a prince of the army of Syria, in the pass of Beth-horon.

The charge of avenging these unexpected triumphs was given to three experienced generals,



COPPER COIN OF JUDAS MACCABÆUS

The inscription reads:

יהוד	"Judah
הכהןגל	the illustrious priest
ולחבר	and friend of
היןהדים]	the Jews."

Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. With about three thousand ill-armed men, Judas prepared by prayer and fasting to encounter the imperial armies. Gorgias, meaning to surprise Judas by night, sought him among the hills; Judas, meanwhile, warned of the plan, descended to the plain, and under cover of darkness struck panic into the slumbering main body of the Syrian host. In the morning Gorgias, looking down wearied from the hills, saw the great camp on fire, and the Jews prepared to do him battle. His troops retreated in consternation, leaving enormous spoils to the victors.

The year following, Judas again achieved a victory at Beth-zur, which decided Lysias, the king's kinsman, who this time had led battle against him, to return to Antioch, there to recruit his forces on a still greater scale.

Judas used this time of respite to cleanse the desecrated Temple, and restore its worship. On 25th December B.C. 165, exactly three years after its pollution by dedication to Zeus (Dn. 11.[31]), the altar was re-consecrated, and the "Feast of the Dedication" then observed became a statutory observance in Israel (see Jn. 10.[22]).

During this time Judas and his brethren assumed the offensive against their enemies, the surrounding heathen tribes, rescuing oppressed Jews in Gilead and Galilee, and slaughtering all who opposed them. It was a moment when, after long patience, justice and judgment seemed within grasp of the strong arm; and in B.C. 164 unexpected tidings of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes quickened still further Maccabæan ambition. Judas made a bold attempt to capture the citadel of Akra (see JERUSALEM), to ensure free access to the Temple worshippers. But this action alarmed the Jewish Hellenising faction so much that they besought help from Antioch; and in response to this appeal, Lysias, taking with him the young king Antiochus V., advanced with a huge force, containing thirty-two elephants, against Beth-zur. Raising the siege of the citadel, Judas encountered the royal armies at Beth-zacharias, and there sustained his first defeat, and a great sorrow in the death of his youngest brother, Eleazar. But just at this critical juncture there was a new turn of affairs. Compelled to hasten back to Antioch, to overcome Demetrius, a rival there, Lysias quickly made terms with the Jews, granting them religious freedom, though still held in political subjection. On a sudden, the goal for which alone the pious had been struggling was attained.

The Later Battles of Judas.—Another figure now comes upon the scene—Alcimus, a descendant of Aaron's line, but Hellenistic in sympathy, who appears to have held the office of High Priest, but to have been removed from it for his pagan leanings, and who desired to be re-installed. To the new Syrian ruler, Demetrius, who was true heir to the throne (both Lysias and Antiochus V. having been vanquished by him and put to death), Alcimus appealed for assistance against Judas, and an army was sent into Judæa to instal the ex-High Priest in his office. At this point there emerges a fact of deep significance in the Maccabæan movement. To the party now known as the Maccabees the idea of the supreme Jewish authority being in league with Syria was abhorrent. But the Ḥasīdīm, if left in peace to walk in their own laws, had no quarrel with Syrian supremacy as such; and the descent and office of Alcimus covered a multitude of sins. Thus it was that, in his struggle for the fair dream of a free Jewish State, Judas had not the whole-hearted sympathy of the pious, and between them and the Maccabees a gulf gradually widened—a gulf which, later, excluded the name of Judas from the Mishna, and which during his remaining lifetime was bridged only by one solitary achievement—an achievement so brilliant as to overcome suspicion in a burst of joy and national pride. This was the victory gained at Adasa (13th March, B.C. 161) over Nicanor, a Syrian general who had blasphemously threatened to destroy the Temple if Judas were not delivered into his hands. The heathen army was routed, their leader slain; and this signal triumph of the "conquering hero" was long afterwards remembered as "Nicanor's Day." The story of Nicanor's downfall closes the glowing narrative of 2 Maccabees.

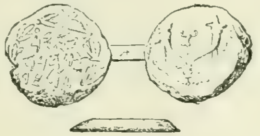
It was at this juncture that Judas, fearing the ultimate failure of Judæa to escape the Syrian yoke, attempted to conclude a treaty with the Romans, that their aid might be invoked when required. What exactly prompted the step, which cannot have found favour with the pious, is unknown; probably the picture report painted not merely of Roman prowess but of the Roman Senate suggested to a mind athirst for equity and freedom a pleasing contrast to Syrian autocracy. But the treaty, if concluded, remained inoperative. Not two months after Nicanor's overthrow fresh Syrian troops poured into Judæa, and Judas, with a sadly diminished band of followers, met them at Elasa (a place which has never been identified). Only 800 men stood by him, and even they were fain to retreat, seeing the overwhelming odds. But said Judas, "God forbid that I should do this thing and flee away from them: if our time be come, let us die manfully for our brethren, and let us not stain our honour. . . . Whereupon there was a sore battle, insomuch as many were slain on both parts. Judas also was killed, and the remnant fled" (1 M. 9.[9-18]).

Thus perished the noblest warrior of Judaism. A man born to command, with all the élan of true military genius (1 M. 3.[23]); a patriot, full of simple faith in God (2 M. 8.[16-23]), with bolder ambition and a farther outlook than the Judaism of his day (1 M. 8.[1-17]); lion-hearted, passionately in earnest (1 M. 3.[59]), he lives as one of the world's grandest types of that immortal spirit which is never absent from the making of great history.

> "O Freedom! Thou art not as poets dream.
> . . . A bearded man,
> Arm'd to the teeth, art thou: one mailèd hand
> Grasps the broad shield, and one the sword: thy brow,
> Glorious in beauty tho' it be, is scarr'd
> With tokens of old wars."

(2) Jonathan, surnamed "Apphus" (Gr. Ἀφφοῦς, Syr. Ḥappus = (?) "cunning"), brother of JUDAS MACCABÆUS, one of the five sons of Mattathias who inaugurated the Jewish revolt against Syrio-Hellenic tyranny, was the Maccabee on whom leadership devolved after the death of Judas in B.C. 151. His career was marked by diplomacy more than by greatness; its watchword rather skilful opportunism than "the help of God."

For a year following the death of Judas, Jonathan met only with misfortune: his brother John was treacherously slain; he was compelled to flee from the Syrian general Bacchides into the wilderness, and even there could barely maintain his own. But in B.C. 160 Alcimus the High Priest, the tool of the Syrian Government, died, and no successor in office was appointed. Two years of comparative peace followed, during which Jonathan's supporters grew so steadily in power and numbers that at length their enemies became alarmed, and implored help once more from Bacchides. Jonathan, however, was forewarned, and fortified himself so strongly at Beth-basi in the wilderness that Bacchides besieged the place in vain. Completely discomfited, and thoroughly weary of Judæa and its factions, the



Copper Coin of Jonathan
The inscription reads:

יהון	"Jonathan
תןהכה	the high priest
נדולחב	and friend of the Jews.
. . .

Syrian general turned in irritation to revenge himself upon the very party who had pled for his assistance. The diplomatic Jonathan had no sooner heard of this change in the situation than he sent ambassadors to Bacchides, " to the end that he should make peace with him, and deliver them the prisoners." Bacchides acceded to his demands, and then " went his way into his own land." The Maccabæan party was now in the ascendant. Jonathan " destroyed the ungodly men out of Israel "; and during six years he lived in peace at Michmash and there governed the people, reviving the ancient traditions of the judges.

So strong was Jonathan's authority that when in B.C. 152 Alexander, a pretended son of Antiochus V., put forth a claim to the Syrian throne, both he and king Demetrius made earnest efforts to secure Maccabæan support. Jonathan had no scruple about swearing amity with whichever of the two seemed likely to help him most in the furtherance of his own political schemes. Demetrius empowered him to raise an army. But Alexander went further, and bribed him with the vacant High-priesthood, which he immediately accepted, for he had coveted it long. He was of priestly descent (see 1 M. 2.[1]), and there was nothing strange to Jewish ideas in the combination of military leadership and priestly office; though the Ḥasīdīm looked askance at the conferring of such an honour on one not in the direct line of the High Priest. But neither Jonathan nor the nation had any cause to regret the alliance with Alexander, who was victorious over Demetrius, and continued to shower tokens of goodwill upon Judæa until his overthrow in 146. Events still favoured Jonathan, thanks to his daring and address, when Demetrius II. became king, and Judæa was confirmed in the enjoyment of her rights and privileges.

But one point yet remained, which Jonathan thirsted to win; and that was the removal of the Syrian garrison from the Akra at Jerusalem. Demetrius agreed to the demand, but failed to keep his promise. Jonathan accordingly went over to the side of Tryphon, a Syrian officer, who was ostensibly trying to set the son of Alexander on the throne, and in reality cherishing designs upon it himself. Jonathan and his brother Simon swept the country, making conquest after conquest over Demetrius on behalf of Tryphon; and thus " in the name of the Syrians clearing the Syrians out of Palestine." The crafty Tryphon scented danger, and invited Jonathan to visit him at Ptolemais, promising him the present of the city in reward for his services. The Maccabæan leader rashly obeyed the invitation, taking with him only a thousand men. These were at once put to the sword, and he himself made a prisoner. Simon, the elder brother of Judas and Jonathan, now became captain of the Jewish forces. Tryphon, after waiting and scheming for a favourable opportunity to attack Jerusalem, and being baffled by Simon's watchfulness, at length grew weary of the struggle. He abandoned his attempts, but before quitting Judæa (B.C. 143) he revenged himself by murdering his captive.

The unfortunate Jonathan had played with edged tools too long; a great soldier and an astute statesman, he yet perished miserably in an obscure village somewhere on the east of the Jordan. His body was recovered by Simon, now alone remaining of the five Maccabæan brothers, who interred it with that of Judas at Modin, erecting over the burying-place a magnificent monument, visible from afar.

(3) Simon, surnamed " Thassi " (probably " the zealous "), the last surviving brother of Judas Maccabæus. Upon the capture and subsequent death of Jonathan, the successor of Judas in the Maccabæan leadership, Simon was elected to fill the vacant place; and under his administration the nation began to reap the golden harvest of all that Judas and Jonathan had sown. He renewed the friendship with Demetrius, acknowledging, though as a mere matter of form, the sovereignty of Syria, and received in return the grant of complete immunity from taxes in the future. Thus, in fact, if not in name, was " the yoke of the heathen taken away from Israel " (1 M. 13.[31-41]). In the same year (B.C. 142) Simon crowned his achievements in capturing outposts and reducing fortresses by expelling the Syrian garrison from the Akra, the last stronghold of pagan power in Palestine. The mere name of king was all that was now awanting to Simon's prerogatives; for he had succeeded his brother as leader and High Priest; and these offices were declared hereditary in his family until "a faithful prophet" should otherwise direct (1 M. 14.[41]). Thus the Hasmonæan dynasty was founded.

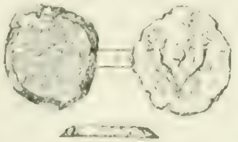
Mattathias had spoken with true insight when on his deathbed (1 M. 2.[65]) he recommended the four brethren to take Simon as their counsellor. Though far below Judas in genius and heroism, he was nevertheless a greater man than Jonathan, and pre-eminently adapted for the administration of a peaceful country. Under his wise sway trade and agriculture flourished. The account of his reign given in 1 M. 14.[4-15] shows a charming Oriental picture of peace and plenty, scarcely paralleled in the history of Judaism.

But in Simon's later days the peace of Judæa was again threatened by the Syrians; the new king, Antiochus VII., having demanded the surrender of Joppa, Gazara, and the Akra. Simon refused, and offered an equivalent in money. This was rejected, and once more Syrian armies invaded Judæa (c. B.C. 138). Simon, too old to go against them himself, charged his sons John and Judas with the management of the campaign. True to their valorous family traditions, they completely routed the Syrians under Cendebæus, near the now historic town of Modin, and Antiochus troubled Judæa no more in Simon's lifetime.

Beloved by his nation, feared by its enemies, there seemed every prospect that Simon would end his days in peace. But he had a nearer enemy than Antiochus in Ptolemy, his ambitious son-in-law. In B.C. 135, Simon, the last of the Maccabees, "the statesman, the Solomon of his house," met an inglorious death, murdered at the end of a banquet, through the treachery of Ptolemy. Two of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, perished with him.

(4) John Hyrcanus, son of SIMON, the founder of the Hasmonean dynasty, assumed the govern-



COPPER COIN OF JOHN HYRCANUS

The inscription reads:

יהוחנן	"John
הכהןהג	the high priest
לוחברהי	and friend
הודים	of the Jews"

ment of Judea in B.C. 135, upon the flight of Ptolemy, his brother-in-law, and had a prosperous reign of thirty years. Before the storm of persecution woke the mighty torrent of Maccabæan heroism, Jewish life had been creeping in the shallows. The years of struggle worked a revolution, and it was on a full stream of national and spiritual vitality, compassing first religious freedom, then civil authority and independence, that the family of Mattathias Hasmonæus swept to power. On the crest of this wave, still unspent, John rode brilliantly, surpassing even his uncle Jonathan in worldliness of policy. He extended his territory in all directions; and was the first Jewish prince to have his name engraved upon a national coinage. But in spite of outward prosperity, his reign was marked by internal discord. Even in the time of Judas a breach had begun between the pious, or Ḥasīdīm, who stood aloof from politics, and the Maccabæan party, who aimed at nothing less than a free Jewish State. The breach widened with the Maccabæan rise to secular power; and the Ḥasīdīm, the party of the law, now took definite ground against the worldly, aristocratic, High-priestly party; thus first declaring that antagonism between PHARISEE and SADDUCEE, so marked in the time of our Lord.

(5) John, surnamed Caddis, or Gaddis (RV.) (probably "my fortune"), was the eldest of the five Maccabæan brothers (Jos. Ant. XII. i.). He met his death shortly after the death of his brother JUDAS in B.C. 161, being murdered by a robber tribe, the sons of Jambri, near Medaba, on the E. of Jordan, when convoying personal property of the Maccabees from the dangerous wilderness of Judæa to the friendly country of the Nabatæans. This crime was afterwards avenged upon the tribe of Jambri by Jonathan and Simon (1 M. 9.[35-42]).

Allusions to John are few, though he appears to have shared gallantly in the exploits of his more famous brethren. In 2 M. 8.[22] and (probably) 10.[19], he is by mistake called Joseph.

(6) Eleazar, surnamed Avaran, the youngest of the five Maccabæan brothers, had his full share of the family heroism, but was cut off in the early stages of the struggle with Syria. At the fierce battle at Beth-Zacharias (c. B.C. 163), where for the first time the Jews had to encounter elephants trained in war, Eleazar fought his way to the elephant which he believed bore the young king, and stabbed it from beneath. He brought down the animal, but was himself crushed to death by its fall (1 M. 6.[43-46]).

Lit.: The books of 1 and 2 Maccabees, and Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1 onwards. Some Psalms, notably 44., 74., 79., and 83., are probably Maccabæan. Rev. W. FAIRWEATHER, D.D., The Background of the Gospels: Dr. Fairweather appends a list of the best literature with reference to this period of Jewish history. See also articles in the larger Bible Dictionaries.

J. M. M. CUNNINGHAM.

The Maccabæan (Hasmonæan) dynasty was continued in Aristobulus I., the eldest of the five sons of John Hyrcanus. The latter desired that his widow should exercise civil authority, his son Aristobulus receiving the High-priesthood. That prince, however, impatient in his ambition, threw his mother and three of his brothers into prison, and seized at once the mitre and the diadem. His mother perished of starvation. His brother Antigonus, next himself in age, and his only full brother, he associated with himself in the government. He was seized by sickness, which, judging by the symptoms, seems to have been cancer of the stomach. Popularity won by Antigonus in a successful campaign excited the jealousy of Aristobulus, who had him assassinated; a crime which preyed upon the king's mind, and shortly afterwards he died in great horror and remorse. "He was called," says Josephus, "a lover of the Greeks, and had conferred many benefits on his own country, and made war against Ituræa, and added a great part of it to Judæa, and compelled the inhabitants, if they would continue in that country, to be circumcised, and to live according to Jewish laws. He was naturally a man of candour and of great modesty" (Ant. XIII. xi. 3).

On the death of Aristobulus, his widow, Alexandra (Salome), liberated his half-brothers, the eldest of whom, Alexander Jannæus, married her, in accordance with the Levirate law, and succeeded his brother as king and High Priest. In the case of the High Priest many of the Pharisaic party held the Levirate law to be in abeyance, as it contradicted the law by which a High Priest was forbidden to marry a widow, or a woman who had been divorced (Lv. 21.[14]). His first act was to slay the brother next to him, whom he suspected of aiming at the crown. He offended the Sadducees by some ritual change, and throughout his whole reign he was at strife with the Pharisees. A man of tireless military activity, his success was far from commensurate with his ambition. He sought to add to his dominion by the conquest of the cities on the coast, and in Galilee. Ptolemy Lathyrus, coming to their assistance, heavily defeated Jannæus on the Upper Jordan. Ptolemy's pretensions, encouraged by this victory, roused the jealousy and suspicion of his mother, Cleopatra of Egypt, who, marching against him, speedily broke his power, and made alliance with the Jewish king. Delivered from this peril, Alexander met with some success, capturing Amathus and Gaza. Then the bitter antagonism of the Pharisees broke out, and for six years civil war raged, in which no fewer than 30,000 Jews are said to have perished. Invited by the Pharisaic party, Demetrius III. came against Jannæus and defeated him in the neighbourhood of Shechem. Then fear of Syrian dominance led many of the Jews to go over to the side of Alexander. Demetrius retired, and the rebellion was stamped out. Jannæus brought many captives to Jerusalem, and there, "as he was feasting with his concubines in the sight of all the city, he ordered about eight hundred of them to be crucified; and while they were living, he ordered the throats of their children and wives to be cut before their eyes." For this act of barbarous cruelty the Jews called him "the Thracian" (Ant. XIII. xiv. 1f.). Aretas the Arabian invaded Judæa and defeated Alexander at Adida; but came to terms with the vanquished and retired (Ant. XIII. xv. 2). In three years of warfare Jannæus captured many cities both east and west of Jordan. They were years in which he suffered much from fever, aggravated by constant inebriety; and he died while investing Ragaba, a fortress beyond Jordan, leaving his wife heiress to his throne, and charging her to make peace with his old enemies the Pharisees.

Copper Coin of Alexander Jannæus

Alexandra followed the advice of her dying husband, and for nine years carried on the government with prudence and success. The counsels of the Pharisees were dominant, but their rivals the Sadducees appear to have been treated on the whole with consideration and justice. Her second son, Aristobulus, an ambitious and unscrupulous man, ill content with a subordinate position "in the flower of his age," laid his plans to seize the crown, and Alexandra, by an opportune death, narrowly escaped the humiliation of being dethroned by her son.

The elder son of Alexandra, John Hyrcanus, the High Priest, was her legitimate successor, but the bold and enterprising Aristobulus, by far the abler man, had the sympathies of the army, and at once marched against his brother. The force of Hyrcanus consisted mainly of mercenaries. They came to action near Jericho, when Hyrcanus was easily defeated. The result was accelerated by the desertion en masse of the Sadducees to Aristobulus. By an agreement then come to between the brothers Aristobulus received the throne, and Hyrcanus took the rank of a private person and retired to enjoy the estate which he had acquired. There was, however, a division of feeling among the people, intensified by the fact that the elder brother favoured the Pharisees, while Aristobulus was a partisan of the Sadducees. A friend of Hyrcanus, Antipater, father of Herod the Great, an Idumæan, persuaded him that Aristobulus intended his death. With the help of Aretas the Nabatæan, Aristobulus was defeated, and besieged in Jerusalem. As the siege was prolonged the Romans were called in to arbitrate. The two brothers pleaded their cause before Pompey in Damascus. The Jewish people also sent representatives, who asked that the monarchy as such should be ended, and the rule of the High Priest restored. Aristobulus sought to prepare the way by the gift to Pompey of a golden vine, valued at five hundred talents. He had, however, no legitimate claim, and by his arrogant behaviour he alienated the favour of Pompey. The astute Antipater secured for his friend what Aristobulus had lost. In hot anger the younger brother hurried off and threw himself into the Alexandrium, a Maccabæan fortress, whence, pressed by Pompey, he retired to Jerusalem. There he was besieged and captured, and subsequently graced the triumph of Pompey in Rome. Hyrcanus now became High Priest again, but without political authority. Later he was made ethnarch by Julius Cæsar.

John Hyrcanus II. was a prince destitute of ambition, possessing none of the qualities that go to make a successful ruler. The real power was in the hands of Antipater, who was his major-domo. For the subsequent history of the Hasmonæans see HERODIAN FAMILY in Canonical Section.

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF. The title of sundry Apocryphal works transmitted through the MSS. of the Greek Bible. Only the first and fourth books of Maccabees are contained in the Codex Sinaiticus (א), which dates from the fourth century; but the Codex Alexandrinus (A), which is of the fifth century, contains four books of Maccabees. While none of these books have a place in the Codex Vaticanus (B), all are included in most editions of the Septuagint, and are also found in a Syriac translation.

1 Maccabees.—"The first book of Maccabees," says Jerome, "I found in Hebrew," and Origen gives its Semitic title as Sarbēth Sabanaiel, which still, however, awaits a satisfactory explanation.* The external evidence for a Hebrew original is confirmed by the distinctly Hebraistic character of the Greek text.

The book furnishes a detailed account of the events of the forty years between the accession of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes as king of Syria and the death of Simon the Maccabee (B.C. 175–135). After a brief historical introduction ($1.^{1-9}$) the writer describes the attempt of Epiphanes to force Hellenism upon Judæa ($1.^{10-64}$), and the consequent revolt led by Mattathias, an aged priest dwelling at Modin (2.). The narrative records the subsequent course of events under the leadership of his sons, Judas Maccabæus, the heroic and brilliant soldier ($3.^{1}$–$9.^{22}$), Jonathan, the astute diplomatist ($9.^{23}$–$12.^{53}$), and Simon, the wise and peaceful administrator ($13.^{1}$–$16.^{18}$), and concludes with an account of the murder of Simon by Ptolemy, his son-in-law, and of the escape of his son, John Hyrcanus, who succeeded him in the High-priesthood ($16.^{19-23}$).

Although the author's name is unknown, he was obviously a devout Palestinian Jew, and wrote in the simple style of Old Testament prose narrative. It has been usual to regard the work as a unity, but the brevity with which Simon's reign is handled has led some scholars to hold that the concluding chapters (14.–16.) are a later addition unknown to Josephus. The view taken on this point affects to some extent the question of date. If the book originally ended at $14.^{15}$, its composition may have fallen within the reign of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135–105); but if it contained from the first the subsequent chapters as well, the reference in $16.^{23}$ to "the chronicles of his High-priesthood" suggests that Hyrcanus was already dead, and that the date of writing must have been subsequent to B.C. 105. On the other hand, in view of the favourable estimate of the Romans in chap. 8., it is safe to conclude that it was written before Pompey's conquest of Jerusalem in B.C. 63. While these form respectively the superior and inferior limits within which no nearer determination can be reached, the probability is that the book is the product of the first or second decade of the last pre-Christian century.

Nothing definite is known as to the sources from which our author derived his material; but in view of the minutely detailed and chronologically accurate character of the history, it is scarcely likely that he drew exclusively upon his own recollections and those of eye-witnesses. Written sources of some sort—private letters, public records, or official documents—he probably had at his disposal. It is, however, uncertain whether these are either referred to in $9.^{22}$ ("And the rest of the acts of Judas, and his wars, and the valiant deeds which he did, and his greatness, they are not written; for they were exceeding many") or preserved in the snatches of verse here and there, and especially in the section devoted to the leadership of Judas, incorporated with the narrative. In the one case the writer's meaning may simply be that he found it impracticable to relate all the circumstances known to him; in the other the lyrical passion may have been evoked by the exceptionally thrilling nature of the events recorded.

Scholars are agreed as to the sterling value of 1 Maccabees as a historical record. Geographically and chronologically it possesses high merit. Though not altogether free from error, its general trustworthiness is beyond dispute. If in describing a Jewish victory the writer patriotically exaggerates the number of the slain, this was a literary vice of his age; and if some of his statements regarding the

* Dalman's conjecture that the book may have been known to Origen only in an Aramaic translation, and that the two strange words represent the Aramaic for "Book of the Hasmonæan House," seems as plausible as any.

Romans ($8.^{1-16}$) and Spartans ($12.^{6f.}$) are at variance with fact, this is to be attributed not to wilful deception, but simply to defective erudition.

The book is pervaded by a deeply religious spirit. As heroic defenders of " the law and the ordinances " ($2.^{21}$) the Maccabees call forth the writer's warmest admiration. On the other hand the profanation of the Temple by Epiphanes ($1.^{21}$), and Nicanor's insolent threat to burn it ($7.^{35}$), are viewed as shocking impieties, and as tokens of the Divine displeasure ($1.^{64}$). Not less remarkable than the author's religious feeling is his self-restraint in giving expression to it. The victories of the Maccabees are not represented as due to any special interposition of God, but are ascribed to their own military skill. From the prayers put into the mouth of Judas we miss the penitential note still so prominent in Daniel ($9.^{3-20}$). It is noteworthy also that 1 Maccabees is silent regarding the hope of immortality, except in the form of renown ; the rewards to which Mattathias points his sons are essentially for this life ($2.^{51-60}$). There is even studious avoidance of the use of the Divine Name, which does not occur in the Greek text. Instead of " Lord " or " God," we have frequently the term " heaven," or simply a pronoun ; and prayer is addressed not to a present Jehovah, but to the distant heaven ($3.^{50}$, $4.^{10}$, &c.). The depressing consciousness that prophecy had ceased ($9.^{27}$), and the wistful looking for " a faithful prophet " who shall speak authoritatively upon moot points of religious procedure and civil administration ($4.^{46}$, $14.^{41}$), are the natural accompaniments of the growing tendency of the age to abandon the conception of Jehovah as dwelling among His people by the Shechinah in favour of a more transcendental view of God as the God of heaven.

In the early Christian Church 1 Maccabees did not rank as an Old Testament Scripture, but, along with a second book of the same name, it was pronounced canonical by the Council of Trent (1546), embraced in the Vulgate, and placed among the Apocrypha of the English Bible. Although thus outside the canon of the Protestant churches, it has always been prized as one of the most valuable of the " deutero-canonical " writings. In the judgment of Luther, " it closely resembles the rest of the books of Holy Scripture, and would not be unworthy to be enumerated with them."

2 Maccabees.—The two letters prefixed to this book ($1.-2.^{18}$) are almost certainly forged documents attached to it by a later hand, with the object of inducing the Egyptian Jews to observe the Feast of Dedication. They are followed by the writer's own preface ($2.^{19-30}$). With the exception of the brief conclusion ($15.^{37-39}$), the remainder of the book consists of an epitome of a larger work by one Jason, a Jew of Cyrene. It deals with the same history as its predecessor, 1 Maccabees, except that it begins at a point one year earlier (B.C. 176) and stops short at the death of Nicanor (B.C. 161), thus covering a period of only fifteen years. For the first of these years—i.e. for the events narrated in chaps. $3.^{1}$–$4.^{6}$, regarding the attempted robbery of the Temple treasury by Heliodorus and the intrigues of Simon the Benjamite against the worthy priest Onias III. —it is our principal authority.

2 Maccabees was originally written in Greek—as was manifest to Jerome "from its very style "—from a pronouncedly Pharisaic standpoint, and was possibly directed against the Hasmonæan dynasty. No sympathy is shown towards the priestly class, whose faults are severely censured ($4.^{13}$). Both in trustworthiness and in style it is inferior to 1 Maccabees, the authority of which is to be preferred where, as not unfrequently happens, the accounts are conflicting. Besides being highly coloured, the narrative does not observe strict chronological sequence. Instead of the sober annalistic style of the earlier historian, we have a work marked by hyperbole, inflated rhetoric, and homiletic reflection. Bitter invective is heaped upon the national enemies, and strong predilection is shown for the marvellous. The language used in the preface and conclusion suggests that these extravagances are mostly chargeable to the epitomiser himself, although the fulness and inaccuracy of detail, which are a feature of the book, also suggest that Jason's information was derived from the recollections of eye-witnesses orally communicated. In spite of its obvious defects, however, it forms a useful supplement to 1 Maccabees.

Of the author of the original work of which 2 Maccabees is an abridgment nothing is known but the name. Although described as " of Cyrene," he shows greater familiarity with Syria than with either Egypt or Palestine. Of the epitomiser not even the name is known.

The writer's interests are religious rather than historical. His main object is not to relate the facts in their historical sequence, but to make use of them in order to inculcate religious lessons. In 1 Maccabees there is a keen sense of the part to be played by the Jews themselves, of the necessity of employing their own skill and valour ; here they are made to rely rather upon the Divine intervention. In the first book the writer refrains from the use of the Divine Name ; here it is of frequent occurrence. Fantastic apparitions of angelic and supernatural beings, gorgeously arrayed and mostly upon horseback, are frequently introduced. In general the views reflected in the book are those of the Pharisees. The ungodly will be punished mercilessly, and in exact correspondence to their sins ($4.^{38, 42}$, $5.^{9f.}$, $9.^{5-18}$). The chastisements of erring Jews are of short duration, and intended to recall them to duty. If the faithful suffer martyrdom, it is in order to serve as an example to others, and they shall be compensated by being raised up "unto an eternal renewal of life." This combination of the doctrine of a resurrection with that of immortality represents a more advanced eschatology than is to be met with in any other pre-Christian document.

It is probable that 2 Maccabees is already referred to in the Epistle to the Hebrews (cp. He. 11.[35] with 2 M. 6.[19, 28]). On account of its martyrology it was a favourite work with Patristic writers. The Protestant churches have, however, followed Origen in excluding it from the canon of Holy Scripture. Luther pronounces against it as strongly as he does in favour of the first book, holding that it "Judaises too much, and contains much heathen naughtiness." The Roman Church, on the other hand, has given effect to Augustine's favourable view by declaring it canonical. It finds support in this book for its teaching with reference to prayers for the dead and purgatory (12.[43ff.]). An allusion to Jeremiah as "he who prayeth much for the people and the holy city" (15.[14]), it likewise appeals to, as confirming its views respecting the intercession of the saints.

3 Maccabees.—Beyond the fact that it deals with a persecution of Jews who were loyal to their ancestral faith, this book has no title to be called Maccabæan. The story which forms the subject of it has no connection with the Hasmonæans, being concerned with a supposed episode in the reign of Ptolemy IV. Philopator (B.C. 221–204). Neither can it be regarded as history, although it may possibly contain some substratum of fact. The essential points of the legend on which it is based are given in simpler form by Josephus (c. Apion, ii. 5) in connection with another Egyptian king, Ptolemy VII. Physcon (B.C. 146–117).

As related in 3 Maccabees, the tale is, briefly, as follows. After the battle of Raphia, the victorious Ptolemy IV. Philopator was smitten of God for profaning the Temple at Jerusalem. On his recovery he subjected the Jews of Alexandria to civic and religious oppression. Five hundred intoxicated elephants were about to be turned loose upon them, but in answer to their prayers two angels from heaven appeared, to the consternation of the king's troops, who were then crushed by the infuriated animals. Completely changing his tactics, Ptolemy now ordered the release of the Jews, feasted them for seven days, reinstated them in their possessions, issued letters in their favour to all provincial governors, and sent them to their homes rejoicing.

While the date of the book is uncertain, it is clear from the writer's acquaintance with the Greek additions to Daniel that it cannot have been written earlier than the first century B.C. On the other hand its favourable reception by the Syrian Church proves that it cannot have originated later than the first century A.D. In the Western Church it was either unknown or unappreciated.

4 Maccabees.—The title of this book conveys no proper idea of its contents. It is not a history of the Maccabæan movement, but a philosophical discourse in which certain incidents from 2 Maccabees are drawn upon to illustrate and support the writer's thesis, namely, "that pious reason is absolute master of the passions." By pious reason he virtually means religious principle, and his contention is that by the aid of this men can control such passions or affections as are inimical to virtue. Its power, however, is subject to one limitation: it cannot prevail against its own affections, it cannot destroy forgetfulness and ignorance. Even within the sphere of its control it does not avail to eradicate desire, but only to curb it. "Any one of you may not be able to uproot a vicious propensity, but reason is able to assist him, so that he shall not be bowed down by this propensity" (3.[5]). With some philosophical acumen the writer describes and classifies the affections, viewing them particularly in their opposition to the four cardinal virtues, while by examples adduced from Hebrew history he illustrates the lordship of pious reason over all the affections save such as are really defects inherent in itself. With this the philosophical tractate seems to reach a fitting conclusion (1.–3.[18]).

There follows, however, a lengthy supplementary section (3.[19]–18.[2]) in which, after alluding to the oppression of the Jews by the Syrian kings Seleucus and Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, the writer more than redeems the promise made in ch. 1.[7-9]: "I might prove to you from many other considerations that pious reason is the sole master of the passions; but I shall prove it most effectually from the fortitude of Eleazar, and of the seven brethren and their mother; for all these proved by their contempt of torture and death that reason has command over the passions." Chaps. 5.–7. tell the story of the martyrdom of Eleazar with sundry edifying comments thereon; chaps. 8.–14.[10] are similarly devoted to the case of the seven brethren; and chaps. 14.[11]–16.[25] to that of their mother. In chaps. 17.–18.[2] the author sums up his impressions regarding these "champions of Divine legislation," and, taking his imagery from the Grecian games, declares that "in truth the struggle which was made by them was Divine." What follows (chap. 18.[3-23]) was probably added by a later hand.

In its literary form the book is a kind of homily. But, although the writer employs the direct mode of address, it does not necessarily follow that it was ever actually delivered to an audience, still less that it is to be regarded as a real sample of a synagogue sermon. Apart from the fact that it is not based on any text from Scripture, it is tolerably evident that it was intended for publication, and that we have here a book or tractate in the form of a discourse.

4 Maccabees is an interesting product of Hellenistic Judaism, characterised by systematic arrangement of its material, and the frequent use of philosophical terms. It reflects the influence of Stoicism —the writer's main thesis, as well as the postulate of the four cardinal virtues, being borrowed from that school of Greek philosophy. At the same time he follows a line of his own in his classification of the passions, and never allows his philosophy to interfere with his loyalty to Judaism. Hence the religious standpoint of the book is not that of Stoicism influenced by Judaism, but that of Judaism influenced by Stoicism. The writer is essentially a pious Jew; his Stoicism is only acquired. Throughout the emphasis is laid not upon reason as such, but upon pious reason. It is to this, regulating itself according to the Mosaic law, that human passions yield. What the writer is chiefly concerned to urge upon his countrymen is the necessity of steadfast adherence to Judaism in spite of persecution; nor does he hesitate to claim, through the lips of one of "the seven brethren," that "the children of the Hebrews alone are invincible in virtue's cause" (9.[18]).

Ever since the days of Eusebius and Jerome it has been usual to ascribe the authorship of 4 Maccabees to Josephus, but there is nothing in the style or thought of the book to justify this hypothesis. It is, moreover, largely based upon 2 Maccabees, which was unknown to Josephus, and contains historical inaccuracies incompatible with the view that it was written by that author.

The materials are not to hand for definitely fixing the date of the book. The one certainty here is that it was written later than 2 Maccabees. It has been variously conjectured that it was composed after the downfall of the Hasmonæans, in the period between Pompey and Vespasian, and in the first century after Christ. Probably we shall not err seriously in ascribing it to the Herodian age. The name of the writer is unknown, but everything points to his having been a Hellenistic Jew of Alexandria or Asia Minor.

Lit.: Useful translations will be found in Cotton's The Five Books of Maccabees in English (Oxford, 1832), and in all of Bagster's editions of the Apocrypha. The first and second books are included in the Revised Version of the Apocrypha, to which students owe much. Short and easily accessible Introductions are supplied in the following recent publications: The First Book of Maccabees, in the Cambridge Bible for Schools; The First and Second Books of the Maccabees, in the Temple Bible; The Apocryphal Books (Century Bible Handbook series); The Age of the Maccabees (Bible Student's Library); Between the Testaments (Guild Text-books). More advanced students are referred to the section on Jewish Literature in Schürer's History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (vol. iii. of Clark's translation). W. FAIRWEATHER.

MACHÆRUS. Although not named in the Apocrypha, Machærus played a considerable part in the later Jewish history. Pliny describes it as the strongest Jewish castle after Jerusalem (HN. V. xvi. 72). It was fortified by Jannæus, destroyed by Gabinius, and refortified by Herod the Great, who enlarged and strengthened it, building also a city, with a splendid palace (BJ. VII. vi. 2). At Herod's death it passed to Antipas, and here, it is said, John the Baptist was imprisoned and beheaded. But see JOHN THE BAPTIST, and HERODIAN FAMILY, Antipas, p. 261. At a later time the citadel was held by a Roman garrison. Fearing a siege, the soldiers were persuaded by the Jewish inhabitants to leave the place (BJ. II. xviii. 6). Bassus, the Roman general, recovered it by a stratagem c. A.D. 72 (BJ. VII. vi. 4). It is identified with the mod. Mkaur, on a height E. of the Dead Sea, with extensive ruins.

MACHMAS (1 M. 9.[73]), RV. MICHMASH, wh. see in Canonical Section.

MACRON, the surname of Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes (1 M. 3.[38]; 2 M. 4.[45]), governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy Philometor (2 M. 10.[12]). Later he was governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia (8.[8]). He had been made governor of Cyprus by Ptolemy Philometor, but had deserted the island and attached himself to the cause of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 M. 10.[13]). To him, along with Nicanor and Gorgias, was entrusted the army sent against Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 3.[38]). Heavily bribed by MENELAUS at Tyre, he secured the king's favour for that infamous person (2 M. 4.[45ff.]). He was made governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia (2 M. 8.[8]). Continued in office under Antiochus Eupator, he sought to do justice to the Jews. In consequence an accusation was made against him to the king, and finding that he could not retain his position with honour, he escaped from an intolerable situation by taking poison (2 M. 10.[12f.]).

MADIABUN, head of a family of Levites who superintended the repair of the Temple (1 Es. 5.[58]); not named in Ez. 3.[9].

MADIAN (Jth. 2.[26]), RV. MIDIAN, wh. see in Canonical Section.

MAELUS (1 Es. 9.[26]), corresponding to "Mijamin" in Ez. 10.[25].

MAGED (1 M. 5.[36]), RV. MAKED, wh. see.

MAGIDDO (1 Es. 1.[29]), RV. MEGIDDO, wh. see in Canonical Section.

MAIANEAS, RV. MAIANNAS (1 Es. 9.[48]), corresponding to "Maaseiah" in Ne. 8.[7].

MAKED, a city in Gilead, the site of which is not yet identified. It is described as "strong and great" (1 M. 5.[26, 36]).

MALACHY (2 Es. 1.[40]), the prophet MALACHI.

MALTANNEUS (1 Es. 9.^{33}), AV. ALTANEUS, wh. see.

MAMAIAS, RV. SAMAIAS (1 Es. 8.^{44}), corresponding to " Shemaiah " in Ez. 8.^{16}.

MAMDAI (1 Es. 9.^{34}), AV. MABDAI, wh. see.

MAMNITANAIMUS, RV. MAMNITANEMUS (1 Es. 9.^{34}). This is a corruption from the names occurring in the parallel passage, Ez. 10.^{37}.

MAMUCHUS (1 Es. 9.^{30}), corresponding to " Malluch " in Ez. 10.^{29}.

MANASSEAS (1 Es. 9.^{31}) = " Manasseh " in Ez. 10.^{30}.

MANASSES. (1) One of the sons of Asom who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.^{33}) = " Manasseh " in Ez. 10.^{33}. (2) King of Judah (Manasseh), reputed author of the Apocryphal PRAYER OF MANASSES. (3) One named in connection with ACHIACHARUS in To. 14.^{10}. (4) The husband of Judith, a rich merchant in Bethulia, who died of sunstroke (Jth. 8.$^{2f.}$).

MANASSES, THE PRAYER OF. See APOCRYPHA, introductory article.

MANES, AV. EANES, wh. see.

MANI (1 Es. 9.^{30}), corresponding to " Bani " in Ez. 10.^{29} (cp. 1 Es. 5.^{12}).

MANIUS, AV. MANLIUS, wh. see.

MANLIUS. A letter purporting to be sent by " Quintus Memmius and Titus Manlius, ambassadors of the Romans," is preserved in 2 M. 11.$^{35ff.}$ It confirms the concessions made to the Jews by Lysias : " Whatsoever Lysias the king's cousin hath granted, therewith we also are well pleased," &c. It has no better claim to authenticity than the other three letters recorded in this chapter. Romans would not have dated their letter according to the Seleucid era. And we know that relations between the Romans and the Jews were not begun until B.C. 162 (1 M. 8.$^{1ff.}$), two years after the date of the letter. There is no record of either Quintus Memmius or Titus Manlius having been a legatus in Asia at this time. What substratum of fact there may be in these letters it is impossible now to determine.

MARDOCHEAS. (1) This is the form in wh. the name of Esther's uncle Mordecai is found in the Apocryphal Additions to Esther (Est. Ad. 10.^{4}, &c.). The first day of the Feast of PURIM is called " Mardocheus' day " (2 M. 15.^{36} ; RV. " day of Mordecai "). (2) One of the " guides " of the people who returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua (1 Es. 5.^{8}) = " Mordecai " in Ez. 2.^{2} ; Ne. 7.^{7}.

MARIMOTH, an ancestor of Ezra (2 Es. 1.^{2}), called " Meremoth " in 1 Es. 8.^{2} (RV. " Memeroth "), and " Meraioth " in Ez. 7.^{3}.

MARISA (2 M. 12.^{35}) = MARESHAH, wh. see in Canonical Section.

MARMOTH (1 Es. 8.^{62}), called " Meremoth " in Ez. 8.^{33}.

MASALOTH, RV. MESALOTH (1 M. 9.^{2}). The place where Bacchides encamped in or near ARBELA, wh. see.

MASIAS, RVm. " Misaias " (1 Es. 5.^{34}), head of a family of the servants of Solomon, not named in Ezra.

MASMAN (1 Es. 8.^{43}). See MAASMAS.

MASSIAS (1 Es. 9.^{22}), called " Maaseiah " in Ez. 10.^{22}.

MASTICH, RV. MASTICK, mentioned only once (Su.^{54}). The Pistacia lentiscus is a shrub attaining a few feet in height, which grows in great quantities on the slopes around the Mediterranean. Gum mastick is obtained by making slits in the bark, through which it exudes in the form of tears. These harden in pale yellow lumps. In the East it is greatly prized as a masticatory for preserving the teeth and gums : it also gives a pleasant perfume to the breath. But the gum is chewed in Palestine by very many just because they like it. Mastick is an ingredient in certain perfumes. Sometimes a little is added to the bread before it is baked in the oven.

MASTICH

MATHANIAS, RV. MATTHANIAS, a descendant of Pahath Moab (1 Es. 9.^{31}), called " Mattaniah " in Ez. 10.^{30}.

MATHELAS, AV. MATTHELAS (1 Es. 9.^{19}), corresponding to " Maaseiah " in Ez. 10.^{18}.

MATTATHIAS. (1) One of those who stood by Ezra at the reading of the law (1 Es. 9.^{43}), called " Mattithiah " in Ne. 8.^{4}. (2) AV. MATTHIAS, one who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.^{33}), corresponding to " Mattathah " in Ez. 10.^{33} (RV. " Mattattah "). (3) The father of Judas Maccabæus and his brothers (1 M. 2.^{1}, &c.) ; see MACCABEES. (4) Son of Absalom ; one of the two captains who stood by Jonathan the Maccabee in the battle at Hazor (1 M. 11.^{70}), and helped him to turn what threatened to be a rout into a victory. (5) The son of Simon the Maccabee, murdered by Ptolemy, the son of Abubus, along with his father and brother, in the little fortress of Dok (1 M. 16.[14-16]). (6) One of the envoys of Nicanor sent to treat with Judas Maccabæus (2 M. 14.[19]).

MATTHANIAS. (1) 1 Es. 9.[27], called "Mattaniah" in Ez. 10.[26]. (2) See MATHANIAS.

MATTHELAS. See MATHELAS.

MATTHIAS. See MATTATHIAS (2).

MAZITIAS (1 Es. 9.[35]), corresponding to "Mattithiah" in Ez. 10.[43].

MEANI, RV. MAANI (1 Es. 5.[31]), corresponding to "Meunim" in Ez. 2.[50]; Ne. 7.[52].

MEDABA (1 M. 9.[36]), a form of the name of MEDEBA.

MEDEBA. See art. in Canonical Section.

MEEDA, RV. MEEDDA (1 Es. 5.[32]), called "Mehida" in Ez. 2.[52].

MELCHIAS. (1) One who had married a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[26]), called "Malchiah" in Ez. 10.[25] (RV. "Malchijah"). (2) 1 Es. 9.[32] = "Malchiah" in Ez. 10.[31] (RV. "Malchijah"). (3) 1 Es. 9.[44] = "Malchiah" in Ne. 8.[4] (RV. "Malchijah").

MELCHIEL, father of Charmis, one of the governors of Bethulia (Jth. 6.[15]).

MEMEROTH, AV. MEREMOTH, wh. see.

MEMMIUS. See MANLIUS.

MENELAUS, a High Priest who secured the office (c. B.C. 172) by bribery from Antiochus Epiphanes, having supplanted his brother Jason, who had also obtained the office by bribery and by the supplanting of his brother Onias (2 M. 4.[23-25]). According to Josephus (Ant. XII. v. 1) he was a younger brother of Onias and Jason. His name was originally Onias, and the name Menelaus was probably assumed in the Hellenising days of Antiochus Epiphanes and in the priesthood of Onias, in whose time the assumption of Greek names by the Jews was fashionable. The following details regarding M. are based on 2 M., which must be acknowledged to be of very doubtful historicity, and in some points it contradicts the narrative of Josephus. M., unable to implement his engagement to pay to the king a higher tribute than his predecessor, was summoned to Antioch. He tried to raise additional money by stealing and selling in Tyre and other cities some of the golden vessels of the Temple. For this he was rebuked by Onias, who in fear for his life fled for safety to the sanctuary of Apollo in Daphne: from this he was tempted and murdered at the instance of M., a crime, however, for which the actual perpetrator, and not the instigator, suffered the king's wrath (2 M. 4.[38]). For the malversation of his brother, Lysimachus, whom he had left as his deputy in the High-priesthood during his absence at Antioch, he was accused and convicted before the king at Tyre; but by the mediation of Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, whom he had bribed highly, he was discharged from the accusation and retained his office of High Priest, "increasing in malice and being a great traitor to the citizens" (2 M. 4.[50]). He defended himself successfully against an armed attempt of Jason to recover the High-priesthood (2 M. 5.[5-10]). He acted as guide to Antiochus in his ruthless desecration of the Temple (v. 15), and he is described as "worse than all the rest" of the governors (v. 23) who were left in the country on the departure of Antiochus. "This wicked wretch" came to a violent and (as the writer of 2 M. considers) a most just end at the hands of Antiochus IV., Eupator, c. B.C. 163 (2 M. 13.[3-9]).

MENESTHEUS, the father of Apollonius (2 M. 4.[21]).

MERAN, RV. MERRAN (Ba. 3.[23]), seems to be a mistake for Midian; "Meran" being read for "Medan," ר for ד.

MEREMOTH, RV. MEMEROTH, an ancestor of Ezra (1 Es. 8.[2]), corresponding to "Meraioth" in Ez. 7.[3]; called also "Marimoth" in 2 Es. 1.[2].

MERRAN. See MERAN.

MERUTH, RV. EMMERUTH (1 Es. 5.[24]), corresponding to "Immer" in Ez. 2.[37].

MESALOTH. See MASALOTH.

METERUS. See BAITERUS.

MICAH (Jth. 6.[15]), AV. MICHA, wh. see.

MICHA. A Simeonite, father of Ozias, one of the governors of Bethulia (Jth. 6.[15]).

MICHAEL, father of Zaraias (1 Es. 8.[34]), who returned with Ezra; called "Zebadiah" in Ez. 8.[8].

MICHEAS (2 Es. 1.[39]), the prophet MICAH.

MISAEL. (1) 1 Es. 9.[44], corresponding to "Mishael" in Ne. 8.[4]. (2) The name in ST.[66] of Mishael, called in Babylon "Meshach" (Dn. 1.[6]).

MITHRADATES. (1) The treasurer of Cyrus, king of Persia, to whom the sacred vessels of the Temple were given that he might hand them over to Sanabassar, the governor of Judæa (1 Es. 2.[11f.]), called in Ez. 1.[8] "Mithredath" (cp. Ant. XI. i. 3). (2) An officer of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, stationed in Samaria, who, with others, represented to the king the danger of allowing the Jews to "build that rebellious and wicked city" Jerusalem, and secured an edict putting a stop to the work for a time (1 Es. 2.[16ff.], AV. "Mithridates"), called "Mithredath" in Ez. 4.[7].

MOCHMUR, the brook, or rather wādy (χείμαῤῥος), beside which stood CHUSI, not far from EKREBEL. It may be identical with Wādy Makfūrīyeh, to the N. of which lies 'Aqrabeh (Ekrebel), to the E. of Nāblus.

MODIN, a city of Judah, the home of Mattathias, and the birthplace of his heroic sons (1 M. 2.[17, 70]). Here took place the encounter between Mattathias and the representatives of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was determined to compel the Jews to idolatrous sacrifice. Goaded to desperation, he slew a compliant Jew who was about to offer sacrifice, and made conflict inevitable by killing the king's commissioner himself. It was the signal for revolt on the part of his oppressed people, and forthwith began the struggle for freedom in which his gallant sons covered themselves with glory (1 M. 2.[1, 16, 23]; Ant. XII. vi. 1f.; BJ. I. i. 3). Mattathias, his sons, and their mother were all buried here (1 M. 2.[70], 9.[19], 13.[25ff.]; Ant. XII. xi. 2; XIII. vi. 6). Judas encamped near by, before his attack on the army of Antiochus Eupator (2 M. 13.[14]); and from Modin Simon's sons went against Cendebæus (1 M. 16.[4]).

Simon, the last survivor of the brothers, erected here a splendid tomb and monument of white polished stone, with monolithic pillars and elaborate carvings, while on the summit were seven pyramids, one for father, for mother, and for each of the five brethren (Ant. XIII. vi. 6).

Modin is represented by mod. el-Medyeh, a village about 15 miles west of Bethel, 16 miles north-west of Jerusalem, 6½ miles from Lydda, and about 16 miles from the coast. El-Medyeh itself is not visible from the sea, but er-Ras, a height to the south, commands a view of the plain and the sea. Here possibly the great monument may have been built. This monument, or mausoleum, was known in the fourth cent. (Williams, Holy City, i. 96), but all trace of it has been lost. There are considerable ancient remains, and one large tomb, which, however, is of Christian origin.

MOETH (1 Es. 8.[63]), corresponding to "Noadiah" in Ez. 8.[33].

MOLI, RV. MOOLI (1 Es. 8.[47]), corresponding to "Mahli" in Ez. 8.[18].

MOMDIS (1 Es. 9.[34]), corresponding to "Maadai" in Ez. 10.[34].

MOOLI. See Moli.

MOOSIAS (1 Es. 9.[31]), corresponding to "Maaseiah" in Ez. 10.[30].

MOSOLLAM. See Mosollamus (2).

MOSOLLAMON. See Mosollamus (1).

MOSOLLAMUS. (1) AV. MOSOLLAMON (1 Es. 8.[44]) = "Meshullam" in Ez. 8.[16]. (2) AV. MOSOLLAM (1 Es. 9.[14]) = "Meshullam" in Ez. 10.[15].

MYNDUS, a city on the coast of Caria, at the western end of the peninsula on the southern shore of which Halicarnassus stands. Such importance as it possessed in ancient times was probably due to the proximity of silver mines, which were worked both in ancient and in mediæval times. These mines have given the name to the mod. site, Gumushli. They also probably account for the presence of a Jewish colony there. Myndus is mentioned as one of the cities to which letters were sent by the Romans c. B.C. 139, in favour of the Jews (1 M. 15.[23]). Thus, although overshadowed in importance by Halicarnassus, it must then have been a free, self-governing city.

N

NAATHUS, a son of Addi (1 Es. 9.[31]). There is no corresponding name in Ez. 10.[30]. It may have arisen from transposition of the letters in Adna (Ez. 10.[30]).

NABARIAS (1 Es. 9.[44]), perhaps corresponding to "Hashbadanah" in Ne. 8.[4].

NABATHÆANS, an Arab tribe that lived in the wilderness three days' journey east from the Jordan: it favoured Judas Maccabæus and his brother Jonathan in the expedition against the Edomites, in which the Jewish leaders were trying to rescue and to collect into Judæa Jews who were scattered through certain strongholds in the land of Gilead (1 M. 5.[24-54]). The N. again appear (1 M. 9.[35-42]) as friends of Jonathan when his brother, John, was sent on to arrange about the safe keeping of the carriage (i.e. baggage), but was attacked and killed by "the children of Jambri," who suffered reprisals at the hands of Jonathan and his brother, Simon. The word is connected with Nebaioth. See Arabia in Canonical Section.

NABATHITES = Nabathæans, wh. see.

NABUCHADONOSOR, the Greek from of the name of the great king in EV. 1 Es. 1.[40ff.]; Est. Ad. 11.[4]; Ba. 1.[9ff.] But in Tobit and Judith RV. adopts Nebuchadnezzar.

NADABATH, AV. NADABATHA, a place east of Jordan whence the children of Jambri, "making a great marriage," were bringing the bride with a great train, "a daughter of one of the great nobles of Canaan," when they were attacked by Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus, who in vengeance for the death of John, their brother, slew very many, the remnant fleeing to the mountains. Some have suggested Nebo; others Nabathæa. Clermont-Ganneau thinks we may read ῥαβαθά, and identify it with Rabbath Ammon, where the "great noble" might appropriately have his residence. But no certain identification is yet possible.

NAIDUS (1 Es. 9.[31]), possibly corresponding to "Benaiah" in Ez. 10.[30].

NANÆA, AV. NANEA, the Greek form of the name of a goddess who was worshipped in Elymais. Alexander the Great made rich gifts to her temple. Here it is said in 2 M. 1.[13ff.] that Antiochus Epiphanes was slain "by the deceit of Nanea's priests," he having entered for the purpose of plunder, but ostensibly to marry the goddess, and to receive her dowry. This, however, is contradicted by the account given in 1 M. 6.[1ff.], and by the very circumstantial record of the king's illness and death in 2 M. 9.[1ff.] Nana was one of the primeval deities of Babylon. She was originally distinct from Ishtar (Delitzsch, Paradise, 222), but came to be regarded as a form of Ishtar. We find, therefore, that Josephus identifies her with Artemis (Ant. XII. ix. 1), and Appian with Aphrodite (Syr. 66). She represented the productive powers of nature, and this determined the character of her worship (see EB. s.v.).

NAPHISI (1 Es. 5.[31]), called "Nephisim" in Ez. 2.[50]; "Nephishesim" in Ne. 7.[52], RV. "Nephushesim."

NAPHTHAR, RV. NEPHTHAR. The legend recorded in 2 M. 1.[19ff.] says that at the time of the Captivity the sacred fire was hid. The descendants of the priests who hid it were sent by Nehemiah to fetch it, but they found only thick water. Nehemiah directed the wood and the sacrifices to be sprinkled with it. When the sun shone out it ignited, and the fire consumed the sacrifices. The Persian king caused a wall to be built round the well where it was found, making the place holy. Nehemiah "called this thing Nephthar, which is by interpretation 'cleansing'; but most men call it Nephthai (AV. "Nephi"). The legend probably rests on some real occurrence. There is no indication whence the naphtha or petroleum was brought. This highly inflammable oil is found in the district of the Dead Sea. It also abounds in the Euphrates valley. There is no source of supply in Jerusalem or the neighbourhood. Bīr Eyūb, in the upper end of Wādy en-Nār, "Valley of Fire," has been associated with the name of Nehemiah, and has also been called the "Well of Fire" (BRP. i. 331f. note). The name was probably suggested by that of the valley.

NASBAS, the nephew of Tobit who, with Achiacharus, came to the wedding of Tobias (To. 11.[18]). We ought probably to take him, however, as the nephew of Achiacharus. This is almost made certain by the Story of Ahiqar and his Nephew. Nasbas is probably also to be identified with Aman in To. 14.[10] (see the Story of Ahikar with introduction by J. R. Harris, pp. xxix., xlv.).

NASI, AV. NASITH (1 Es. 5.[32]), called "Neziah" in Ez. 2.[54].

NASOR, RV. HAZOR, the scene of the battle between Jonathan Maccabæus and the army of Demetrius (1 M. 11.[67]). It may be confidently identified with Hazor, as near to Cades (i.e. Kedesh-Naphtali). Probably through the error of a scribe the n of the preceding word pedion became attached to Asōr, as the name would appear in Greek.

NATHAN, one of those sent by Ezra to secure Levites for the Temple service (1 Es. 8.[44]).

NATHANAEL. (1) 1 Es. 1.[9] = "Nethaneel" in 2 Ch. 35.[9]. (2) 1 Es. 9.[22] = "Nethaneel" in Ez. 10.[22]. (3) A Simeonite, son of Samuel, and ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.[1]).

NATHANIAS (1 Es. 9.[34]) = "Nathan" in Ez. 10.[39].

NAVE (Sr. 46.[1]), the name invariably given to the father of Joshua in LXX; "son of Nave" = Nun.

NECODAN, RV. NEKODAN (1 Es. 5.[37]) = "Nekoda" in Ez. 2.[60].

NEEMIAS (Sr. 49.[13]), RV. NEHEMIAH, wh. see in Canonical Section.

NEHEMIAS. (1) One of the leaders of the people who returned with Zerobabel, Jesus, &c. (1 Es. 5.[8]). (2) 1 Es. 5.[40], the Tirshatha, son of Hachaliah. See Nehemiah.

NEKODAN. See Necodan.

NEPHI, AV. NEPHTHAI. See Naphthar.

NEPHIS, RV. NIPHIS (1 Es. 5.[21]) = "Magbish" in Ez. 2.[30].

NEPHTHAI. See Naphthar.

NEPHTHALI, the form of the name "Naphtali" in To. 1.[2], &c.

NEPHTHAR. See Naphthar.

NERIAS, the father of Baruch and Seraiah (Ba. 1.[1]), the Greek form of "Neriah."

NETOPHAH, RV. NETOPHAS (1 Es. 5.[18]) = "Netophah" in Ez. 2.[22]; Ne. 7.[26].

NICANOR, son of Patroclus (2 M. 8.[9]), was a general of Antiochus Epiphanes, and was appointed by Lysias, regent during the absence of Antiochus, as one of three generals to advance into Judæa "to root out the whole generation of the Jews." His army was defeated by Judas Maccabæus at Emmaus, B.C. 166 (1 M. 4.; 2 M. 8.[7ff.]). After the death of Lysias and his ward, Antiochus Eupator, N. was appointed governor of Judæa by Demetrius (2 M. 14.[12]). He had, or pretended, great affection for Judas (vv. 24, 25), and the two men met at Jerusalem and agreed upon terms of peace. These were disturbed by Alcimus, who saw in the union of N. and Judas the ruin of his own hopes, and procured a peremptory order that Judas should be sent as a prisoner to Antioch. The manner of N. now changed. He entered the Temple, and during the solemn sacrifices he demanded of the priests the surrender of Judas, threatening, if he were not surrendered, to lay the Temple level with the ground, to break down the altar, and to erect on the spot a notable temple to Dionysus. On the escape of Judas an indecisive skirmish took place at Capharsalama. The decisive struggle took place at Beth-horon or Adasa (B.C. 161). In the first onset of the battle N. fell, according to a late version, by the hand of Judas himself. The second book of the Maccabees ends with the record of the great victory, after which the Hebrews had the city in their own power. In honour of the victory the 13th day of Adar, the day before Mordecai's day, was ordered to be kept for ever as a festival. The account here given seems best to reconcile the somewhat discrepant narratives of 1 and 2 Maccabees.

NIPHIS. See NEPHIS.

NISAN. See YEAR in Canonical Section.

NOE (To. 4.[12]), RV. NOAH.

NOEBA (1 Es. 5.[31]), corresponding to " Nekoda " in Ez. 2.[48].

NOOMA, AV. ETHMA, wh. see.

NUMENIUS, son of Antiochus, one of the two envoys sent to Rome and Sparta by Jonathan the Maccabee and the senate, to confirm friendly relations between these peoples and the Jews (1 M. 12.[1ff.]). The mission seems to have been entirely successful. At a later time (B.C. 141) he was sent on a second mission by Simon, taking with him as a gift a golden shield weighing a thousand minas, " in order to confirm the confederacy " with the Romans (1 M. 14.[24]). Again the result was all that was desired, and about B.C. 139 the embassy " came from Rome having letters to the kings and countries " which were under Roman influence, favourable to the Jews (15.[15ff.]).

O

OABDIUS, omitted in AV. (1 Es. 9.[27]), a son of Ela who had married a foreign wife, called " Abdi " in Ez. 10.[26].

OBDIA (1 Es. 5.[38]), corresponding to " Habaiah " in Ez. 2.[61]; " Hobaiah " in Ne. 7.[63].

OBETH, the son of Jonathan (1 Es. 8.[32]), corresponding to " Ebed " in Ez. 8.[6].

OCHIEL, RV. OCHIELUS (1 Es. 1.[9]), corresponding to " Jeiel " in 2 Ch. 35.[9].

OCIDELUS (1 Es. 9.[22]), one who had married a foreign wife. The name seems to be a corruption of " Jozabad," wh. corresponds to it in Ez. 10.[22].

OCINA. Among the places on which " the fear and dread of him fell " at the approach of Holofernes, along the sea coast, are mentioned Sidon, Tyre, Sur, Ocina, and Jemnaan (Jth. 2.[28]). They are evidently named in the order in which they stand, beginning at the north. Sidon and Tyre are well known. The identification of Sur is not so certain (see SUR). But moving southward the city of Acre (PTOLEMAIS) seems best to correspond to Ocina. It was known as " Acon " in the Middle Ages.

ODOLLAM (2 M. 12.[38]), RV. ADULLAM, wh. see.

ODOMERA, AV. ODONARKES, wh. see.

ODONARKES, RV. ODOMERA, an Arab chief slain by Jonathan in the course of a raid from BETH-BASI, where he and his brother Simon had taken refuge from Bacchides (1 M. 9.[66]). It is impossible to account for the form of the name found in AV. It is entirely without MS. support.

OLAMUS, one who had taken a foreign wife (1 Es. 9.[30]), corresponding to " Meshullam " in Ez. 10.[29].

OLYMPIUS, an epithet of Zeus, the Greek god, from Mount Olympus in Thessaly, the fabled home of the gods (2 M. 6.[2]).

OMAERUS (1 Es. 9.[34]), RV. ISMAERUS, wh. see.

OMIARES. See AREUS.

ONIAS, a High Priest of the Jews, was son of Simon II., and succeeded to his office in B.C. 198. The Jews in his time were subject to Syria, whose king, Seleucus IV., Philopator, greatly in want of money to pay the tribute due to Rome, had been informed by Simon, governor of the Temple, of the great riches contained in the sacred treasury, and had commissioned Heliodorus to seize them by force. The attempt, according to the tradition (2 M. 3.), was thwarted by the intercession of O., who was slandered to the king by Simon, as having caused the failure of his officer. On the death of Seleucus (B.C. 175) O. was supplanted in his office by his brother Jason, who paid court to Antiochus Epiphanes, the successor of Seleucus, by offering a larger tribute from the Jews. In turn Jason was supplanted by a younger brother, Menelaus (see MENELAUS), who offered a still larger bribe for the office, and who procured the murder of O. (B.C. 171) on account of a rebuke which he had given him for sacrilege (2 M. 32.–38.). Jews and Gentiles alike were shocked at the sacrilegious murder, which moved to tears even Antiochus Epiphanes " because of the sober and modest behaviour of him that was dead " (2 M. 4.[37]). It was during the High-priesthood of O. that took place the correspondence between the Lacedæmonians and the Jews. See LACEDÆMONIANS.

ONUS (1 Es. 5.[22]), a form of the name ONO.

OREB (2 Es. 2.[33]), RV. HOREB, wh. see.

ORTHOSIA, AV. ORTHOSIAS (1 M. 15.[37]). Pliny (HN. v. 17) places this city north of Tripoli, to the south of the river Eleutherus (Nahr el-Kebīr). According to the Peutinger Tables, it was 12 Roman miles north of Tripoli, and 30 south of Antaradus on the coast of Phœnicia. The site is not certainly identified. Porter locates it on the south bank of Nahr el-Bārid. Hither Tryphon escaped when besieged in Dora by Antiochus Sidetes.

OSAIAS (1 Es. 8.[48]), corresponding to " Jeshaiah " in Ez. 8.[19].

OSEA (2 Es. 13.40), Hoshea, the last monarch of the northern kingdom.

OSEAS (2 Es. 1.39), Hosea the prophet.

OTHONIAS (1 Es. 9.28), corresponding to "Mattaniah" in Ez. 10.27, of which name it is a corruption.

OZIAS. (1) AV. AZIA, wh. see. (2) AV. EZIAS, wh. see. (3) Son of Micha, one of the governors of Bethulia (Jth. 6.15, &c.).

OZIEL, an ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.1).

OZORA, RV. EZORA (1 Es. 9.34), corresponding to "Machnadebai" in Ez. 10.40.

P

PACHON (3 M. 6.38), the name of an Egyptian month, corresponding to April.

PATHEUS (1 Es. 9.23), corresponding to Pethahiah the Levite in Ez. 10.23.

PATROCLUS, the father of Nicanor the Syrian general, the great antagonist of Judas Maccabæus (2 M. 8.9).

PEDIAS, AV. PELIAS (1 Es. 9.34), corresponding to "Bedeiah" in Ez. 10.35.

PELIAS. See preceding article.

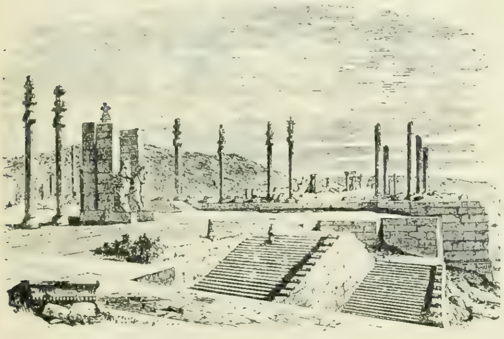
PERIZZITES (Jth. 5.16), AV. PHEREZITES, wh. see.

PERSEPOLIS, the capital of Persia proper, was taken by Alexander the Great and given up to plunder. The royal palaces were also burned. In 2 M. 9.1ff. is recorded an attempt by Antiochus Epiphanes to rob the temple here. The temples, being constructed of stone, may have escaped the conflagration in which the city, mostly of wood, was consumed. The inhabitants defended themselves and their temple against Antiochus, who departed "with dishonour." The ruins of Persepolis, including those of a palace built by Darius Hystaspis, and of another built by Xerxes, are seen at Chehl Minar, "the Forty Pillars," near Istakher. They stood on a platform which had been hewn out of the rock. The city probably lay in the plain below.



PERSEPOLIS

PERSEUS. In 1 M. 8.5 the defeat of Perseus, king of Chittim, by the Romans is mentioned. The reference is to the battle of Pydna, when L. Æmilius Paullus overwhelmed his army. Perseus surrendered to the Roman general, and graced his triumph. Through the influence of his conqueror Perseus was allowed to spend the rest of his days in retirement at Alba. He was reputed son of Philip V. of Macedonia: with his fall the independence of Macedonia ended.

TETRADRACHM OF PERSEUS, KING OF MACEDONIA

PHAATH-MOAB (1 Es. 5.11) = "Pahath-Moab" in Ez. 2.6, &c.

PHACARETH (1 Es. 5.34) = "Pochereth-Hazzebaim" in Ez. 2.57.

PHÆZELDÆUS (1 Es. 5.38, RVm.; "Zorzelleus" in text).

PHAISUR (1 Es. 9.22) = "Pashur" in Ez. 10.22.

PHALDAIUS, RV. PHALDEUS (1 Es. 9.44), corresponding to "Pedaiah" in Ne. 8.4.

PHALEAS (1 Es. 5.29), corresponding to "Padon" in Ez. 2.44.

PHALIAS (1 Es. 9.48), AV. BIATAS, wh. see.

PHALTIEL, AV. SALATHIEL, wh. see (2 Es. 5.16; RVm. "Psaltiel").

PHARACIM, RV. PHARAKIM. The "sons of Pharacim" were a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.31). They are not mentioned in Ezra and Nehemiah.

PHARATHON, AV. PHARATHONI, one of the "strong cities in Judæa" fortified by the Syrian general Bacchides (1 M. 9.50). It is named with Timnath and Tephon. LXX reads "Timnath-pharathon," taking this as the name of one place; and is followed by some authorities. It may be represented now either by Fer'on, c. 15 miles west of Nāblus, or by Fir'ata, c. six miles to the south-west of Nāblus. Prof. G. A. Smith suggests some fortress commanding Wādy Far'ah (HGHL.[1] 355).

PHAREZ (1 Es. 5.9), RV. PHOROS, wh. see.

PHARIDA, RV. PHARIRA (1 Es. 5.33), corresponding to "Peruda" in Ez. 2.55.

PHASELIS is mentioned only in 1 M. 15.23 as one of the cities to which letters were sent from Rome in favour of the Jews. It stood on the Lycian coast near the border of Pamphylia. It was built on a rock between 50 and 100 ft. high, joined to the mainland by a low isthmus. The mountains of Solyma behind it reach a height of over 8000 ft. Between them and the sea runs the narrow pass of Mount Klimax, where Alexander almost perished with his army through overflowing waves driven up by the wind. On either side of the promontory excellent harbours were formed. These in later times were largely used by pirates. The situation gave it many advantages for commerce; and in the sixth cent. B.C. it had a share in the Hellenium at Naucratis in Egypt, where representatives of the various trading communities of the Greeks regulated commercial questions and decided in matters of dispute. Jews naturally found their way to such a trading centre, and in B.C. 139 there appears to have been a considerable colony. Its association with pirates led to the loss of its independence. In the Byzantine time it was the seat of a bishop. It is now represented by Tekir-ovâ. Of ancient remains there are the ruins of a temple, a theatre, and a stadium, while the lines of the masonry of the old harbour can be traced under water.

PHASIRON. The sons of Phasiron are mentioned as an Arabian tribe overcome by Jonathan (1 M. 9.[66]). Nothing further is known of them.

PHASSARON, RV. PHASSURUS (1 Es. 5.[25]), corresponding to "Passhur" in Ez. 2.[38].

PHERESITES, RV. PHEREZITES (1 Es. 8.[69]), the PERIZZITES.

PHEREZITES, AV. PHERESITES (1 Es. 8.[69]), EV. 2 Es. 1.[21] and AV. Jth. 5.[16] = PERIZZITE.

PHILARCHES, RV. "the phylarch" (2 M. 8.[32]). AV. takes this as a proper name. RV. is probably correct in taking it as the title of the officer in command of Timotheus' cavalry, "a most unholy man, who had done the Jews much hurt."

PHILIP. (1) The king of Macedonia, Philip II., father of Alexander the Great (1 M. 1.[1], 6.[2]).

DIDRACHM OF PHILIP V. OF MACEDON

(2) The king mentioned with his reputed son PERSEUS, Philip V. of Macedon (1 M. 8.[5]). (3) A Phrygian left by Antiochus Epiphanes as governor of Jerusalem, described as "more barbarous than him that set him there" (2 M. 5.[22]). He treated the Jews with great barbarity, certain who, out of respect for the Sabbath, would not on that day defend themselves being burned together in a cave where they had taken refuge (2 M. 6.[11]). Alarmed at the increasing power of Judas Maccabæus, he urged action against him, and in consequence Nicanor and Gorgias were despatched with a great army "to destroy the whole race of Judæa" (2 M. 8.[8ff.]). He is probably identical with (4) the foster-brother of Antiochus Epiphanes. When he felt his end approaching, Antiochus "set him over all his kingdom, and gave him his diadem, and his robe, and his signet-ring, to the end he should bring Antiochus his son and nourish him up that he might be king" (1 M. 6.[14f.]). Lysias, then warring in Judæa, obtained possession of the young king, made terms with Judas, and marched against Antioch, which he stormed, and put Philip to death (1 M. 6.[17]; Ant. XII. ix. 7). In 2 M. 9.[29] it is said that Philip, having conveyed home the body of Antiochus, fearing the son, "betook himself to Ptolemy Philometor in Egypt." The two accounts are irreconcilable.

PHINEES. (1) The son of Eleazar the son of Aaron, PHINEHAS (1 Es. 5.[5], 8.[2, 29]; 2 Es. 1.[2]; Sr. 45.[23]; 1 M. 2.[26]). (2) RV. PHINOE (1 Es. 5.[31]), corresponding to "Paseah" in Ez. 2.[49]. (3) A priest in the time of Ezra, father of Eleazar (1 Es. 8.[63]). (4) Phinehas, the son of Heli (Eli) and father of Achias, in the genealogy of Ezra (2 Es. 1.[2]). There is evidently an error here, as Ezra was descended from Eleazar, while Eli belonged to the line of Ithamar.

PHINOE. See PHINEES (2).

PHISON, the Greek form of the name PISON (Sr. 24.[25]).

PHOROS (1 Es. 5.[9], 9.[26]), AV. PHAREZ (8.[30]) = "Parosh" in Ez. 2.[3], 8.[3], 10.[25].

PHRURAI, AV. PHURIM (Est. Ad. 11.[1]) = PURIM.

PHURIM. See preceding art.

PHYLARCH. See PHILARCHES.

PIRA (1 Es. 5.[19]), corresponding to "Chephirah" in Ez. 2.[25].

POSIDONIUS, one of the envoys sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabæus, "to give and to receive pledges of friendship" (2 M. 14.[19]).

PSALTIEL. See PHALTIEL in Canonical Section.

PTOLEMAIS was the name given to the ancient stronghold and seaport of ACCHO, probably by Ptolemy II., Philadelphus. As regards a harbour it was the town most favourably situated on the Palestine coast. It was for a long time a flourishing centre of commerce, and it plays an important part in the history of the period dealt with in the books of the Maccabees and Josephus. It joined with Tyre and Sidon and all Galilee against the Jews (1 M. 5.[15]), and with theirs its forces suffered defeat at the hands of Simon (v. 21f.; Ant. XII. viii. 1, 2, 6). Alexander Balas took it from Demetrius (1 M. 10.[1]), and the latter assigned it and the land pertaining to it to the Jews, as a source of revenue for the Temple (v. 39). Here, after the fall of Demetrius, Alexander married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy (vv. 57f.). On the invitation of Alexander, Jonathan met the two kings here, was honourably entertained, and received from them many valuable gifts (vv. 59ff.; Ant. XIII. iv. 1, 6, 9). In Ptolemais Jonathan was treacherously taken by Trypho (1 M. 12.[45ff.]; Ant. XIII. vi. 2; BJ. I. ii. 1). Besieged in succession by Alexander Jannæus and Ptolemy Lathyrus (Ant. XIII. xii. 4), it was taken by Cleopatra, the mother of the latter (ib. xiii. 2). It was taken and at once relinquished by Tigranes the Armenian (ib. xvi. 4; BJ. I. v. 3). Ptolemais opened its gates to Pacorus the Parthian (Ant. XIV. xiii. 3; BJ. I. xiii. 1); finally it fell to Rome, and was made a colony with the title Colonia Claudii Cæsaris Ptolemais. Ptolemais was a natural base for successive Roman generals operating against the Jews. Later it was the seat of a bishop.

PTOLEMAIS

PTOLEMY (Ptolemaios, "warlike"). Out of the chaos that resulted on the death of Alexander the Great in B.C. 323 there arose four kingdoms (Dn. 8.[8]): the Western or Greek kingdom proper, the Northern or Armenian, the Eastern or Syrian, and the Southern or Egyptian. Ptolemy was the name of the Macedonian line of kings that succeeded to the Egyptian portion of Alexander's empire. They were also called Lagidæ, from Ptolemy Lagus, the founder of the dynasty.

Ptolemy I. (Soter, "Saviour," perhaps from his successful defence of the Rhodians in B.C. 306), the son of Lagus and Arsinoë, the mistress of Philip, was born about B.C. 367. After assuming the satrapy of Egypt, he was engaged in numerous campaigns, first against Perdiccas, and afterwards against Antigonus of Syria. As formerly, Judæa was the great bone of contention between East and West. On the whole the Jews were kindly treated by Ptolemy, and the Jewish colony in Alexandria rapidly increased in numbers. It was not until B.C. 305 that Ptolemy assumed the title of king. Judæa was formally annexed by him in B.C. 301. During this reign the famous museum at Alexandria and the equally famous library were founded. Soter was a great patron of art and literature, encouraging learned Greeks, like Euclid, to make Alexandria their home. He was himself a man of kindliness, courtesy, and good sense. In B.C. 285 he abdicated in favour of his son, and he died in B.C. 283. He is referred to in Dn. 11.[5] as "the king of the south."

Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus, "brother-loving"), the second son of Soter, succeeded in B.C. 285.

Unembarrassed by foreign wars, he devoted himself to various internal administrative and agricultural reforms. He also fostered trade and built the great

OCTODRACHM OF PTOLEMY II

"Pharos." Like his predecessor, he brought many eminent poets and artists to Alexandria. During his reign Manetho wrote his Greek history of Egypt, and the Greek version of the OT. (Septuagint) was begun. Allusion is made to this king in Dn. 11.^{6}. He died in B.C. 247.

Ptolemy III. (Euergetes, "benefactor"), succeeded his father in B.C. 247. The stele of Canopus was set up in the ninth year of his reign. An ambitious prince, he carried his conquests far into the east and south. While his own tastes were mainly scientific, the general literary brilliance of the Alexandrian school was still maintained. Dn. 11.$^{7-9}$ refers to the origin of his title, viz. the restoration of the Egyptian idols carried off by Cambyses nearly three centuries before. He died in B.C. 222.

OCTODRACHM (EGYPTIAN TALENT) OF PTOLEMY III

Ptolemy IV. (Philopator, "father-loving"), succeeded his father in B.C. 222. He was forced into a war to recover Palestine, and defeated Antiochus the Great at Raphia in B.C. 217. The dynasty began to decline with this dissolute prince. At Jerusalem on one occasion he incensed the Jews by attempting to enter the Holy of Holies. Afterwards he persecuted them. In his reign the first great revolution broke out, and Egyptian influence generally began to wane. Reference is made to him in Dn. 11.$^{10-12}$. He died in B.C. 205.

TETRADRACHM OF PTOLEMY IV

Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes, "illustrious") succeeded his father at the age of five. Antiochus then renewed his attack, this time successfully. The Egyptians under Scopas were badly beaten, and Palestine, with Cœle-Syria, passed finally from Egyptian into Syrian control. Antiochus next betrothed his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy, and gave him as her dowry the taxes of the conquered provinces. The Romans now began to interfere in the affairs of Egypt. Ptolemy was poisoned in B.C. 181. The Rosetta stone was set up in the eighth year of this reign.

Ptolemy VI. (Eupator, "of noble father"), the son of the above, reigned only a few months, B.C. 181.

TETRADRACHM OF PTOLEMY V

Ptolemy VII. (Philometor, "mother-loving"), son of Ptolemy V., succeeded in B.C. 181. For the first seven years the kingdom was under the regency of his mother Cleopatra. In B.C. 171 Antiochus captured the young king, but his brother, Euergetes II., Ptolemy IX., was raised to the throne by the Alexandrians. The two brothers reigned conjointly from B.C. 170 to 165. Then Philometor reigned as sole monarch from 165 till his death in B.C. 146. He was a good ruler, mild and benevolent; and is mentioned by name in 1 M. 1.^{18}. Dn.

TETRADRACHM OF PTOLEMY VI

11.$^{25-30}$ refers to his war with Antiochus. From this point Roman ascendency in Egypt became more marked, while the personal character of the Ptolemies rapidly degenerated.

Ptolemy VIII. (Philopator Neos), the young son of Philometor, reigned a few months, and was then murdered by Physcon, B.C. 146.

Ptolemy IX., Euergetes II. (Physcon, "fat-paunch"), brother of Ptolemy VII., began his long reign in B.C. 146. A strong and ambitious ruler, he extended his sway into Nubia far beyond that of his predecessors. His enemies have painted him as a monster of cruelty and vice, calling him by the nicknames Physcon and Kakergetes. He is the Euergetes referred to in the Prologue to Sirach. He died in B.C. 117.

Ptolemy X., Soter II., Philometor II. (Lathyrus), son of Physcon, reigned jointly with his mother, Cleopatra, until his banishment in B.C. 107, when his younger brother, Ptolemy XI., Alexander I., was made co-regent with his mother. Ptolemy XI. was himself banished in B.C. 89, and slain in B.C. 87. Ptolemy X. was then recalled, and died in B.C. 81. Ptolemy X. was a kind and humane ruler, like his uncle Philometor. During this period of restlessness, the Romans greatly strengthened their position in Egypt.

Ptolemy XII., Alexander II., son of Ptolemy XI., was slain, after a reign of nineteen days, in B.C. 81. With him the legitimate succession of the Lagidæ became extinct.

Ptolemy XIII. (Auletes, "flute-player"), a natural son of Lathyrus, reigned from B.C. 81 to 52. His second daughter was the famous Cleopatra, born in B.C. 68. He was "the most idle and worthless of the Ptolemies." Driven from his kingdom by his oppressed subjects, he bribed the Romans to restore him.

Ptolemy XIV., son of the above, according to his father's will was to marry Cleopatra, his sister, and reign jointly with her, B.C. 52. But he banished Cleopatra, who was brought back by Cæsar, B.C. 48. Ptolemy XIV. was drowned, when his younger brother, Ptolemy XV., was made co-regent with Cleopatra by Cæsar, B.C. 47. Cleopatra caused him to be put to death, B.C. 45, and she assumed her son by Cæsar, Cæsarion, as co-regent under the title of Ptolemy XVI. After the murder of Cæsarion, and the suicide of Cleopatra, Egypt became a Roman province in B.C. 30.

J. M'GILCHRIST.

PYRAMID. Pyramids appear only in connection with the mausoleum erected by Simon Maccabæus for his family at Modin (1 M. 13.[28]; Ant. XIII. vi. 6). These pyramids were built on the top of the structure (see MODIN). There is nothing to show whether or not they varied in size. The idea of the sepulchral pyramid may have been borrowed from Egypt.

Q

QUINTUS MEMMIUS. See MEMMIUS.

R

RABSACES (Sr. 48.[18]), RV. RABSHAKEH, wh. see in Canonical Section.

RAGAU. See following art.

RAGES is mentioned frequently in the book of Tobit, and twice (1.[5, 15]) in that of Judith. Here Tobit had deposited ten talents of silver, for the recovery of which his son Tobias set out, accompanied by the angel Raphael; and by the help of the latter the treasure was secured (To. 1.[14], 4.[1], &c.). In Judith the name appears in the form of Ragau.

The city of Rages occupied a position of great strategic importance in North-eastern Media. The site is identified with Rhey, a ruin of imposing character and extent, about five miles south-east of Teheran. It commanded the Caspian Gates, the one pass over the mountain communicating between Bactria, India, and Afghanistan, and Media and Mesopotamia. According to an ancient tradition, it was the birthplace of Zoroaster. Frawartish, the Median rebel, when defeated by Darius Hystaspes, fled to Rages. Here he was captured and carried to Ecbatana for execution (Behistun Inscription, in which it is called Ragā). It was visited by Alexander in his pursuit of Darius Codomannas. Seleucus I. rebuilt it under the name of Europus. For a time under the Parthians it was called Arsacia.

The ruins cover an area of 4500 × 3500 yards. The walls are of enormous thickness. They were flanked by towers of great strength, and connected with a lofty citadel at the north-eastern angle.

RAGUEL, a pious Jew in the city of Ecbatana, the husband of Edna, and father of Sarah, who became the wife of Tobias the son of Tobit. He belonged to the kindred of Tobit (To. 3.[7, 17], 6.[12], &c.). The name appears in En. 20.[4] as that of an archangel.

RAMATHEM, RV. RAMATHAIM (1 M. 11.[34]), the seat of a "government" transferred from Samaria to Judæa by Demetrius Nicator. It is probably identical with RAMATHAIM, which see in Canonical Section.

RAMESSE (Jth. 1.[9]), RV. RAMESES, which see in Canonical Section.

RAPHAEL, "God heals," describes himself as "one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints, and go in before the glory of the Holy One" (To. 12.[15]; cp. Rv. 8.[7]). In the book of Tobit he assumes the form and name of Azarias ("J''. is a help"), a kinsman of Tobit, and is appointed the guide and companion of Tobias in his journey. Azarias relieves Sarah of the distress caused by Asmodæus, secures for Tobias the treasure deposited in Rages, conducts Tobias and his wife safely home, and heals Tobit of his blindness. Thereafter he reveals his true character, shows how he brought the prayer of Tobit and of Sarah before the Holy One, and how he was with Tobit in the pious deeds that had exposed him to peril.

The functions assigned to Raphael in Jewish tradition are in harmony with his name. He is a healer. His place is behind the throne with the standard of Ephraim, and he is to heal the breach in Israel caused by the schism of Jeroboam, a member of that tribe. Note the healing of Sarah and of Tobit. In the book of Enoch he is called the angel of the spirits of men; and by removing the fallen angels who had married women he is to heal the earth which they had polluted. He was one of Abraham's angelic visitors, his business being to give Sarah strength to conceive seed. After the Flood the descendants of Noah became the victims of a variety of ailments. Raphael is said to have instructed Noah as to the curative properties of plants and roots, these instructions being written in a Book of Noah (Rönsch, Buch der Jubiläen, 385f.).

RAPHAIM, an ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8.^{1}).

RAPHON, a city east of the Jordan, "beyond the brook" or wādy, and apparently not far from Carnaim. Timotheus, with a mixed host, encamped against it, but was utterly routed by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 5.$^{37ff.}$; Ant. XII. viii. 4). It is probably identical with Raphana mentioned by Pliny (HN. V. xviii. 74); but the site is still in doubt.

RASSES. The children of Rasses are named with the children of Ishmael as having been spoiled by Holofernes in the course of his march against Judæa (Jth. 2.^{23}). Vlg. reads Tharsis (Tarsus), which some think may be the original. Others have suggested Rhosos, a mountain range and town on the Gulf of Issus. Others, again, think Rosh (Ek. 38.^{2}, &c.) may be intended. There is really nothing to lead to any certain decision.

RATHUMUS, "the story writer," or recorder (1 Es. 2.^{16}, &c.), corresponds to "Rehum the chancellor" in Ez. 4.^{8}, &c.

RAZIS, an elder of Jerusalem, "a lover of his countrymen, and a man of very good report, and one called Father of the Jews for his good will toward them . . . who had jeoparded body and life with all earnestness for the religion of the Jews" (2 M. 14.$^{37ff.}$). Nicanor, hearing of this man, designing to strike a heavy blow at the Jews, sent a company to take him. Rather than fall into Nicanor's hands, he committed suicide. The revolting details of his action are chronicled with obvious admiration by the writer of 2 Maccabees. A noteworthy point is his clear confidence that "the Lord of the life and the spirit" was able to restore him.

REELIAS, AV. REELIUS (1 Es. 5.^{8}), apparently a scribal error duplicating the name of "Reelaiah" (see REESAIAH), instead of Bigvai, which occupies this place in Ez. 2.^{2}; Ne. 7.^{7}.

REESAIAS, RV. RESAIAS (Ez. 5.^{8}), corresponding to "Reelaiah" in Ez. 2.^{2}.

RESAIAS. See preceding art.

RHODOCHUS, a soldier in the ranks of Judas Maccabæus who betrayed "the secrets," no doubt the plans, of Judas to Antiochus Eupator. His guilt becoming known, "he was sought out and taken and shut up in prison" (2 M. 13.^{21}).

RHODUS (1 M. 15.^{23}), RV. RHODES, wh. see in Canonical Section.

ROIMUS (1 Es. 5.^{8}), corresponding to "Rehum" in Ez. 2.^{2}.

ROSIN, RV. NAPHTHA (ST.^{23}), part of the fuel thrown in to heat the furnace into which the three Hebrew youths were put.

S

SABANNEUS (1 Es. 9.^{33}), AV. BANNAIA, wh. see.

SABANNUS, AV. SABBAN (1 Es. 8.^{63}), corresponding to "Binnui" in Ez. 8.^{33}.

SABAT. (1) RV. SAPHAT (1 Es. 5.^{34}), head of a family of Solomon's servants. There is no name to correspond with this in Ezra and Nehemiah. (2) The month Sebat (1 M. 16.^{14}).

SABATEAS, RV. SABATEUS (1 Es. 9.^{48}), corresponding to "Shabbethai" in Ne. 8.^{7}.

SABATHUS, AV. SABATUS (1 Es. 9.^{28}), corresponding to "Zabad" in Ez. 10.^{27}.

SABBAN, RV. SABANNUS, wh. see.

SABBATEUS, AV. SABBATHEUS (1 Es. 9.^{14}), corresponding to "Shabbethai" in Ez. 10.^{15}.

SABBATHEUS. See preceding art.

SABBEUS (1 Es. 9.^{32}), corresponding to "Shemaiah" in Ez. 10.^{31}.

SABI. (1) 1 Es. 5.^{28}, AV. SAMI, corresponding to "Shobai" in Ez. 2.^{42}. (2) 1 Es. 5.^{34}, RV. SABIE. In the corresponding lists of Ezra (2.^{57}) and Nehemiah (7.^{59}) we read "the children of Pochereth-hazzebaim," AV. "Pochereth of Zebaim."

SABIAS (1 Es. 1.^{9}), AV. ASSABIAS, wh. see.

SADAMIAS, AV. SALEMAS (2 Es. 1.^{1}), corresponding to "Shallum" in 1 Ch. 6.^{12}.

SADAS, RV. ASTAD, wh. see.

SADDEUS, RV. LODDEUS (1 Es. 8.^{45}), in 1 Es. 8.^{46} AV. called DADDEUS, wh. see.

SADDUC, RV. SADDUK (1 Es. 8.^{2}), Zadok the High Priest; ancestor of Ezra (Ez. 7.^{2}).

SALAMIEL, AV. SAMAEL (Jth. 8.[1]), called "Shelumiel" in Nu. 1.[6], &c.

SALASADAI (Jth. 8.[1]), one of the ancestors of Judith.

SALEM, AV. SALUM (1 Es. 8.[1]), an ancestor of Ezra, corresponding to "Shallum" in Ez. 7.[2]; called Salemas in 2 Es. 1.[1] (AV. Sadamias).

SALEMAS (2 Es. 1.[1]), AV. SADAMIAS, wh. see. See also preceding art.

SALIMOTH, AV. ASSALIMOTH, wh. see.

SALLAMUS, AV. SALLUMUS (1 Es. 9.[25]), corresponding to "Shallum" in Ez. 10.[24].

SALMANASAR (2 Es. 13.[40]) = Shalmaneser, wh. see.

SALOAS, AV. TALSAS (1 Es. 9.[22]), corresponding to "Elasah" in Ez. 10.[22].

SALOM. (1) Ba. 1.[7] = Shallum, father of Hilkiah. (2) 1 M. 2.[26], RV. SALU, father of Zimri (Nu. 25.[14]).

SALU. See preceding art.

SALUM. (1) 1 Es. 5.[28], head of a family of gate-keepers, corresponding to "Shallum" in Ez. 2.[42]. (2) AV. SALEM, wh. see.

SAMAEL, RV. SALAMIEL, wh. see.

SAMAIAS. (1) 1 Es. 1.[9], a Levite in the days of Josiah, corresponding to "Shemaiah" in 2 Ch. 35.[9]. (2) 1 Es. 8.[39], a son of Adonikam, corresponding to "Shemaiah" in Ez. 8.[13]. (3) To. 5.[13], RV. SHEMAIAH, the father of Ananias and Jathan.

SAMATUS (1 Es. 9.[34]), a son of Esora, possibly corresponding to "Shallum" in Ez. 10.[42].

SAMEIUS, RV. SAMEUS (1 Es. 9.[21]), corresponding to "Shemaiah" in Ez. 10.[21].

SAMELLIUS, AV. SEMELLIUS (1 Es. 2.[16], &c.), corresponding to "Shimshai the scribe" in Ez. 4.[8].

SAMEUS. See Sameius.

SAMI, RV. SABI, wh. see.

SAMIS, RV. SAMEIS (1 Es. 9.[34]), corresponding to "Shimei" in Ez. 10.[38].

SAMMUS (1 Es. 9.[43]), corresponding to "Shema" in Ne. 8.[4].

SAMPSAMES, mentioned in the list of peoples to whom letters from Rome were sent, favourable to the Jews (1 M. 15.[23]). No probable identification has been suggested.

SANAAS, AV. ANNAAS, wh. see.

SANABASSAR (1 Es. 2.[12, 15]), corresponding to "Sheshbazzar" in Ez. 1.[8, 11].

SANABASSARUS (1 Es. 6.[18, 20]), corresponding to "Sheshbazzar" in Ez. 5.[14, 16].

SANASIB, the head of a priestly family (1 Es. 5.[24]), not named in Ezra and Nehemiah.

SAPHAT. (1) AV. SABAT, head of a family of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es. 5.[34]). (2) 1 Es. 5.[9], corresponding to "Shephatiah" in Ez. 2.[4].

SAPHATIAS (1 Es. 8.[34]), corresponding to "Shephatiah" in Ez. 8.[8], called Saphat in 1 Es. 5.[9].

SAPHETH, RV. SAPHUTHI (1 Es. 5.[33]), corresponding to "Shephatiah" in Ez. 2.[57].

SAPHUTHI. See preceding art.

SARABIAS (1 Es. 9.[48]), corresponding to "Sherebiah" in Ne. 8.[7].

SARAIAS. (1) 1 Es. 5.[5], Seraiah, the High Priest in the time of Zedekiah (1 Ch. 6.[14]). (2) Seraiah, the father of Ezra (1 Es. 8.[1]; cp. Ez. 7.[1]).

SARAMEL (1 M. 14.[28]), RV. ASARAMEL, wh. see.

SARCHEDONUS (To. 1.[21]), a form of the name of Esar-haddon. Properly it should be "Sacherdonus."

SARDEUS, RV. ZARDEUS (1 Es. 9.[28]), corresponding to "Aziza" in Ez. 10.[27].

SAREA, one of the swift scribes of Esdras (2 Es. 14.[24]).

SAROTHIE, head of a family of Solomon's servants (1 Es. 5.[34]), not named in Ezra and Nehemiah.

SATHRABUZANES (1 Es. 6.[3]), AVm. "Shethar-boznai," cp. Ez. 5.[3], &c.

SAVARAN (1 M. 6.[43]), RV. AVARAN, which see.

SAVIAS (1 Es. 8.[2]), an ancestor of Ezra, corresponding to "Uzzi" in Ez. 7.[4].

SCYTHIANS. The references in 3 M. 7.[5], "With a cruelty more barbarous than the customs of the Scythians," and 2 M. 4.[47], "Those hapless men . . . if they had pleaded even before Scythians would have been discharged uncondemned," show the fashion in which that people were regarded. They served, indeed, as the popular embodiment of what was rude and barbarous. See Scythians in Canonical Section.

SCYTHOPOLIS (Jth. 3.[10]; 2 M. 12.[29]) was the name given to Beth-shean in Greek times. The origin of the name is obscure. It may possibly be traced to the invasion by the Scythians who, George Syncellus says, "overran Palestine, and took possession of Beisan, which from them is called Scythopolis." Herodotus records an invasion of Palestine by the Scythians, c. B.C. 600 (i. 104–6), which may be identical with this. See Beth-shean in Canonical Section.

SECHENIAS. (1) 1 Es. 8.[29], called "Shechaniah" in Ez. 8.[3]. (2) 1 Es. 8.[32], called "Shechaniah" in Ez. 8.[5].

SEDECIAS. See next art.

SEDEKIAS. (1) AV. ZEDECHIAS (1 Es. 1.[46]), King Zedekiah of Judah. (2) AV. SEDECIAS (Ba. 1.[1]), the father of Maaseas, an ancestor of Baruch. (3) AV. SEDECIAS (Ba. 1.[8]), son of Josiah, king of Judah.

SELEMIA, one of the swift scribes of Esdras (2 Es. 14.[24]).

SELEMIAS (1 Es. 9.[34]), called "Shelemiah" in Ez. 10.[39].

SELEUCID KINGS, THE. The Seleucidæ, or descendants of Seleucus, were kings of Syria from 312 to 65 B.C. The dynasty (including the alien usurpers, Alexander Balas, Diodotus Tryphon, Alexander Zebina (or Zabinas), and Tigranes) comprised the following twenty-six monarchs :—

Their Succession.

		Reigned B.C.
1.	SELEUCUS I., Nicator, "The Conqueror"	312–280
2.	ANTIOCHUS I., Soter, "The Saviour"	280–261
3.	ANTIOCHUS II., Theos, "The God" ("king of the north," Dan. 11.[6])	261–246
4.	SELEUCUS II., Callinicus, "The Gloriously Triumphant"	246–226
5.	SELEUCUS III., Ceraunus, "The Thunderbolt"	226–223
6.	ANTIOCHUS III., The Great	223–187
7.	SELEUCUS IV., Philopater, "Fond of his Father"	187–175
8.	ANTIOCHUS IV., Epiphanes, "The Illustrious" Epimanes, "The Madman"	175–164
9.	ANTIOCHUS V., Eupator, "The Son of a Good Sire"	164–162
10.	DEMETRIUS I., Soter, "The Saviour"	162–150
11.	ALEXANDER BALAS	150–146
12.	DEMETRIUS II., Nicator, "The Conqueror"	146–138, 128–125
13.	ANTIOCHUS VI., Theos, "The God"	144–142
14.	DIODOTUS, Tryphon, "The Voluptuous"	142–137
15.	ANTIOCHUS VII., Sidetes	137–128
16.	ALEXANDER ZEBINA (ZABINAS)	127–122
17.	ANTIOCHUS VIII., Grypus, "The Hook-nosed," son of Sidetes, conqueror of Zebina	125–96
18.	SELEUCUS V., Nicator, "The Conqueror"	125–123
19.	ANTIOCHUS IX., Cyzicenus, "Of Cyzicus," half brother of Grypus	111–95
20.	SELEUCUS VI., Epiphanes, "The Illustrious"	96–94
21.	ANTIOCHUS X., Eusebes, "The Pious"	95–83
22.	ANTIOCHUS XI., Epiphanes II., "The Illustrious," younger brother of Seleucus	94–83
23.	DEMETRIUS III., Eucærus, "The Happy," third brother of Seleucus	94–83
24.	TIGRANES, The Great	83–69
25.	ANTIOCHUS XII., Dionysius, "The Devotee of Bacchus"	69–65
26.	ANTIOCHUS XIII., Asiaticus, "The Asiatic"	69–65

Their History.—SELEUCUS I., the son of Antiochus, one of Philip of Macedonia's lieutenants, was born about B.C. 350, and followed his father's vocation in the service of Philip's more famous son, who did not live long enough to weld into one united and well-compacted empire the vast congeries of foreign countries and alien peoples which he had conquered, and which at his early death in B.C. 323 was divided among his generals. For having assisted to secure the fall of Perdiccas, when a second partition of Alexander's dominions was made, Seleucus obtained the important satrapy of Babylon. He added thereafter to his suzerainty the province of Susiana by Antigonus' assistance, but, having quarrelled with him, had to flee to Egypt in B.C. 316, whence, after Ptolemy's victory at Gaza over Antigonus' son Demetrius, he returned in B.C. 312 in triumph to Babylon. Susiana recovered and Media conquered, Seleucus' rule now extended to the Oxus and the Indus, though little is known of his campaign against the Hindu king Chandragupta of Pataliputra. In B.C. 306 he assumed the title of king, and in 302 joined the coalition against Antigonus. Next year, having helped by his cavalry and elephants to win the battle of Ipsus, he became the most powerful of Alexander's successors, and obtained the largest share in the conquered provinces, the whole of Syria and most of Asia Minor falling to him. After defeating Demetrius, whose daughter he had previously married, and Lysimachus, his rule now extended westwards to the Ægean. He was assassinated at the instigation of Ptolemy Ceraunus in B.C. 280. According to Pausanius, his moral character was superior to that of any of his Macedonian rivals, and his name unsullied by any of their atrocities, while of his genius as general and statesman we have ample proof. He continued the Hellenising policy of Alexander, founding colonies of his countrymen throughout his vast dominions, and building such cities as Apamea on the Orontes (named after his wife Apame, daughter of the Persian prince Artabazus), Laodicea (Col. 4.[15, 16]; Rv. 3.[14]), Edessa, Berœa (Ac. 17.[10, 13]), Seleucia on the Tigris, and Antioch in Syria, the last two of which soon took rank among the most powerful and wealthy cities of the ancient world.

ANTIOCHUS I., the son of Seleucus and Apame, and named (Greek fashion) after his grandfather, was born a year before Alexander died. He succeeded to his father's vast dominions, but, on his marriage to Phile, abandoned Macedonia to Antigonus Gonatus. He derived his title of "Saviour" from a victory gained by his elephant corps over the Gauls, who had invaded Asia Minor, leaving the evidence of their presence in the name Galatia; but he was ultimately defeated and killed by these northern invaders.

ANTIOCHUS II. was the feeble and incompetent son of the last-named king, and was forced by Ptolemy ("the king of the south," Dn. 11.[6]) to marry his daughter Berenice. On Ptolemy's death he recalled Laodice, his first wife, but she avenged her insult by causing her son Seleucus to murder his father, as well as Berenice and her son. The provinces of Parthia and Bactria were lost during this reign.

SELEUCUS II. was expelled from his kingdom by Ptolemy Euergetes, to avenge his murder of Berenice, but recovered his throne on Ptolemy withdrawing his forces, and, in spite of a crushing defeat, kept the Egyptians out of Syria and the greater part of Asia Minor; but was utterly routed by Arsaces I. of Parthia on his attempting to recover Parthia and Bactria; nor could he prevent Attalus, king of Pergamus, wresting from his control several provinces on the north-west of his kingdom.

SELEUCUS III. was his son, who was succeeded after three years' reign by ANTIOCHUS III., "The

TETRADRACHM (ATTIC TALENT) OF ANTIOCHUS III

Great," who in resisting Egyptian invasion, though beaten at Gaza, defeated Scopas and secured possession of Palestine and Cœle-Syria; and, in return for assistance then rendered to him by the Jews, bestowed special privileges on them. Through fear of Rome he made peace with Egypt, and betrothed his daughter Cleopatra to the youthful Ptolemy; but the Romans, after defeating Philip, assumed the guardianship of Ptolemy, and demanded the surrender by Antiochus of the Thracian Chersonese,

TETRADRACHM (ATTIC TALENT) OF ANTIOCHUS IV., EPIPHANES

along with those places once held by their ward. Antiochus was defeated at Thermopylæ by Acilius Glabrio in B.C. 191, and forced back into Asia, where he was defeated by Scipio and forced to accept hard terms. He was killed in B.C. 187 in a riot at Elymais, due to his plundering the temple there to help pay the Roman tribute (cp. Dn. 11.[18, 20]).

SELEUCUS IV., the son of Antiochus III., desisted from his attempt to recover the northern provinces taken by Attalus, the ally of the Romans.

TETRADRACHM (ATTIC TALENT) OF DEMETRIUS I

ANTIOCHUS IV. recovered Palestine and Cœle-Syria, which his father had surrendered, but withdrew, at Rome's bidding, from Egypt. His "Hellenising" policy was resisted by the Jews, who became the victims of unspeakable atrocities through his determined attempt to extirpate their religion, which was, however, foiled by the spirited resistance of the MACCABEES (which see). He died raving mad —a fate attributed to his sacrilege and cruelty by his subjects, who, in consequence, travestied his title from Epiphanēs to Epimanēs.

Of the succeeding monarchs, DEMETRIUS I. lost Judæa and was defeated and slain by the usurper, ALEXANDER BALAS, who was in turn overthrown by DEMETRIUS II. The latter was taken prisoner by the Parthians (who thus became masters of Babylonia, the centre of the Seleucid dominion), and let Syria fall into the hands of DIODOTUS, who first placed a puppet king, ANTIOCHUS VI., the son of Balas, on the throne, and then took his place, to be in turn deposed, however, by ANTIOCHUS VII., who thus restored the royal line of the Seleucidæ; but from the close of Demetrius Nicator's second reign, when Ptolemy Physcon had set up the impostor, ALEXANDER ZEBINA, the throne was occupied by two, or even three royal partners, except once, when Tigranes, king of Armenia, ousted, at the earnest solicitation of their Syrian subjects, the detested rival occupants. It is thus no wonder that Pompey

TETRADRACHM (ATTIC TALENT) OF DEMETRIUS II

TETRADRACHM (ATTIC TALENT) OF ANTIOCHUS VI

in B.C. 65 converted the now diminished and divided empire of the Seleucidæ into a Roman provincia.

Their Relations with Palestine.—From its geographical position, midway between Egypt and Armenia, Palestine became "the stage across which the 'kings of the south,' the Alexandrian Ptolemies, and the 'kings of the north,' the Seleucidæ from Antioch, passed to and fro with their court intrigues and incessant armies, their Indian elephants, their Grecian cavalry, their Oriental pomp. It was, for the larger part of the century and a half that succeeded Alexander's death, a province of the Græco-Egyptian kingdom" (Stanley, Jewish Church, iii. 243).

The remembrance of these Syro-Egyptian campaigns is preserved in the book of Daniel (11.$^{6-11}$). Though the Jews as a rule remained neutral in the struggle for the possession of their land, calmly awaiting their fate at the hands of northern or southern invader as the case might be, they preferred the latter till Ptolemy Philopator cruelly persecuted them (or was reputed to have done so; cp. 3 M.), when those of the Jews who favoured the Seleucidæ gained strength, and secured for Antiochus III. the assistance of their nation. Notwithstanding Antiochus' promise of Palestine as part of Cleopatra's dowry, it still remained a part of the Syrian kingdom, when his son, Seleucus IV., "caused an exactor (Heliodorus, 2 M. 3.$^{7-40}$) to pass through the glory of the kingdom," i.e. Judæa (Dn. 11.^{20}); but as the execrated Antiochus IV. benefited by Heliodorus' assassination, he naturally came to be regarded as the real murderer (Dn. 7.$^{7, 8, 24}$).

Their Era.—The Seleucid era, sometimes called the era of the Greeks or Syro-Macedonians, and also, incorrectly, the era of Alexander, dates from the first year of the 117th Olympiad, A.U.C. 442 = April 1st, B.C. 312. It is one of the best known and most used systems of chronology in Western Asia. It is found employed in the first book of Maccabees 6.^{16} ("the 149th year" [Sel. Era] = B.C. 312–164), 7.^{15} ("the 151st year" [Sel. Era] = B.C. 312–162), and 10.^{1} ("the 160th year" [Sel. Era] = B.C. 312–153); in Greek coins and inscriptions, in the works of the Church Fathers, in acts of Church councils, &c. The Jews adopted it after their submission to the kings of Syria, and called it Tarik Dilkarnaim or "Era of Contracts," because its use was obligatory in drawing up legal documents. It is still in use among the Christians of the Lebanon as well as Mussulman authors, who prefer it to that of the Hegira. But the peoples who made use of the Seleucid era did not date it from the same month or day. Thus the Greeks of Syria made it begin with the month of September and the other Syrians with the month of October—usages still followed, the first by the Catholics of the Lebanon, the second by the Nestorians and Jacobites. The Jews made it begin with the autumnal equinox. Various towns even had their own way of beginning the era; e.g. in Seleucia New Year's Day was the 1st of July, at Ephesus it was the 24th of September, at Tyre the 15th, and at Gaza the 27th of October, &c. With some Arabs the Seleucid New Year's Day is the 1st of September, with others the 1st of October.

P. HENDERSON AITKEN.

SELEUCUS. See SELEUCID KINGS.

SEMEI (1 Es. 9.^{33}), called "Shimei" in Ez. 10.^{33}.

SEMEIS, AV. SEMIS (1 Es. 9.^{23}), corresponding to "Shimei the Levite" in Ez. 10.^{23}.

SEMELLIUS (1 Es. 2.^{16}, &c.), corresponding to "Shimshai the scribe" in Ez. 4.^{8}.

SERAR, AV. ASERER, which see.

SEREBIAS (1 Es. 8.^{54} AVm.), called "Sherebiah" in Ez. 8.^{18}.

SERON, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes. He commanded the Syrian army which was defeated by Judas Maccabæus at Beth-horon, B.C. 166 (1 M. 3.$^{13-24}$). Josephus says that he was governor of Cœle-Syria, and that he was slain in this battle (Ant. XII. vii. 1).

SESIS (1 Es. 9.^{34}), corresponding to "Shashai" in Ez. 10.^{40}.

SESTHEL (1 Es. 9.^{31}), corresponding to "Bezaleel" in Ez. 10.^{30}.

SHEPHELA, RV. "plain country" (1 M. 12.^{38}) = SHEPHELAH, which see.

SICYON. This town is mentioned in the list of places to which letters favourable to the Jews were sent from Rome (1 M. 15.^{23}). Sicyon lay on the shore of the Gulf of Corinth, about 18 miles to the NW. of Corinth. Originally called Aigialē, the name Sicyon may have been given by Phœnician traders. Possessing a good harbour, it became a place of considerable commercial importance. The city stood on the plain, with an Acropolis on the cliffs behind. After its capture by Demetrius Poliorcetes, B.C. 303, the buildings on the plain were destroyed, and a new city built round the Acropolis on the heights. The position was one of great strength, and easy of defence. Sicyon favoured the Romans, and after the destruction of Corinth was entrusted with the management of the Isthmian Games. This, however, was restored to Corinth when she was refounded by Julius Cæsar. The inhabitants of Sicyon were famed for their skill and industry, and for the excellence of their manufactures (Strabo, 382). Naturally it attracted the attention of the Jews of the Dispersion, and at an early time a colony was found in the city. In their interests the letter referred to was sent.

SIDE, a city to which a letter favourable to the Jews was sent by Lucius, the consul of the Romans (1 M. 15.^{23}). It stood on a low peninsula on the coast of Pamphylia, between the rivers Eurymedon on the west and Melas on the east. Open to the sea, with its splendid harbours, and piers for loading and discharge of cargo, it was strongly fortified on the landward side. Its interests were mainly maritime. Originally a Phœnician settlement, it was colonised from Cyme. It continued, however, in close relations with the parent people; and the ships of Side with those of Aradus formed the left wing of the fleet of Antiochus the Great. After the time of Alexander the Great it was much frequented by pirates. After the defeat of Antiochus, under the Romans Side played an important part, as is proved by her coins, which still exist in great numbers. There was a strong Jewish element in the community.

The place, known as Eski Adalia, is now deserted. The harbours are silted up. The ruins are extensive and imposing, especially those of the theatre, which was in great part cut out of the solid rock.

From Side Antiochus VII. took his name Sidetes, having been brought up in the city.

SIMALCUE. See IMALCUE.

SIMEON, grandfather of Mattathias (1 M. 2.[1]).

SIMON. (1) 1 Es. 9.[32], Simon Chosameus, corresponding to "Shimeon" in Ez. 10.[31]. (2) Son of Mattathias and brother of Judas, surnamed Thassi (1 M. 2.[3]); see MACCABEES. (3) A man of the tribe of Benjamin who, in revenge against Onias, betrayed to Heliodorus a knowledge of the Temple treasures; see HELIODORUS. (4) and (5) There are two men of the same name, the one the grandfather of the other; both "son of Onias." Josephus, fm. whom comes the mass of such trustworthy information as we have about the centuries wh. preceded our era, declares the first to be S. "the Just." A glowing description of this S. is given in Sr. 50.[1-21]; many things are told of him, especially of his method of acting on the Day of Atonement; reference is also made to the way he strengthened the buildings of the Temple and the city wall, wh. latter wd. stand in need of it after the capture of Jrs. by Ptolemy. In the Talmudic treatise, Yoma, we have a yet more wonderful account of the miracles that accompanied the High-priesthood of Simon the Just. Seven wonders showed themselves then: (1) A blessing rested on the first-fruits; (2) on the sacrificial loaves; (3) on the shewbread, so that though a priest might receive a portion no larger than an olive, without eating the whole he was satisfied; (4) the lot for God, as against Azazel, always fell to the right side; (5) the red thread round the neck of the ram of the Day of Atonement always became white; (6) the light in the Temple never failed; (7) the altar fire required but little wood to keep it burning. According to Josephus, Simon II. was a totally inconspicuous person who took the part of the worthless sons of Tobias; he was not conspicuous for piety, at any rate. Dr. Cheyne (Job and Solomon, 180) declares that "the weight of argument" is "in favour of the second of the name (Simon)," and he further claims that the second is called in the Talmud Simeon the Righteous, and that he "was certainly the more important of the two"; his sole evidence for this is Derenbourg (H. de la Pal. i. 44, &c.). What Derenbourg says is that he, Derenbourg, thinks the description suits the circumstances of the second better than the first. Yet Josephus, from whom we learn those circumstances, says it is Simon I. who is Simon hatz-Tzaddiq. We prefer the evidence of Josephus to that of Derenbourg. See Graetz (Gesch. der Israelit. ii. 235 n.), where the question is discussed at length. Simon I. was High Priest fm. B.C. 300 to 270. The Talmud ascribes to him the meeting with Alexander related by Josephus of his grandfather JADDUA. The second S. was High Priest fm. c. 220 to 200.

SINA, MOUNT, the Greek form of MOUNT SINAI in Jth. 5.[14] (AV.).

SIRACH. See ECCLESIASTICUS.

SISINNES, governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, who interfered with the rebuilding of the Temple, and wrote a letter to the king. Search in the archives showed that authority for rebuilding had been granted by Cyrus, and orders were given to Sisinnes and his companions to place no obstacles in the way of its completion. They were also enjoined to give assistance as required, and to make certain contributions from the revenues of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia for the sacrifices in the Temple (1 Es. 6.[3ff.]).

SODOMITISH SEA (2 Es. 5.[7]), the Dead Sea, so called, doubtless, from its ancient proximity to Sodom.

SOMEIS, AV. SAMIS, wh. see.

SONG OF THE THREE CHILDREN. See DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO.

SOPHONIAS (2 Es. 1.[40]), the prophet ZEPHANIAH.

SOSIPATER, a captain under Judas Maccabæus who, along with Dositheus, attacked and defeated Timotheus, taking him prisoner. Timotheus, however, persuaded them to set him free, in the interests of Jewish captives held by his people (2 M. 12.[19ff.]).

SOSTRATUS, governor of the citadel in Jerusalem, whose duty it was to collect the revenues for Antiochus Epiphanes. He failed to extract from Menelaus the money which that schemer had promised as the price of his elevation to the High-priesthood (2 M. 4.[27ff.]).

SUBA, RV. SUBAS, head of a family of Solomon's servants (1 Es. 5.[34]), not named in Ezra and Nehemiah.

SUBAI (1 Es. 5.[30]), corresponding to "Shalmai" in Ez. 2.[46].

SUDIAS (1 Es. 5.[26]), corresponding to "Hodaviah" in Ez. 2.[40]; "Hodevah" in Ne. 7.[43].

SUSANNA. See DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO.

SYELUS (1 Es. 1.[8]), corresponding to "Jehiel" in 2 Ch. 35.[8].

T

TABAOTH, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.^{29}) = "Tabbaoth" in Ez. 2.^{43}; Ne. 7.^{46}.

TABELLIUS (1 Es. 2.^{16}), corresponding to "Tabeel" in Ez. 4.^{7}.

TALSAS, RV. SALOAS, wh. see.

TANIS (Jth. 1.^{10}) = ZOAN, wh. see in Canonical Section.

TAPHON, RV. TEPHON, one of the strong cities of Judæa, fortified by Bacchides (1 M. 9.^{50}). Josephus calls it "Tochoa" (Ant. XIII. i. 3). The name is probably a corruption of "Tappuah" (BETH-TAPPUAH) or of NETOPHAH.

TEPHON. See preceding art.

TETA. See ATETA.

THARRA (Est. Ad. 12.^{1}), corresponding to "Teresh" in Est. 2.^{21}, &c.

THASSI, surname of Simon Maccabæus, possibly meaning "the zealous" (1 M. 2.^{3}). See MACCABEES.

THECOE, RV. TEKOAH (1 M. 9.^{33}). See TEKOAH in Canonical Section.

THELERSAS (1 Es. 5.^{36}), a town in Babylonia corresponding to "Tel-harsha" in Ez. 2.^{59}.

THEMAN (Ba. 3.^{22}), RV. TEMAN, wh. see in Canonical Section.

THEOCANUS, RV. THOCANUS (1 Es. 9.^{14}), corresponding to "Tikvah" in Ez. 10.^{15}.

THEODOTUS. (1) One of the three envoys sent by Nicanor to arrange terms of peace with Judas Maccabæus (2 M. 14.^{19}). (2) One who planned to assassinate king Ptolemy Philometor, and went by night to the tent of Ptolemy to accomplish his purpose. Ptolemy, however, had been taken away by Dositheus, and in his place had been put "an obscure person," who received "the punishment intended for the other" (3 M. 1.$^{3f.}$).

THERAS, the river at which Ezra's caravan was gathered together before the march to Jerusalem (1 Es. 8.^{41}). In Ez. 8.$^{21, 31}$ it is called Ahava. This may possibly be identified with the mod. Hit on the river Euphrates.

THERMELETH, a town in Babylonia (1 Es. 5.^{36}) corresponding to "Tel-melah" in Ez. 2.^{59}.

THISBE, the native place of Tobit, whence he was carried into captivity. It is placed "on the right hand (south) of Kedesh Naphtali in Galilee above Asher" (To. 1.^{2}). The place has not been identified. We need not, however, expect strict geographical accuracy in this romance any more than in the book of Judith. Some would identify this with the birthplace of the prophet ELIJAH. Dr. Cheyne thinks "there is strong reason to believe that the stories of Daniel (in part), Esther, Judith, and Tobit, have been systematically altered as regards their historical and geographical names," and that, in this passage, "the original reading was probably not 'Galilee' but 'Gilead,' i.e. the southern Gilead in the Negeb. 'Naphtali' is a southern district so called, and 'Asher' represents the southern Asshur or Ashhur" (EB. s.v.).

THOCANUS. See THEOCANUS.

THOMEI, AV. THOMOI (1 Es. 5.^{32}), corresponding to TEMAH in Ez. 2.^{53}; Ne. 7.^{55}.

THRACIA is mentioned only incidentally in 2 M. 12.^{35}. In an engagement between Judas Maccabæus and Gorgias, the governor of Idumæa under Antiochus Epiphanes, Dositheus, a Jewish soldier of great strength, got hold of Gorgias himself, and "was minded to take the accursed man alive," when a Thracian horseman bore down upon him, disabled his shoulder, and rescued the governor. Thracia at that period practically comprised what are now Bulgaria and Roumelia, and was occupied by different tribes. The death of Lysimachus, B.C. 281, marked the end of all hope of Thracian independence. But ample opportunity was furnished for employment of her warlike sons, in the perpetual strifes of these days. They seem to have been ready to give their services to whoever was able to pay for them. They were famous horsemen, and they seem chiefly to have supplied cavalry to the armies in which they served.

THRASÆUS, AV. THRASEAS, the father of Apollonius (2 M. 3.^{5}).

TIGRIS, the river, is mentioned in To. 6.^{1}; Jth. 1.^{6}; and Sr. 24.^{25}. It is identical with the river HIDDEKEL, wh. see in Canonical Section.

TIMOTHEUS, the leader of the Ammonites, and one of the most persistent antagonists of Judas Maccabæus. The name is Greek; but there is nothing to show whether he was an adventurer of that nation who had won the confidence of the tribe, or simply a tribesman who had adopted a Greek name. He is not credited with a single success against the arms of Judas, but he repeatedly suffered heavy defeat (1 M. 5.$^{6, 11, 34ff.}$). He was captured by two of Judas' captains after a battle east of Jordan, but representing the peril that threatened certain Jewish prisoners at the hands of his people, should evil befall him, he persuaded them to let him go. In 2 M. 8.$^{30ff.}$, 9.^{3}, 10.$^{24, 32, 37}$, 12.$^{2, 10, 18-21, 24}$, he is made to play a part in the warfare west of the Jordan, being put to death after the capture of Gazara by Judas' men, who found him hidden in a cistern.

TITUS MANLIUS. See MANLIUS.

TOBIAS, the son of Tobit, who plays a leading part in the romance (see TOBIT, BOOK OF).

TOBIE (1 M. 5.[13]), RV. TUBIAS. This appears to have been the residence of a considerable number of Jews. It may be identical with "Tob" in Jg. 11.[3, 5].

TOBIEL, the father of Tobit (To. 1.[1]).

TOBIT, the father of Tobias. See TOBIT, BOOK OF.

TOBIT, THE BOOK OF, is one of those books commonly called "the Apocrypha," which, though not finding a place in the Hebrew Canon, yet formed part of the OT. Canon of the Alexandrian Jews, and was therefore included in the Septuagint. A Haggadic romance, based on an old tradition, and embodying in historical form a series of moral and religious lessons, it gives us an "idyllic picture" of Jewish domestic life during the Captivity.

Contents.—The story is charmingly told. Its popularity is evidenced by the number and variety of the versions that have come down to us. The book professes to be the history of "a pious man whose name was Tobit, the son of Tobiel, of the tribe of Naphtali," who is carried away to Assyria, where, in the land of his captivity, like Joseph and Daniel, he continues to fear God and rises to high honour. After a time, however, he falls into disfavour by secretly burying those who had been put to death by the king of Assyria. He has now to fly for his life, but is afterwards restored to favour. Again he falls into trouble through burying a corpse that had been cast out on the street. This time, being unclean, he has to sleep in the courtyard, and is blinded by sparrows' dung which has dropped on his uncovered face. Reduced once more to poverty, he is one day, like Job, reproached by his wife: "Where are thy good deeds and thine alms?" Whereupon he prays that he may die. The same day, in Ecbatana of Media, Sara the daughter of Raguel is taunted by her maids with having caused the death of her seven husbands on their bridal night, whereas it was the demon Asmodeus who had slain them. She, too, prays for death. Then the angel Raphael is sent to help them both—to heal Tobit of his blindness, and to give Sara to her kinsman Tobias, the son of Tobit, in marriage. The dénouement is brought about by the despatch of Tobias, with Raphael, in the guise of a servant, for his companion, to Rages, to recover a sum of money lent to Gabael. In the end Tobias not only recovers his father's money, but by taking the liver with the heart and its gall out of a fish that had attacked him as he bathed in the Tigris, he possesses himself of two potent drugs. By fumigation with the heart and liver he delivers Sara from the attacks of Asmodeus, and she becomes his wife, while the angel Raphael recovers the money. On returning home, Tobias restores his father's sight by anointing his eyes with the gall of the fish. Thereupon Raphael reveals his identity and disappears. The book concludes with a beautiful song of thanksgiving by Tobit, and with the advice to his son to quit the doomed city of Nineveh for Media.

Its Origin and Purpose.—As to the origin and purpose of the book, Neubauer rejects the view of the Midrash (which Ewald had adopted without knowing the Midrash), that it was intended as an admonition to observe the payment of the tithes and to give alms. Another view, which Neubauer also rejects, is that it was an exhortation to observe the sacrifices and other laws mentioned in Leviticus. "Such admonitions," Neubauer holds, "would be nothing new, and there would be no occasion to compose a popular history to enforce them." Neubauer, following Graetz and Kohut, seems to believe that the frequent and strange allusion to a secret burial of dead men gives a clue to the object of the book. The question of the burial of the dead is certainly prominent in the story of Tobit, but not more prominent than that of almsgiving and the payment of tithes. There is indeed a great deal of good moral teaching in the book, and its object would seem to be to inculcate various moral and religious duties, such as the payment of the tithes, the exercise of charity, a pious care for the dead, the sacredness of marriage, and, above all, the lesson that it is always well with them that fear God. It is interesting to note that the golden rule occurs in chap. 4.[15] in its negative form, "What is hateful to thee, do not thou to others."

It has been remarked how Persian influence is distinctly traceable throughout the book. The Persian custom of leaving the dead to be devoured by birds and beasts of prey was particularly abhorrent to the Jews, and may partly account for the frequent insistence on orthodox burial. The place-names, too, are largely Persian, and the demon Asmodeus is the Æshma-dæva of the Persian Avesta. The angelology of the book may have come direct from Babylonia.

Its Date.—Some authorities, in spite of obvious historical and geographical blunders (e.g. chap. 1.[2]), believe that it is what it professes to be, viz. a composition of the seventh cent. B.C. Ewald places it about B.C. 350. Hitzig puts it in the reign of Trajan. Because of the prominence given in the book to the question of the burial of the dead, Graetz (followed by Neubauer) refers it to the age of Hadrian, shortly after the fall of Bether, so valiantly defended by Bar Cochba, while Kohut supposes that it was written in Persian in the time of Ardeshir I. (A.D. 250). The conjectures of Graetz and Kohut are based on the fact that on these two occasions the Jews were forbidden to bury their dead. It is a fatal objection, however, to any date later than the middle of the second century A.D., that Tobit is quoted twice (chaps. 4.[10], 12.[9]) by Polycarp. The probability is, indeed, that it is a much earlier work, and belongs to the Maccabæan age. Antiochus Epiphanes, too, at this time, is said to have "cast out many unburied" (2 M. $5.^{10}$), and this might in itself account for the frequent references to this subject. The book may well have been the composition of an age when it was desirable to remind men that God hears and answers prayer, and that righteousness always in the long run meets with its just reward. Its tone and spirit also agree with those of such other books as Sirach, which are known to have been written about the same time.

Original Language.—Judging from its pure Semitic idiom, the original language must have been either Hebrew or Chaldee. Jerome says it was written in Chaldee. Most modern critics, however, like Bickell and Neubauer, conclude on linguistic grounds that it was written originally in Hebrew, the language in which, as is now generally agreed, the majority of the Apocryphal books were composed. J. M'Gilchrist.

TOLBANES (1 Es. $9.^{25}$), corresponding to "Telem" in Ez. $10.^{24}$.

TOPARCHIES (1 M. $11.^{28}$, RVm.), AV. GOVERNMENTS, RV. PROVINCES. The reference is to subordinate administrative districts, three of which were detached from Samaria and joined to Judæa.

TRIPOLIS ("Triple city"). Into the haven of Tripolis Demetrius Soter sailed "with a mighty host and fleet," by means of which he got possessions of the country, wresting the throne from Antiochus V., his cousin, "having made away with Antiochus and Lysias his guardian" (2 M. $14.^{1ff.}$; cp. Ant. XII. x. 1). To Tripolis came Antiochus Cyzicenus when Hyrcanus proved too strong for him (Ant. XIII. x. 2). Founded by the Phœnicians, it was divided by walls into three quarters, occupied respectively by Aradians, Sidonians, and Tyrians. Here sat the federal council of these states. Under the Seleucids it was adorned with public buildings. Herod the Great built here a gymnasium (BJ. I. xxi. 11). It passed under the control of "tyrants," and suffered much from pirates. These last were suppressed by Pompey. The modern town of Tarābulūs stands about two miles inland, on rising ground beside Nahr Qadīsha. From the ancient site on the sea-shore all traces of its former splendour have vanished. There now is the mīna, or harbour of the town. The plain along the coast is remarkable for its fertility, and is occupied chiefly by fruitful orchards. Modern Tarābulūs is a prosperous town, doing considerable trade by sea.

TRYPHON. On the death of Alexander Balas, Tryphon, "who aforetime had been of Alexander's part," observing the unpopularity of Demetrius II., plotted to secure the throne for himself. Securing the person of Antiochus, the young son of Balas, he put forward his claims to the crown (1 M. $11.^{39f.}$). With the assistance of the disaffected soldiers of Demetrius he was able to defeat his rival, and gained possession of Antioch. Demetrius showed little gratitude for exceptional service rendered him by Jonathan. The latter was therefore easily attracted to the cause of the young Antiochus. As Tryphon's plans matured the Jewish leader became inconvenient. Having treacherously captured him in Ptolemais after a futile attempt at Scythopolis, he put him to death (1 M. $12.^{39ff.}$, $13.^{23}$). Soon after he threw off the mask, slew Antiochus, and "put on himself the diadem of Asia" (1 M. $13.^{32}$). Simon Maccabæus then entered into alliance with Demetrius. The latter was taken prisoner by Arsaces, but his brother, Antiochus Sidedes, prosecuted the campaign against Tryphon, whom he besieged in Dor. Escaping thence, Tryphon fled to Orthosia (1 M. $15.^{10\text{-}14,\ 37ff.}$) and then to Apamea, where he was besieged and put to death, after a reign of three years (Ant. XIII. vii. 1f.).

Coin of Tryphon

TUBIAS. See Tobie.

TUBIENI (2 M. $12.^{17}$), the inhabitants of Tob. See Tobie.

TURPENTINE TREE (Sr. $24.^{16}$), RV. TEREBINTH, wh. see in Canonical Section.

TYRE, LADDER OF. See Ladder of Tyre.

TYRUS (2 Es. $1.^{11}$, &c.), a form of the name Tyre.

U

URIAS. (1) AV. IRI (1 Es. $8.^{62}$), "Uriah" in Ez. $8.^{33}$. He may be the same as (2) 1 Es. $9.^{43}$, called "Uriah" in Ne. $8.^{4}$.

URIEL, the angel sent to Esdras to show him the folly of thinking he could "comprehend the way of the Most High" (2 Es. $4.^{1}$). He tried the capacity of Esdras by requiring him to weigh a weight of fire, to measure a measure of wind, or to call back the day that is past. In v. 36 RV. has the form "Jeremiel," calling him "the archangel." Similar missions are reported in $5.^{20}$ and $10.^{28}$. In the Prayer of Joseph he figures as Jacob's antagonist in the night-long wrestling. He plays a great part in the book of Enoch. He is set over "the world and Tartarus," and is the companion of Enoch, explaining to him he sights seen in the regions of woe.

UTA, head of a family of Temple servants (1 Es. 5.[30]), not named in Ezra and Nehemiah.

UTHI (1 Es. 8.[40]), called "Uthai" in Ez. 8.[14].

W

WASP (Ws. 12.[8]), RV. HORNET, wh. see in Canonical Section.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON, a deutero-canonical book, forming part cf the Greek OT., whence it has been translated into the other languages employed by the Christian Church; in the Old Syriac version it is called "the Great Wisdom." Owing to the use which it exhibits of Greek philosophy, and to its name being unknown to the Jewish oral tradition, its original language is usually supposed to be Greek, so that we have the work before us nearly as the author left it; yet this supposition is not free from difficulties, of which the most serious is the occurrence in the Jewish oral tradition of what is evidently the original of a passage mistranslated in Wisdom 14.[10], "For that which is done shall be punished with the doer," a meaningless proposition; whereas the Hebrew, "For that which is worshipped shall be punished with the worshipper" (a comment on Ex. 12.[12]), is clear; and the error evidently arises from the use of the word 'ābad, which in Hebrew means "worship," but in Aramaic "do." A few more mistranslations from Hebrew can be detected with apparent certainty (1.[12] "emulate" for "acquire," 4.[18] "despise" for "melt away," cp. Ps. 112.[10]), and in many more cases the character of the expressions suggests mistranslation, though the source of the error is not clear. Some other matter is also common to the book and to the oral tradition, and presumably has found its way from the former into the latter. In large portions of the book, moreover, the parallelism peculiar to Hebrew rhetoric is clearly imitated, and the idiom marked by violent Hebraisms. On the other hand, the language is in general too ambitious to accord easily with the theory of translation; and the structure of some of the prose paragraphs, with the exuberance which they display, accords with it still less. Renderings peculiar to the LXX are sometimes so used as to enter into the argument, though in one or two of these cases the suspicion that the LXX has been interpolated from Wisdom is, owing to the character of the language, not wholly excluded. Perhaps no serious error is involved in the supposition that parts of the book at any rate existed in Hebrew before the Greek text was produced.

Authorship and Date.—Although the writer carefully abstains from mentioning names, the autobiography in chaps. 7.–9. is evidently intended for that of Solomon, after whom the book is called, though even in uncritical times doubts were expressed as to its authenticity. Since the Jews did not become acquainted with Greek philosophy before the third century B.C., the book must be many centuries later than Solomon's time; but it cannot be located with accuracy. Although there are places in the NT. which bear considerable resemblance to its expressions, it cannot have been recognised as authoritative in the time of the apostles, since it must have furnished Christian apologists with some powerful weapons which they do not appear to have used. If the use of the LXX by the author be demonstrated, he could scarcely be earlier than B.C. 150; the atmosphere of the book seems considerably later, and to belong to the times of Philo and Josephus; indeed the speech put by the latter into the mouth of Eleazar, the hero of Masada (BJ. VII. viii. 7), is closely allied to it in spirit. The name of Philo has sometimes been suggested for the author of the work: it is clear, however, that his doctrine was quite different from that of Wisdom. The only occasion on which local knowledge is displayed (10.[7], description of the Dead Sea and the "Pillar of Salt") points to Palestine as the author's country; and the same seems suggested by 2.[12], where the "just man" is said to taunt the ruling powers with "offences against the law," which implies that the ruler was thought of as nominally an Israelite. A Hebrew original would probably, though not necessarily, point in the same direction. Those who maintain a Greek original usually suppose the work to have been issued in Alexandria. The author certainly displays some knowledge of Egyptian religion, but perhaps not more than would easily be acquired by any traveller; and that Jews who aspired to become authors saw the world, we know on Ben-Sira's evidence. The introduction into Palestine by Herod and others of Greek games, &c., would account for some of the allusions (e.g. 4.[2], to the victor's wreath and procession), which might have been made by an author who had never gone outside that country.

Attempts to divide the work between several or even many authors have indeed been made, but have rarely found favour, as the unity of both thought and style is very marked, notwithstanding the fact that parts of the book are in some sort of verse, whereas others are in prose. If, however, the Greek text is based on an earlier Hebrew work, the Greek editor's treatment of the latter must have been so free, and the amount contributed by him so considerable, as to constitute him joint author of the work in its Greek form. The literature of translations furnishes examples of the process indicated.

Contents and Sources.—The work falls into three divisions: (a) Chaps. 1.–6.[12], in which the principal topic is the immortality of the soul; (b) 6.[13]–9.[18], account of Wisdom, including the author's autobiography; (c) 10. to the end, Midrash, or sermons on the first two books of the Pentateuch. In all three sections Greek philosophy is combined with matter drawn from the OT.; the most obvious borrowings from Hellenic sources are reserved for the middle section, perhaps with the view of diverting attention from them.

In (a) the writer identifies the "just man" described in Plato's Republic with the "Servant of the Lord" of Isaiah 53., earnestly insists on future reward and retribution, and warns the rulers of the earth against injustice, which he associates with the Epicurean doctrine taught by Ecclesiastes. The expressions are drawn somewhat in cento fashion from the OT.—the Psalms, Isaiah, and the Proverbs being especially laid under contribution. The subject of immortality suggests that of reproduction (which both with Plato and other philosophers was a substitute for it), and high praise is bestowed on the childless life (whence some have thought the author to have belonged to one of the ascetic sects described by Philo and Josephus); the crime of adultery is vehemently denounced, and in a manner which in Solomon's mouth would have savoured of bad taste; the matter here agrees with that in Ecclesiasticus, and is probably derived from some common source. It would seem, however, that in this passage (3.[12]–4.[6]) the author is aiming at some historical personage, who has not been certainly identified.

In (b) the writer emphasises the fact that he is a man (perhaps with reference to a book called The Wisdom of God, cited in Lk. 11.[49], the name of which is given by one of the Fathers to this), and paraphrases the narrative of 1 K. 3.[5-13]. Solomon's prayer for wisdom occupies chap. 9. (extending in form to the end of the work), and is preceded by an account of Wisdom from several aspects. In 7.[17-21] its denotation is said to be "knowledge of things," i.e. the sciences, which are classified as follows: Physics, astronomy, including the calendar, zoology, botany, and medicine ("powers of roots"); and the obscurer subjects, "beginning, end, and middle of times, changes of turnings and alterations of seasons," "forces of winds (or spirits) and thoughts of men." The last two probably mean psychology and logic; the first appears to signify history (including past, present, and future), and the remaining subject, the doctrine of the suitability of different days and seasons to different purposes. It is curious that arithmetic and geometry are omitted. Wisdom is then described in a long series of adjectives (7.[22, 23]) indicating a concept somewhat similar to the "fire" of Heraclitus, i.e. a force whose existence accounts for life and certain other phenomena, but which the writer supposes to consist of infinitely small particles of matter (like the Lucretian soul). The division of the virtues in chap. 8. is derived from Plato. In 8.[20] the author comes near adopting the Platonic doctrine of transmigration, and in 9.[15] there is another reference to it. The Hellenic matter is, as before, carefully combined with centos from the OT.

In (c) the author applies the doctrine of "Wisdom" to the elucidation of Bible history, which he traces as far as the Exodus. It is the earliest specimen we possess of a Midrash, or homiletic commentary on the OT., a style of literature which afterwards became popular with both Jews and Christians. "Wisdom" here plays much the same part as "Faith" in Hebrews 11.; a large portion of the section is, however, devoted to the condemnation of paganism, of which the most excusable form, according to the author, is worship of the elements or the heavenly bodies; heinous as this is, it is better than the worship of idols; while that, again, is exceeded in folly by (Egyptian) zoolatry. Of the origin of image-worship the author propounds a theory (14.[15ff.]) in the style of Euhemerus, who supposed all the Hellenic gods to have been men. As elsewhere he mingles his philosophy with copious citations from the OT., especially Isaiah's denunciation of image-making being laid under contribution. The immoralities which the author associates with the worship of idols seem to reflect Asiatic rather than European practices.

The work ends in the middle of a contrast between the plagues of Egypt and the miracles with which Israel was favoured in the desert. It is uncertain whether the author ended here, or whether the book is imperfect.

Purpose.—It has often been held that the author's object was to demonstrate to the Greeks that the Jews had anticipated pagan philosophy; but the book would be ill suited to such an end, since with its numerous unexplained allusions to OT. history (to say nothing of its Hebraisms) it would have been unintelligible to pagan readers without commentary. The omission of all proper names must, however, have some definite purpose; and if this was to avoid the introduction into a Greek work of barbarous forms, with which, however, Jewish readers would be familiar, the author must have aspired to be read by Greeks. To these, too, the anachronism of making Solomon borrow largely from Isaiah would be inoffensive. Probably the facts are best accounted for by the supposition that the author wrote for Jews, likely to abandon their religion for paganism, partly because of the hopelessness of resistance to pagan powers, partly because of the evident superiority of the productions of the Græco-Roman intellect to those of the East. If it were true, as Ecclesiastes asserted, that one end awaited both the pious and the impious, why should these inducements be resisted? To this, then, the author furnishes a threefold reply: (1) That worldly success is illusory, since there is to be a final retribution; (2) that the intellectual discoveries of the Greeks were already to be found in the Wisdom, attributed by the OT. to Solomon, and a peculiar possession of Israel; (3) that history proved that Israel had been specially the object of God's favour, inasmuch as the calamities inflicted on the nation were kindly and disciplinary in character, whereas pagan races had been ruthlessly exterminated. In contrast to the enlightenment of the Jewish religion the author does his utmost to demonstrate the folly, the immorality, and the pernicious results of paganism. In ascribing to Solomon such products of the Greek intellect as the Platonic division of the virtues, or the antagonism between the immortal soul and its earthly case (9.[15]), the author acts like many of the posterity of his race, who regularly concealed such obligations: e.g. though the whole of Hebrew grammar is borrowed from Arabic grammarians, it does not seem that this considerable loan was ever acknowledged.

History of the Text.—Of the history of the work among the Jews nothing whatever is known, although, as has been seen, some fragments of it have found their way into the Oral Tradition, and are to be read in the homiletic (Aggādic) commentaries on Genesis and Exodus. Of NT. writers the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews displays a similarity to the book both in thought and language, which can scarcely be explained except on the supposition that he had the Greek text before him; there are also passages in the Pauline epistles and the Acts which have been regarded as showing traces of its influence. It is definitely quoted by Clemens Romanus and Irenæus, and is included in the Canon of both the Greek and the Roman Catholic churches. Though not recognised by the Anglican community, there are references to it in the Book of Common Prayer (e.g. Collect for Ash Wednesday, "who hatest nothing that Thou hast made" from 9.[24]).

D. S. Margoliouth.

X

XANTHICUS (2 M. 11.[30, 33, 38]). See Year in Canonical Section.

Z

ZABADÆANS, AV. ZABADEANS. The army of Demetrius having escaped him, we are told that Jonathan "turned aside to the Arabians who are called Zabadæans, and smote them and took their spoils" (1 M. 12.[31]). The locality indicated is to the NW. of Damascus. Josephus (Ant. XIII. v. 10) calls the Arabs Nabatæans. There is possibly some reminiscence of the ancient name in that of mod. ez-Zebedāny. It lies towards the northern end of a hollow in the Antilebanon range, which runs north and south, down which flow the head waters of the Abana. It is about 28 miles from Damascus, on the way leading to Baalbek. The plain bears the same name; and a little to the NW. of ez-Zebedāny lies the village Kefr Zebād. No identification of the tribe is now possible.

ZABADAIAS, RV. ZABADEUS (1 Es. 9.[35]), called "Zabad" in Ez. 10.[43].

ZABDEUS (1 Es. 9.[21]), corresponding to "Zebadiah of the sons of Immer" in Ez. 10.[20].

ZABDIEL, the Arabian chief who "took off Alexander's [Balas] head, and sent it to Ptolemy" (1 M. 11.[17]; Ant. XIII. iv. 8).

ZACCHÆUS, AV. ZACCHEUS, one of the officers of Judas Maccabæus (2 M. 10.[19]).

ZACHARIAS. (1) 1 Es. 1.[8], corresponding to Zechariah, a "ruler of the house of God" in the days of Josiah (2 Ch. 35.[8]). (2) 1 Es. 1.[15]; this name is replaced by that of "Heman" in 2 Ch. 35.[15]. (3) RV. ZARAIAS (1 Es. 5.[8]), called "Seraiah" in Ez. 2.[2]; "Azariah" in Ne. 7.[7]. (4) 1 Es. 6.[1], 7.[3], the prophet Zechariah. (5) 1 Es. 8.[30] = "Zechariah of the sons of Parosh" in Ez. 8.[3]. (6) 1 Es. 8.[37] = "Zechariah of the sons of Bebai" in Ez. 8.[11]. (7) 1 Es. 8.[44], corresponding to "Zechariah" in Ez. 8.[16]. (8) 1 Es. 9.[27] = "Zechariah of the sons of Elam" in Ez. 10.[26]. (9) 1 Es. 9.[44], RV. = "Zechariah" in Ne. 8.[4]. (10) Father of Joseph, who was one of the leaders under Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 5.[18, 56]).

ZACHARY (2 Es. 1.[40]), the prophet Zechariah.

ZAMBIS, RV. ZAMBRI (1 Es. 9.[34]), corresponding to "Amariah" in Ez. 10.[42].

ZAMBRI. (1) See preceding art. (2) 1 M. 2.[26] = "Zimri" the Simeonite in Nu. 25.[14].

ZAMOTH (1 Es. 9.[28]), corresponding to "Zattu" in Ez. 10.[27].

ZARACES, RV. ZARAKES (1 Es. 1.[38]), corresponding to "Jehoahaz" in 2 Ch. 36.[4].

ZARAIAS. (1) AV. ZACHARIAS (3), wh. see. (2) 1 Es. 8.[2], called ARNA in 2 Es. 1.[2], and "Zerahiah" in Ez. 7.[3]. (3) 1 Es. 8.[31] = "Zerahiah" in Ez. 8.[4]. (4) 1 Es. 8.[34], called "Zebadiah" in Ez. 8.[8].

ZARAKES. See ZARACES.

ZARDEUS, AV. SARDEUS, wh. see.

ZATHOE, RV. ZATHOES (1 Es. 8.[32]); not named in Ez. 8.[5], the corresponding passage.

ZATHUI (1 Es. 5.[12]), corresponding to "Zattu" in Ez. 2.[8].

ZECHRIAS, AV. EZERIAS (1 Es. 8.[1]), corresponding to "Azariah" in Ez. 7.[1].

ZEDECHIAS, RV. SEDEKIAS (1 Es. 1.[46]). Zedekiah, king of Judah.

ZOROBABEL (1 Es. 4.[13], &c.), RV. ZERUBBABEL, wh. see in Canonical Section.

ZORZELLEUS (1 Es. 5.[38]), AV. BERZELUS, wh. see.

CORRIGENDA

Page 6, Art. ACELDAMA, l. 13, for sharmen read sharnēn.

l. 15, for shamā read shamā'.

l. 16, for chandemar read chaudemar.

note, for jud. read jüd.

Page 57*b*, l. 25, page 67*a*, ll. 3 and 39, for HJHL. read HGHL.

The illustrations of Mercury, page 453, and Tammuz, page 810, should exchange places.

ADDENDA

Page 914, Art. WRITING—

Lit.: The Alphabet, by Isaac Taylor, 2 vols.; "Alphabet" in Jewish Encyclopædia, by Professor W. Lidzbarski; "Alphabet" in Encyclopædia Britannica, by P. Giles, LL.D.; "Writing" in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, by F. G. Kenyon; Greek and Latin Palæography, by Sir E. Maunde Thompson; Introduction to the Hebrew Bible, by A. S. Geden, D.D., pp. 1–66; Nestle's Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament, chap. ii.; Anthropology and the Classics (Essay on Primitive Pictography, by A. J. Evans, LL.D.); Royal Tombs of the Earlier Dynasties, by W. M. Flinders Petrie, D.C.L., 2 vols.; Aramaic Papyri from Assouān, by Cowley and Sayce; Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly, January, April, and July 1909 (Gezer Hebrew Inscription).

Page 67, Art. BETHSAIDA—

It is worthy of note that St. Luke (8.[26]) places the country of the Gadarenes (RV. Gerasenes) on the other side of the sea from Galilee—ἥτις ἐστὶν ἀντίπερα τῆς Γαλιλαίας.

Printed by BALLANTYNE, HANSON & Co.
Edinburgh & London

AND THE KIDRON VALLEY IN FOREGROUND

NOM IN FOREGROUND, OLIVET ON THE RIGHT

JERUSALEM FROM THE EAST. GETHSEMANE AND THE KIDRON VALLEY IN FOREGROUND

JERUSALEM FROM THE SOUTH. VALLEY OF HINNOM IN FOREGROUND, OLIVET ON THE RIGHT

J. M. Dent & Co. London.

EGYPT AND
THE SINAI PENINSULA
CAPHTORIM
MIZRAIM LAND OF HAM
LAND OF GOSHEN
EGYPT
Tanis
Daphnae
Bubastis
Heroopolis
Sin Pelusium
Heliopolis
Clysma
Memphis Noph
Arsinoe
Heracleopolis
LAKE SIRBONIS
Mons Casius
River of Egypt
Wilderness of Shur
Wilderness of Etham
Kadesh Barnea
Sela Petra
Jebel Harun
Ezion Geber
Elath
Rephidim
Dizahab
SINUS HEROOPOLITES
SINUS ÆLANITES ARABIA DESERTA
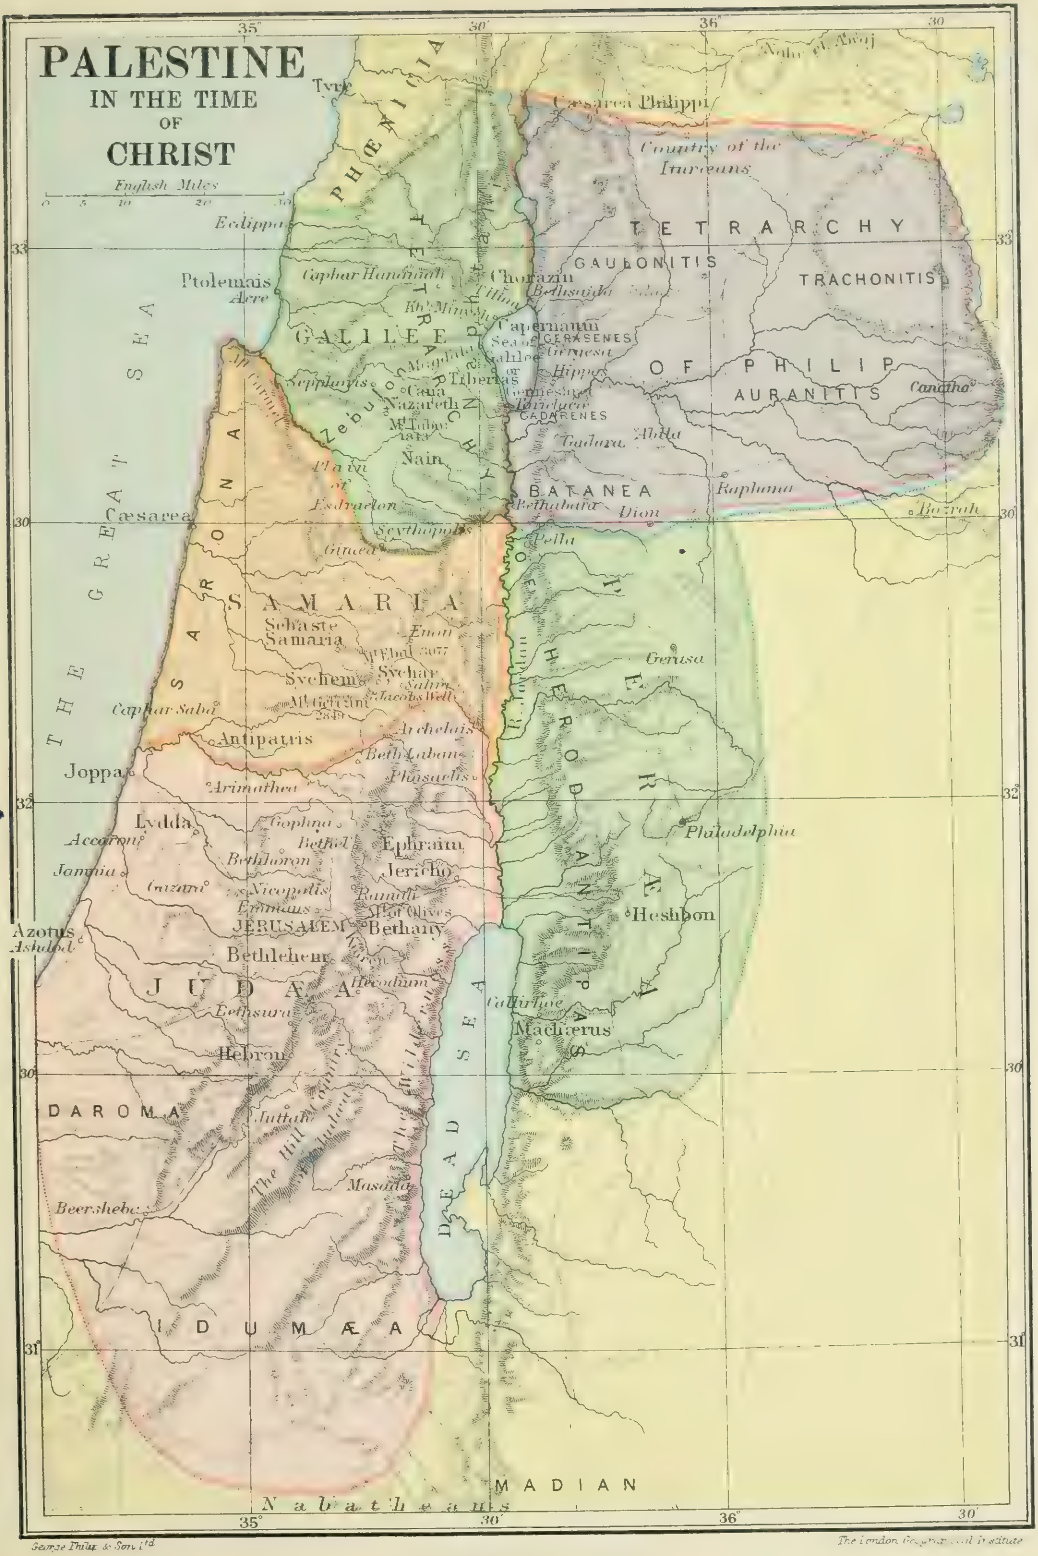
J. M. Dent & Co. London.

J. M. Dent & Co. London

J. M. Dent & Co. London.



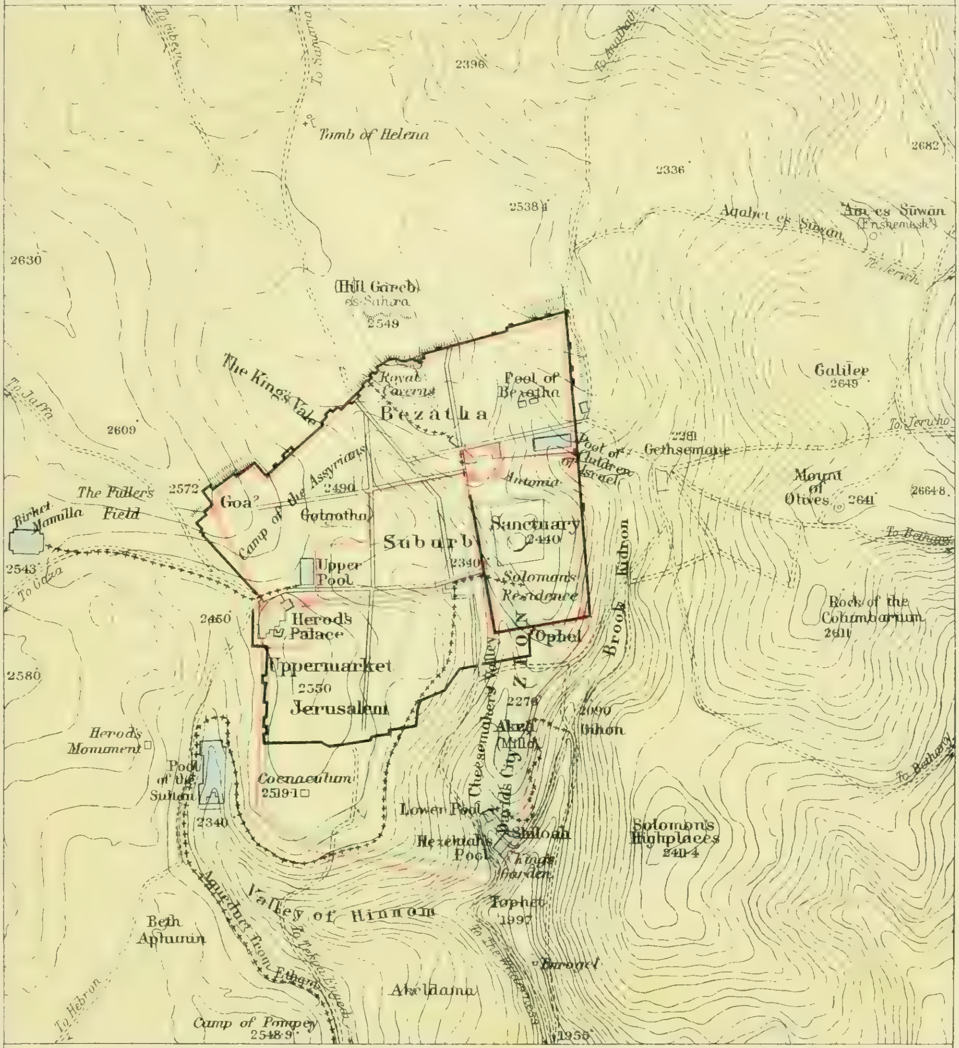
J. M. Dent & Co London.

JERUSALEM

ANCIENT AND MODERN

Drawn by G. H. Dalman

(Modern Jerusalem from a plan of the Palestine Exploration Fund)



Scale 1:21,000

English Feet: 0 — 500 — 1000 — 2000 — 3000

Roman Stadia: 0 — 1 — 2 — 3 — 4 — 5

Walls at the time of Solomon

Walls at the time of the destruction by Titus

Present Walls showing Aelia Capitolina

Heights in English Feet

George Philip & Son Ltd

The London Geographical Institute

J. M. Dent & Co. London.

J. M. Dent & Co London.

George Philip & Son Ltd

J. M. Dent & Co. London.

THIS BOOK IS DUE ON THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW

AN INITIAL FINE OF 25 CENTS

WILL BE ASSESSED FOR FAILURE TO RETURN THIS BOOK ON THE DATE DUE. THE PENALTY WILL INCREASE TO 50 CENTS ON THE FOURTH DAY AND TO $1.00 ON THE SEVENTH DAY OVERDUE.

JUL 22 1942	JUN 9 - 1966 6 9
JUL 9 1943	REC'D LD
6 Ja'58 J N X	JUN 9 '66 -12 M
REC'D LD
JAN 14 1958
17 Feb'58 AR
REC'D LD
JUN 11 1960
4 Oct'60BM
REC'D LD
JAN 10 1961
REC'D LD
1 Jun61 LC
JUN 19 '65 -8 AM

LD 21-100m-7,'40 (6936s)

293389

BS
440
E8

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY